

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS OF WEST VIRGINIA

In Force January 1, 1914

PRELIMINARY.

Bills of Exceptions.

1. Office and Contents. It is the office of a bill of exceptions to point out errors committed by the court during the progress of the trial. The bill or bills should contain only a concise statement of the facts necessary to present the points intended to be relied on as grounds of error, or only so much of the evidence as may appear necessary to present fairly the rulings of the court to which exception is taken. No bill of exceptions should contain matter irrelevant or unnecessary to the presentation of the question intended to be raised.

2. Points must be Clearly Stated. It is the duty of the exceptor to see that the points and objection on which he relies are correctly and clearly stated, so as to show plainly that an erroneous ruling was made to his prejudice, and he should not leave that fact to appear merely by inference or conjecture.

3. Rulings on Evidence or Instructions. An exception to the admission or rejection of evidence or to the granting or refusal of instructions to the jury, should state only so much of the evidence or facts proven as may be necessary to show the relevancy or irrelevancy of such evidence or the pertinency or impertinency of such instruction. The judge of the trial court should require all unnecessary matter to be stricken out before signing a bill of exceptions.

RULE I.

Petitions.

1. Must Assign Errors—Not Argue the Case. A petition for an appeal or writ of error may briefly state the case and must assign errors, naming the particular decrees or judgments complained of and the date of their rendition, and in the prayer of the petition it should be stated whether or not a supersedeas is desired; but the case is not to be argued in the petition. A separate note of argument, setting forth the points and authorities relied on, shall be submitted with the petition, and will be considered by the court, but such note is not to be considered as a part of the petition or to be printed with it. A note of argument may be filed in opposition to such petition.

2. Certificate of Counsel. The petition must be accompanied by the certificate of some attorney duly qualified to practice in this court that in his opinion the decree or judgment complained of ought to be reviewed.

3. Names of Parties to be Summoned. It is also recommended to counsel presenting petitions, that they furnish to the clerk a memorandum of the names of parties to be summoned to answer the appeal or writ of error.

RULE II.

Docketing and Process.

1. Notice to Court Below and Summons. When an appeal or writ of error has been awarded, it shall be the duty of the clerk to notify the clerk of the court below of the fact of such allowance and of the penalty of the bond necessary to give effect to such appeal or writ of error when such bond is required, and the clerk of this court shall thereupon docket the case and issue process in accordance with the order of the court, summoning all parties other than the petitioner or petitioners.

2. Nonresident Parties. Whenever it is necessary that a nonresident party should be summoned to answer an appeal or writ of error, or have notice for any other purpose, order of publication may be had in the manner prescribed by law, which order shall be published once a week for four successive weeks in some newspaper published at the seat of government.

RULE III.

Printing the Record.

1. Dismissal for Failure to Print. If the appellant or plaintiff in error, except in cases of felony, shall fail to deposit with the clerk of this court within six months after the case has been docketed herein, a sum sufficient to pay for printing the transcript of the record, or shall fail to have the transcript of the record printed and fourteen copies thereof filed in the clerk's office within six months after the case has been docketed in this court, the appeal or supersedeas shall be dismissed.

2. How Procured. To procure such dismissal, the appellee or defendant in error must serve upon the opposite party, within reasonable time, a written notice that he will, on a day specified, move the court to dismiss the case, and set forth in such notice the grounds of the said motion. The motion may be made on any day when the court is open, whether in regular or special term.

3. Costs. But if, when the motion is made, the record has been already printed or the cost of such printing deposited with the clerk and no actual delay in the hearing of the cause has resulted from the failure to print the record or make such deposit within the six months allowed by law, the dismissal will be without costs; otherwise costs will be awarded against the party in default.

4. Renewal. An appeal or writ of error dismissed in accordance with this rule may be renewed upon presenting a new petition reciting the fact of the former petition and allowance and dismissal and referring to the assignments of error contained in the former petition, if the same be presented within one year from the date of the decree or judgment appealed from, and new process will be ordered and a new bond must be given; but after two dismissals for failure to print, no new allowance can be had.

See Perry v. Horn, 21 W. Va. 732.

RULE IV.

Argument Docket.

1. How Arranged. Thirty days before the first day of each regular term, the clerk shall prepare a list of the cases then ready to be heard in the grand division in which the next regular term is to be held, and distribute the printed lists as provided in section 20 of chapter 157 of the Acts of 1882, and in arranging the argument docket he shall allow for each circuit not less than as many days as one-fifth of the number of open cases on the docket of such circuit, but when there are not more than three cases on the argument docket from any one circuit, cases from another circuit may be set for hearing on the same day.

2. When Notice is Necessary. In all cases (except those of felony) when the record has been printed since the last preceding regular term of court, the party desiring a hearing must give notice to the opposite party of his intention to insist upon a hearing at the next regular term, at least thirty days before the first day of such term, and no case will be placed on the argument list and deemed ready for hearing until the second term after the record has been printed unless the notice above mentioned has been given and returned to the clerk's office thirty days before the term.

3. Cases Heard Out of Grand Division. A like notice must be given and filed in the clerk's office at least thirty days before the first day of the term whenever it is desired that a case be heard out of its grand division; but the requirements of each clause of this rule as to the notice may, at the option of the court, be waived by written consent of parties.

4. Copy of Bond. No case in which an appeal or supersedeas bond is required shall be placed upon the argument docket until the clerk shall have received a duly attested copy of such bond.

5. Appellee may Expedite Hearing. An appellee or defendant in error desiring to expedite the hearing of his case may have the record printed at his own expense and give the notice required by clause 2 of this rule, and the cost of such printing will, when the case is decided, be taxed among the costs incurred by such appellee or defendant in error, provided the appellant or plaintiff in error does not dismiss his appeal before hearing.

6. Felony Cases. When a writ of error has been allowed in the case of a party convicted of a felony, the clerk shall cause the record to be printed with all convenient dispatch, and the case will be called for hearing at the next regular term of court, wherever it may be held, without notice or consent being required, provided the record has been printed thirty days before the hearing.

RULE V.

Briefs.

1. In any case on appeal or writ of error, the counsel for the appellant or plaintiff in error at least thirty days, and counsel for the appellee or defendant in error at least ten days, before a case is called for hearing, shall file with the clerk of this court not less than ten copies of a printed brief, one of which copies shall, upon request, be furnished to each of the counsel engaged upon the opposite side. All reply and supplemental briefs shall be filed at least five days before a case is called for hearing, and no brief shall be filed later, unless by consent of counsel. It is also desired by the court that counsel upon each side will furnish promptly to counsel on the opposing side their respective briefs as soon as printed, but their doing so will not obviate the requirement of this rule as to filing copies in the office of the clerk, and it is recommended that the printed brief shall correspond in size of page with the printed record and bear the same docket number.

2. The brief of appellant shall contain a short and clear statement disclosing:

First. The kind of action or suit, and a closely condensed statement, without argument or quotation of evidence, of all facts necessary to determination of the points in controversy.

Second. What the issues were and how raised.

Third. How the issues were decided, and what the judgment or decree was.

Fourth. The errors relied upon for reversal.

Fifth. A concise statement of so much of the record as fully presents every error and exception relied on, referring to the pages of the record. If the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict or finding, in fact or law, is assigned, the statement shall contain a condensed recital of the evidence in narrative form so as to present the substance clearly and concisely. The statement will be taken to be accurate and sufficient for a full understanding of the question presented for decision, unless the opposite party in his brief shall make the necessary corrections or additions.

Following this statement, the brief shall contain, under a separate heading of each error relied on, separately numbered propositions or points, stated concisely, and without argument or elaboration, together with the authorities relied on in support of them; and in citing cases, the names of parties must be given, with the book and page where reported. No alleged error or point, not contained in this statement of points, shall be raised afterwards, either by reply brief, or in oral or printed argument, or on petition for rehearing, but the court, at its option, may notice a plain error not assigned or specified.

3. The brief of appellee on the assignment of errors shall point out any omissions or inaccuracies in appellant's statement of the record, and shall contain a short and clear statement of the propositions by which counsel seek to meet the alleged errors and sustain the judgment or decree, or by which such errors are obviated. Following this statement, the brief shall contain the points and authorities relied on in like manner as required in the appellant's brief. The brief of appellee on cross-errors shall be prepared in the manner required in the case of appellant's brief. The brief of appellant, in answer to the cross-assignment of errors, shall be prepared in the manner required of appellees in answer to the assignment of errors. Reply briefs shall be prepared in manner like to answer briefs.

4. The briefs of any party may be followed by an argument in support of such briefs, which shall be distinct therefrom, but shall be bound with the same. The argument shall be confined to discussion and elaboration of the points contained in the briefs. The names of counsel shall be affixed to all briefs filed by them.

5. The court on its own motion may refuse to allow submissions of any case, until the briefs of the party demanding it, complying with this rule in respect to form and contents, shall have been filed, and may also strike out on submission briefs not complying therewith.

6. Either party whose brief has been filed in compliance with the rule may insist upon a hearing when the case is regularly called although no brief shall have been filed by the opposite party, and when one party has complied with the rule and the other has not, the party complying with the rule may have the case either submitted or continued at his option. If one of the parties omits to file such brief at or before the hearing, he cannot be heard, but the case may be submitted or heard ex parte upon the argument of one counsel only for the party by whom the brief has been duly filed.

7. If no printed brief has been filed by either party within the time prescribed by this rule, the case will be continued when called, unless both parties are present in court, by counsel, with their respective briefs, and consent to submit the case with or without oral argument or file an agreement in writing to submit, but in no case can briefs be filed after the case is submitted.

8. It is not always necessary for counsel to appear in court in person in order to have a case submitted for judgment by the court; when the party desiring the submission of a case has filed his brief in compliance with the rule, he may by written request addressed to the court or to the clerk have his case submitted when called.

9. All former provisions of this rule, now omitted from it, are abrogated.

RULE VI.

Calling the Docket.

1. When Commenced. On the second day of each regular term the court will commence to call the cases then ready for hearing in the order in which they stand upon the printed list, and will proceed from day to day in the same order until all of the cases have been called.

2. How Many Cases to be Called. Not more than ten cases shall be considered liable to be called on any one day, including the one, if any, that may be under argument. No case shall be taken up out of the order of the docket except when briefs have been filed on both sides and the parties consent to submit the case without oral argument.

3. Set for Hearing. No case shall be set for hearing on any other days than those assigned to the circuit from which the case comes unless it be such as from its peculiar character or the mandate of the law may be regarded as a privileged case.

4. Exceptional Cases. Cases of general public interest or of peculiar hardship may be heard at a special term according to the provisions of section 13 of chapter 156, Acts of 1882, under such conditions and regulations as may be consented to by the parties or as the court may prescribe.

5. Agreement of Counsel. All agreements of counsel in regard to any case or matter pending in court shall be reduced to writing, signed by counsel and delivered to the clerk.

6. Reargument. Whenever the court desires further argument in any case which has been argued and submitted, it will fix a day therefor, and cause notice of the time and place, as well as of the subject or branch of the case, on which argument is desired, to be given to counsel.

RULE VII.

Certiorari.

1. How Obtained. No certiorari for diminution of the record shall be awarded unless a motion therefor shall be made in writing, stating the facts on which the motion is founded, and all motions for such certiorari should be made at the earliest period possible after the diminution is discovered, either in regular or special term.

2. When to be Printed. If the necessity for such certiorari is caused by the failure of the appellant or plaintiff in error to have enough of the record brought up to present fairly both sides of all errors complained of by him, it shall be his duty to have the additional record printed, or in default thereof, his appeal or writ of error may be dismissed; otherwise such additional record shall be printed at the expense of the party asking for the certiorari, but when, in either case, the additional record brought up does not exceed ten pages of manuscript, it need not be printed unless so ordered by the court.

RULE VIII.

Motions and Affidavits.

1. Must be in Writing. All motions, except motions of course, made to the court, shall be reduced to writing and shall contain a brief statement of the facts and objects of the motion.

2. Notice to be Given. No affidavit shall be read in support of or in opposition to any motion hereafter made to the court unless reasonable notice be given to the opposite party or his attorney of the time and place of taking the same, or good cause be shown why such notice has not been given and every motion which is not a motion of course, shall be supported by affidavit.

RULE IX.

Oral Argument.

1. How many may be Heard. Only two counsel shall be heard on each side in the argument of any case unless by special leave of court, and the counsel for the appellant or the plaintiff in error shall be entitled to open and conclude the argument.

2. Time Allowed. Forty-five minutes only shall be allowed to the appellant or plaintiff in error for the opening and conclusion, and thirty minutes to the appellee or defendant in error for his reply, but by special leave of the court granted before the argument begins, a longer time may be allowed to each side. The time allowed may be apportioned between the counsel on the same side at their discretion. But in all cases a fair opening of the case shall be made by the party entitled to the opening and concluding argument.

3. Who to be Deemed Counsel. The attorneys of the respective parties in the court below shall be deemed to be the attorneys of the same parties in this court until others have been retained and have notified the clerk of this court of that fact.

4. Record. In no case is it proper or necessary to consume the time allowed for argument by reading the record to the court, but counsel may refer thereto and state what they consider as proven by any exhibit or deposition on which they rely.

5. Commissioner's Report. No oral argument will be permitted upon exceptions to a commissioner's report except upon pure questions of law and without reference to details of evidence.

RULE X.

Cross-Assignment of Error.

1. When to be Considered. In any appeal or writ of error, if error is perceived against the appellee or defendant in error, the court will consider the whole record as being before it, and will reverse the proceedings, either in whole or in part, and in the same manner as it would were the appellee or defendant in error to assign errors and bring the case before the court, unless such error be waived by the party prejudiced thereby, which waiver shall be considered as a release of all error committed against him. It is, however, advisable for the appellee or defendant in error, if he is of opinion that there is error in the record to his prejudice, to call attention to the same by a formal counter-assignment of error, filed at the hearing of the case, or by pointing out and complaining of the same in his brief.

RULE XI.

Abandoned Cases.

1. When to be Dismissed. When a case has been called for argument at four successive regular terms held in the grand division to which the case belongs, and upon the call at the fourth term neither party is prepared to argue the same, the case shall be considered as abandoned and shall be dismissed at the costs of the appellant or plaintiff in error unless sufficient cause be shown for further continuance.

2. Reinstatement. No appeal or writ of error which shall have been dismissed or abated by the court, shall be reinstated or revived after the close of the next regular term held in the grand division in which the case belongs after such dismissal or abatement.

RULE XII.

Rehearing.

1. How Obtained. No petition for a rehearing will be entertained unless presented within the term at which the decision is announced, nor in any case later than thirty days after the date of the decision of the case in which it is presented (unless as otherwise authorized by law), and no rehearing will be allowed unless one of the judges who concurred in the decision shall be dissatisfied with the conclusion reached, and no petition for a rehearing will be entertained by the court in any case unless the reasons therefor are printed and filed with the petition; but if the decision complained of is announced within fifteen days of the close of the term, the printing may be dispensed with. When a rehearing is allowed, the court may fix the time and place for reargument and resubmission, notice of which shall be given by the clerk to the attorneys of record, but, in case it fails to fix such time and place, the clerk shall enter the case upon the docket as if it had never been heard.

RULE XIII.

Index to Records.

1. Must be Indexed. In making transcripts of records for appeal and writs of error, the clerks of any court making such transcript shall annex thereto a complete index, giving pages of the record on which its chief component parts are to be found, including the pages where the deposition of each witness appears in such record.

RULE XIV.

Officers of Court.

1. Accounts. The officers attending this court and receiving an allowance per diem therefor, shall, at the end of each term, furnish an account of the number of days so employed, verifying their accounts by affidavit, and orders of the allowance will then be made by the court and certified to the auditor of state, but such accounts will not be considered or allowed before the close of the term.

RULE XV.

Reports.

1. Arguments to be Omitted. In publishing the opinions of this court, the reporter shall not publish the arguments of counsel, but he shall report the names of counsel on each side, and when the counsel on the side adverse to the decision of the court shall furnish to him the points and authorities relied on, clearly and briefly stated, he may publish in the report such points and authorities; but in no case shall such points and authorities occupy more than one page of the printed report unless express authority therefor be given by the court.

RULE XVI.

Original Papers.

1. Not to be Withdrawn. No transcript of record, petition or other original paper or opinion of the court, shall be withdrawn from the custody of the clerk of this court unless upon motion made in court for this purpose and upon order of court permitting such withdrawal, except as provided in section 19, chapter 157, Acts of 1882.

McLAIN v. ALLEN et al.

1. EVIDENCE (§ 314*)—HEARSAY.

Where, in an action by an administrator to sell a lot to pay debts of decedent, the defendant claimed title to the lot by adverse possession, testimony of a witness that a real estate agent had collected rent for the house for the decedent prior to his death was not hearsay.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 294*)—DECLARATIONS—PEDIGREE.

Any person, whether a stranger or a relative, who is acquainted with a family and reputation in the family, can testify as to the pedigree and relationship of members of the family, and as to common rumor in the community as to this pedigree and relationship, and as to the declarations of the family as to pedigree, kinship, relationship, marriages, births, etc.

3. WITNESSES (§ 287*)—REDIRECT EXAMINATION—BRINGING OUT ENTIRE CONVERSATION.

Where the part of a conversation testified to by a witness on cross-examination was not brought out by any questions asked of the witness, and such conversation had previously been excluded, questions on redirect examination calling for the rest of the conversation were properly ruled out.

4. TRIAL (§ 192*)—INSTRUCTION—CHARGING ON FACTS.

Where, in the trial of the title to a lot, the defendant set up title by adverse possession, a charge that defendant must have had the lot for 10 full years prior to the commencement of the action in May, 1910, was not a charge on the facts, as it simply stated a fact about which there was no controversy.

5. TRIAL (§ 374*)—ISSUES.

The court has the right in all equity cases to submit both the legal and equitable issues raised by the pleadings to the jury, and need not require them to return a general verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 884; Dec. Dig. § 374.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Kershaw County; Geo. W. Gage, Judge.

Action by George W. McLain, administrator, against Edward Allen and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Defendants' exceptions are as follows:

"First. For error in his honor in allowing the witness George McLain to testify as follows, over the objection of this defendant: 'Q. Did you ever receive rent, before Henry Davis died, from the house, from anybody? A. From Mr. Moore. Q. Who was Mr. Moore? A. Real estate agent. Q. Where is he now? A. In New York, I am told. He would collect rent for Henry Davis, bring it to me, and I would give him the receipt for old man Henry. Old man Henry authorized me to receive $1.80 for him, and to keep it for him, and when he came to the shop I would give it him. The Court: I think it competent for the witness to say he collected rent from the property and turned it over to Henry Davis.' Whereas, it is respectfully submitted that the court should have held the said testimony incompetent, and merely hearsay, and should have excluded the same.

"Second. For error in admitting the declarations of the witness Mary Carter as to pedigree of Henry Davis, Eliza Villepigue, and Allen, over the objections of this defendant; she being a stranger, and having no relationship to the said Henry Davis, Eliza Villepigue, or Allen—the court holding as follows: 'You can prove it by anybody who knows; if a stranger knows, as well as a relative, can prove it by stranger.' Whereas, the court should have held, it is respectfully submitted, that the said testimony was incompetent and inadmissible.

"Third. For error in not allowing the witness Rose Woodside to state in full her conversation with Henry Davis, after respondent's attorneys had brought out part of said conversation in reference to permission granted her by Henry Davis to do certain things in reference to said lot, and for error in refusing to allow appellants' attorney to examine said witness in reference thereto, as follows: 'Mr. De Loach: Now he has brought out part of the conversation with Henry—Mr. Wittkowsky: I have brought out nothing. Mr. De Loach: What did Henry say? Mr. Wittkowsky: We object, under section 400. The Court: What part did he bring out? Mr. De Loach: In regard to his permission. The Court: Overruled.'

"Fourth. For error in charging the jury as follows: 'Now, it is important to fix the date.

This action was begun May, 1910; that is the reckoning point, May, 1910. Rose must have had that land for 10 full years before that date; that is to say, she must have had it, been on it, in May, 1900, and held it from May, 1900 to May, 1910—not only held it, but held it adversely against the owner.' Whereas, it is respectfully submitted, his honor, the circuit judge, should have left it to the jury to fix the point from which to reckon the 10 years' adverse holding, and should not have limited the adverse holding from May, 1900, to May, 1910.

"Fifth. For error in charging the jury that May, 1910, was the reckoning point in fixing the point from which to reckon the adverse holding, same being a charge upon the facts. For error in submitting to the jury the issues herein in the form of three questions, as set forth in his charge, as follows: 'The first is: Was Henry Davis the owner of the premises? The second: Is the title of the premises now in Allen? Third: Is the title in the premises in Rose Woodside by adverse possession? And you answer these questions "Yes," or "No," as you determine the facts, and sign your name as foreman.' Whereas, it is respectfully submitted that his honor, the presiding judge, should not have submitted the issues in this form, and he committed error in not charging the jury the facts to be determined by them should be under the rule that the plaintiff is required to make out his case by the greater weight of the evidence."

W. B. De Loach, of Camden, for appellants.
Kirkland & Kirkland and L. A. Wittkowsky, all of Camden, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This was an action by the plaintiff against the defendant for the sale of real estate in the aid of personality to pay debts, etc., and the appellant, Rose Woodside, was made a party to that suit, and made answer denying the allegations of the complaint, and set up adverse possession in her of the land in dispute. The case came for trial at the November term of the court for Kershaw county before Judge Gage in November 1912. Upon the trial his honor submitted to the jury certain issues, and the finding by the jury was against the contention of the appellant, and after entry of judgment she appealed, and asks reversal on five exceptions, which should be set out in the report of the case.

[1] The first exception alleges error in the admission of certain testimony of the witness George McLain by reference to what took place. Objection was made to only two questions, to wit: "Did you ever receive rent, before Henry Davis died, from the house, from anybody?" Answer: "From Mr. Moore." "Who was Mr. Moore?" Answer: "A real estate agent." The court ruled this competent, and we do not think it was incompetent for the witness to show that he collected rent from the house in question and paid it over to Henry Davis; and the testimony of another time during the trial showed that Moore was a real estate agent, that he collected rent for the house in question during the lifetime of Henry Davis, and paid it over to Davis. In addition, it appears from the testimony of John A. Sheorn that he was a real estate agent, and collected rents for this house from Rose Woodside, and that the rents were collected for Henry Davis, and paid over to John McLain by instructions from Davis. The witness George McLain testifies to a fact within his own knowledge that the rent was collected for Henry Davis, and that this statement was not based upon a statement made by Moore. This exception is overruled.

[2] The second exception imputes error in admitting over appellants' objection to the declarations of a stranger as to the pedigrees of Henry Davis, Eliza Villepigue, and Allen. Mary Carter did not testify as to the declarations of any other party; but her testimony was as to facts within her own knowledge, the objection was as to her testimony that she was not related to the parties, and could not testify as to family relation. The appellant has misconstrued the rules applicable to the introduction of declarations as to relationship. It is not necessary to show, that the witness testifying is related to any of the parties, whose relationship is in question. There is no authority that so holds. Any person acquainted with a family and reputation in the family can testify as to the pedigree and relationship of members of the family, and as to common rumor in the community as to this pedigree and relationship, and as to the declarations of the family as to pedigree, kinship, relationship, marriages, births, etc. The witness' testimony was as to facts known to her, and it was competent for her to testify as to her familiarity with the family and the reputation in the family in regard to the relationship in question. John Carter, who was not a relative, was permitted to testify along same line without objection, and there was no evidence on part of appellant introduced at the trial in contradiction of that introduced by respondent as to relationship. "The evidence of a witness whose knowledge with reference to the subject was derived from an intimate acquaintance with the family is admissible as to such facts of the family history as marriages, kinship, name, and death." Hoyt v. Lightbody, 98 Minn. 189, 108 N. W. 843, 116 Am. St. Rep. 358, 8 Ann. Cas. 841. "Declarations of deceased persons as to pedigree of a person with whom they were closely connected in life though not related in blood or marriage have been held competent evidence." 9 Ency. of Evidence, 742. See, also, section 991, Wigmore on Evidence, 1490.

[3] The third exception complains of error in not allowing the witness Rose Woodside to repeat the whole of the conversation with Henry Davis, when part of it was brought out by attorney for respondent on cross-examination. By reference to what took place at the time complained of, it will be seen that the counsel for respondent did not ask any question in regard to a conversation with Henry Davis, nor ask any question which would require any part of such conversation in response to the question, and any answer by her to question asked, which brought in such conversation, was not responsive to the question, and his honor had previously ruled out any conversation between this witness and Henry Davis, deceased, and properly sustained objection at this time as to any question asked witness as to conversation with the deceased Davis. This exception is overruled.

[4] The fourth exception alleges error on the part of the judge in charging the jury that Rose Woodside must have had the land for 10 full years before the date of the commencement of this action in May, 1910. This was not a charge on the facts; it simply stated a date when action was commenced, disclosed by the pleadings in the case. There was no controversy over this. "Statement of what facts are admitted or not contested is not a charge on the facts." Trapp v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 92 S. C. 218, 75 S. E. 210.

[5] The fifth exception is overruled, as the circuit judge has the right in all equity to submit issues to jury, the pleadings raise both legal and equitable issues and the legal issue as to title to land is triable by jury. McCreery & Land & Investment Co. v. Meyers, 70 S. C. 282, 49 S. E. 848; Poston v. Ingraham, 76 S. C. 167, 56 S. E. 780; section 312, Code Civ. Proc. All exceptions are overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

CARNEGIE NATURAL GAS CO. v. SWIGER et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 27, 1913.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§§ 76, 167*)—STATUTES (§§ 76, 112*)—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§§ 251, 281*)—RIGHT OF WAY FOR PIPE LINES—"DUE PROCESS."

Chapter 74, Acts 1907 (Code Supp. 1909, c. 42, §§ 18, 20), amending and re-enacting sections 18 and 20, of chapter 42, Code 1906, and providing thereby for an alternative method of condemning land or easements by pipe line companies for transporting carbon oil or natural gas, is valid, and not violative, either of section 30, art. 6 (Code 1906, p. 1x), or sections 9 and 10, art. 3, of the Constitution (Code 1906, pp. 1, 11) of this state, or of the fourteenth amendment to the federal Constitution.

2. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 191*)—RIGHT OF WAY FOR PIPE LINES—DESCRIPTION—SUFFICIENCY.

Such right of way or easement authorized when less than the fee is taken need not describe a definite width or depth, but must pursue a definite line, with courses and distances given, and have definite and fixed termini.

3. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 34*)—RIGHT OF WAY FOR PIPE LINE—PUBLIC USE.

The evidence in this case sustains the finding and judgment of the court below as to the public use of the right of way or easement proposed to be taken.

4. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 34*)—PIPE LINES—CONDEMNATION OF RIGHT OF WAY—PUBLIC USE.

Where by general law such pipe line company is authorized to take such rights of way or easements for its public service, the right of the public therein, and the reasonableness of the charges for the service, though not written in any statute or ordinance, is sufficiently protected by general law, to warrant the taking thereof for such public use.

5. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 66*)—PUBLIC SERVICE CORPORATION—DISCRETION.

Where such public service corporation is so authorized, and enters upon and assumes the duties of its public service, there is public need for rights of way and easements justifying the taking of private property therefor, and what is necessary is generally a matter within its discretion not controllable by the courts.

6. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 34*)—PIPE LINES—CONDEMNATION OF RIGHT OF WAY.

That but few persons are being served at the time such right of way or easement is proposed to be taken will not defeat the right of such company to take such right of way or easement if the real purpose is to serve the public.

7. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 66*)—PIPE LINES—CONDEMNATION OF RIGHT OF WAY—PUBLIC BENEFIT—QUESTION FOR COURT.

The question of the public need or benefit of such proposed right of way or easement is generally a question for the court and not one of fact for jury trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 165-167; Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Harrison County.

Action by the Carnegie Natural Gas Company against A. G. Swiger, the Swiger Coal Company, and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendants named bring error. Affirmed.

Charles G. Coffman, of Clarksburg, for plaintiffs in error. Hall & Hall, of New Martinsville, for defendants in error.

MILLER, J. Petitioner elected to proceed pursuant to the alternative method prescribed by section 20, c. 42, Code Suppl. 1909, chapter 74, Acts 1907, to condemn an easement or right of way less than a fee for a natural gas pipe line through defendant's lands, according to a plan attached to the bond tendered defendant showing the route of its proposed pipe line through his lands.

Failing to agree with him as to the damages, and defendant refusing to accept the bond tendered him, petitioner, after five days notice, presented the same to the Judge of the Circuit Court in vacation, as prescribed by the statute, and also its petition praying among other things that said bond be approved. Whereupon defendant appeared and demurred to the petition, which being joined in by petitioner and argued by counsel the court took time to consider, giving to petitioners, over objection by defendant, leave to file said bond and to make the same part of the record, but denying petitioner, until the further order of the court or judge, right of entry on the land.

On a later day, having considered the matters of law arising upon the prior proceedings, the judge was of opinion to approve the bond, unless within three days defendant should except to the form, amount, or surety, and file his exceptions with the clerk, and to that end continued the case to July 22, 1911, in chambers.

On the day to which the case was so adjourned defendant again appeared, and tendered and asked leave to file certain objections in writing to the proceedings, also their objection to the amount and form of the bond, none to the surety, and also some nine special pleas in writing, and an additional paper entitled plea and further exceptions to the bond and approval thereof; and also made other motions not material and which need not be considered.

At a later day the demurrer was overruled, defendant's pleas numbered 1, 2 and 3, and his so-called plea and further exceptions were filed, but pleas numbered 4 to 9, inclusive, were rejected, and issue was joined on the several pleas filed. Without passing on the exceptions to the bond the court directed the testimony to be taken on the issues presented by the pleas, and on final hearing, on September 29, 1911, pronounced the judgment now complained of, finding that petitioner had the right to condemn the right of way or easement over defendant's lands for the purposes set forth in its petition, and finding the same sufficient in all particulars, approved the bond filed, and further found, ordered and directed that petitioner had the right to and might at any time and immediately, if necessary, enter upon said easement or right of way for the purpose of constructing its pipe line as proposed in its petition, to which rulings and judgment exceptions were taken and saved on the record.

The pleas rejected so far as material are covered by those filed and there was no prejudicial error in rejecting those not filed. The issues presented by the demurrer and the several pleas and motions filed, and to which the evidence relates, will now be considered.

[1] First, it is affirmed that said chapter 74, Acts 1907, amending and re-enacting sections 18 and 20 of chapter 42, providing thereby for the alternative method of condemning land or easements by pipe line companies organized for transporting carbon oil or natural gas, is unconstitutional: (1) For infringing section 30, art. 6, of the constitution (Code 1906, p. lx), providing that "No act hereafter passed, shall embrace more than one object, and that shall be expressed in its title"; (2) for the infraction of section 39, of the same article (Code 1906, p. lxii), providing "And in no case shall a special act be passed, where a general law would be proper, and can be made applicable to the case"; (3) because violative of the due process provisions of section 10, art. 3 (Code 1906, p. li), of our constitution, and of the fourteenth amendment to the federal constitution, and (4) because it authorizes the taking of private property for public use without just compensation paid or secured to be paid, contrary to section 9, art. 3 (Code 1906, p. li), of our constitution.

On the first proposition it is contended that the object of the act is concealed in the title, and falls within the condemnation of our case of Stewart v. Tennant, 52 W. Va. 559, 572, 44 S. E. 223. The title of the act is: "An act to amend and re-enact sections eighteen and twenty of chapter forty-two of the code, relating to taking land without the owner's consent for purposes of public utility." Before the adoption of our Code of 1868, and in a proceeding begun under Code Va. 1860, and before the statute so specifically provided, the right of a pipe line company, organized for transporting carbon oil, to take land by condemnation was upheld by this court. West Va. Transp. Co. v. Vol. O. & C. Co., 5 W. Va. 382. Prior to chapter 18, Acts 1881, our statute did not as therein enumerate the public uses for which private property might be taken or damaged. Among the purposes enumerated in section 2 of that act, is, "Fifth—For companies organized for the purpose of transporting carbon oil by means of pipes or otherwise." Pipe lines for transporting natural gas are not mentioned. So far as we know there were no pipe lines then existing in this state for transporting either oil or natural gas, except the West Virginia Transportation Company, plaintiff in the case just referred to. By chapter 7,

Acts 1885, companies organized for transporting natural gas were included in said section 2, and the method of procedure prescribed for taking land for public utility was the same for all companies. The law so remained until the passage of the Act of 1907, now in question. By section 18, of said chapter 42, as thus amended, pipe line companies were included along with railroad companies, entitled to describe as to any or all of the land proposed to be taken an estate or interest therein less than a fee. And by the amendment of section 20, thereof, the alternative method of procedure for such pipe line companies was prescribed, in the three paragraphs added thereto, and which paragraphs constitute the subject of the constitutional objections already alluded to. By the first of these paragraphs it is provided that in addition to the other procedure, such company may at its election attempt to agree with the owner as to the damages, falling in which, it shall tender him a bond with sufficient surety to secure him payment of the damages, to which bond a plan showing the route of the proposed pipe line shall be attached; and upon the acceptance of this bond the right of the applicant to enter upon the enjoyment of the easement shall be complete; if the owner refuse to accept the bond it is provided that the same shall be presented to the circuit court or the judge thereof in vacation, after five days written notice to the owner stating the time and place of such proposed presentation, and which shall state that unless exceptions to the form, amount or surety of the bond be filed within three days after presentation said bond shall be approved by the court. The second of the added paragraphs provides that if no exception be filed thereto the court shall approve the bond and direct the same, with the plan attached, to be filed for the benefit of both owner and applicant; but if exception be filed the court is required to fix a day, not more than five days thereafter for the hearing thereof, and may require evidence as to the sufficiency of the sureties, and amount of the bond, and may require new surety, and a bond for a larger amount, or in a more satisfactory form, and upon the approval of the bond and filing thereof the right of the applicant to enter as aforesaid shall be complete. The third of the added paragraphs provides: "Upon petition of either the property owner or the applicant, at any time after said bond shall have been presented and filed, five disinterested freeholders shall be appointed as in this chapter provided, to serve as commissioners to ascertain what will be a just compensation to the person entitled thereto for the easement so appropriated, and thereafter the proceedings shall be in accordance with the provisions of this chapter."

The question now recurs, is the object of the act so concealed as to render it void for embracing more than one object in its title?

We think not. The only object of the amendment of said section eighteen was to classify pipe line companies along with railroads as entitled in certain cases to take "an estate or interest less than a fee." This amendment was certainly fairly covered by the title of the act. The only purpose of the amendment of section 20, evidently because the Legislature thought it expedient and proper, was to provide a more speedy and summary remedy for obtaining possession of the easement than in other cases. We see nothing in this not fairly covered by the title of the act. It is certainly comprehended in the title of the act amendatory of the general law relating to the taking of land without the owners' consent for the purpose of public utility. The only change effected is in the method of procedure and in the form of security, not in the essential rights of the owner of the land. His right of trial by jury on the question of damages, and to contest before the court the right to take the land, is fully preserved. In this case the court did not approve the bond or let the applicant into possession, until all issues on the pleas filed had been fully heard on the merits, a commendable practice when as in this case the right to take and the public purpose of the taking has been challenged by the owner of the land. Besides, everything is covered into the general law. The act involved in Stewart v. Tennant was a special act; its title was: "An Act concerning the limitation of actions in certain cases." As the court says in that case, an examination of the act shows its singleness of object, and that it is not constitutionally objectionable on that ground. The remaining question decided was, whether that object was sufficiently expressed in the title, and it was held not to be so expressed. We need not repeat here the reasonings in that case differentiating it from a case like this, involving an act amendatory of a general law, covering the whole subject of taking private property for public utility. The generality of the title of the act involved in Stewart v. Tennant distinguishes it from this case, and renders inapt as well that case as other authorities cited and relied upon by the plaintiff in error, namely, 1 Lewis' Sutherland Stat. Const. § 123; Beverly v. Wain, 57 N. J. Law, 143, 144, 30 Atl. 545; Cooley's Const. Lim. (7th Ed.) 206; Board of Supervisors v. McGruder, 84 Va. 828, 832, 6 S. E. 232; State v. Steelman, 66 N. J. Law, 518, 49 Atl. 978; 26 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 582. In the act here involved the sections of the general law so amended were inserted at large in the new act, in compliance with another provision of section 30, art. 6, of the constitution. The cases decisive of the real question here presented are Heath v. Johnson, 36 W. Va. 782, 15 S. E. 980, and Roby v. Sheppard, 42 W. Va. 286, 26 S. E. 278. In Heath v. Johnson, the act involved was entitled "An Act to amend, 'An Act to amend and re-enact section 58 of chapter 45 of the Code of West Virginia.' That act was objected to as violative of article 6 of the constitution. This court said in that case: "We do not think this objection to the law is sound. The provision cited seems to refer rather to original acts than to those which are only amendatory; but, supposing it to apply to the latter, when the amendment in its title points not only to the chapter which is to be amended, but to the very section, it seems to us to amount to a sufficient expression of the object of the law to prevent any of the evils which the constitutional provision was intended to remedy." The first point of the syllabus in that case is: "When the title of an original act of the legislature sufficiently expresses its object in the manner required by the constitution, an act amendatory thereof may, by its title, simply refer to the section of the original act which it is intended to amend, and this will be a sufficient compliance with section 30 of article 6 of the constitution." Roby v. Sheppard is equally in point, as points 2 and 3 of the syllabus, and the reasons of the court, 42 W. Va. at pages 289-292, inclusive, 26 S. E. 278, will show. See, also, 12 Ency. Dig. Va. & W. Va. Rep. 777.

The next question is does the amending act of 1907 violate section 39, art. 6, of the constitution, prohibiting special legislation where a general law would be proper? It seems almost a waste of time to reply to this proposition in view of what has been said on the first. It is contended, however, that as the amendments affected only pipe line companies transporting oil and natural gas, their effect was to single out that class of corporations and legislate specially with reference to them, and to bring the act within the inhibition of the constitution. To support this proposition counsel cite and rely on State v. Cooley, 56 Minn. 540, 58 N. W. 150; 1 Lewis' Sutherland Stat. Const. 149, 353; In re Church, 92 N. Y. 1; Wheeler v. Philadelphia, 77 Pa. 338, 348; Wallis v. Williams, 101 Tex. 395, 108 S. W. 153; Palcher v. U. S. (C. C.) 11 Fed. 47; Ex parte Westerfield, 55 Cal. 550, 38 Am. Rep. 47; Groves v. County Court, 42 W. Va. 596, 26 S. E. 460; McEldowney v. Wyatt, 44 W. Va. 711, 30 S. E. 239, 45 L. R. A. 609; Violett v. Alexandria, 92 Va. 561, 23 S. E. 909, 31 L. R. A. 382, 53 Am. St. Rep. 825; Cooley's Prin. Const. Law, 241, 243, 244; Cooley's Const. Lim. 502; Hagar v. Reclamation Dist., 111 U. S. 701, 4 Sup. Ct. 663, 28 L. Ed. 539. We think these authorities quite inapt to support the proposition. All pipe line companies carrying oil and gas as a class are included in the provisions of the statute. The statute is but an amendment of the general law, which itself covers all classes of corporations given the right of eminent domain, none are excepted. The procedure for obtaining the land or easements thereon is the same, except that pipe line companies, if they so elect, may give the bond prescribed and if accepted by the owner, or if not, approved by the court, they may enter immediately. There was good reason in the mind of the legislature no doubt for this provision, to meet exigencies and conditions peculiar to that class of public service corporations. Can it be rightfully said that such an amendment of the general law amounts to a segregation of individuals or corporations from a class to which they properly belong, so as to bring it within the constitutional mandate? We think not. An examination of the authorities cited will show we think that they relate to special statutes, applicable to particular persons, less than a class. There is no more reason for saying that the act in question is special legislation, because it provides for an alternative method of procedure for pipe line companies in section 20, than for saying that section 18, before the amendment, was special legislation, because with respect to railroads it provided that they might take an estate or interest therein less than a fee. The general law before the amendment put corporations given the power of eminent domain into several classes. Pipe line companies for carrying oil and gas were put into a class by themselves. The special provisions of the statute as amended, objected to, cover all corporations of this class. State v. Cooley, relied on, says: "A law is general, in the constitutional sense, which applies to and operates uniformly upon all members of any class of persons; * * * while a special law is one which relates and applies to particular members of a class." Substantially the same definition is given in some of the other authorities cited. In the California case a statute which prohibited baking on Sunday was held unconstitutional, because it picked out the baking business only, making it class legislation, when the law would have been as applicable to all other traders as to it. Our cases of Groves v. County Court and McEldowney v. Wyatt are equally inapt. The first says: "Special laws are those made for individual cases, or for less than a class requiring laws appropriate to its peculiar condition and circumstances." McEldowney v. Wyatt says: "A statute relating to persons or things as a class is a general law; one relating to particular persons or things of a class is special." In our opinion the act involved is not special legislation.

Next, is the statute violative of the due process provisions of our constitution and of the federal constitution? Clearly not. Notwithstanding the provision for giving bond to make entry on the land the applicant is not permitted, without acceptance by the owner, or upon due notice to him and approval by a court having jurisdiction, to put a single foot upon the land sought to be taken; and if, as in this case, any question is made as to the right of the applicant to take, or the public purpose for which he proposes to take the land, is made, these questions will properly be tested by the court before approval of bond or right of entry become complete. Besides, would not injunction lie under the provisions of section 20, to protect the owner? Due process does not necessarily mean process of a court. "All that is essential is that in some appropriate way, before some properly constituted tribunal, inquiry shall be made as to the amount of compensation; and when this is provided for there is that due process of law which is required." Brannon on the Fourteenth Amendment, 467. The authorities cited by counsel for plaintiff in error are equally decisive of this proposition. Our decisions say: "Due process of law means, as used in said section, in the due course of legal proceedings according to those rules and forms, which have been established for the protection of private rights, securing to every person a judicial trial before he can be deprived of life, liberty or property." Pearce v. Kitzmiller, 19 W. Va. 564; White v. Crump, 19 W. Va. 583; Williams v. Freeland, 19 W. Va. 599; Griffes v. Halstead, 19 W. Va. 602; Pearce v. Adamson, 20 W. Va. 57; State v. Sponaugle, 45 W. Va. 415, 32 S. E. 283, 43 L. R. A. 727. That the statute in question by proper proceedings fully protects the rights of the owner not only appears from its provisions, but has complete demonstration in the present proceeding taken under it. Defendant has been permitted to make every defense and oppose every legal obstacle in the way which could possibly be afforded him. Why, therefore, should we dwell further on this proposition?

The next constitutional argument is based on section 9, art. 3, of our constitution, against the taking of private property without just compensation paid, or secured to be paid. It is contended that the provision of section 20, relating to the giving of bond does not satisfy the requirements of the constitution, "paid, or secured to be paid." Certainly a bond, if good in form, sufficient in amount and with sufficient surety, would satisfy the requirement "secured to be paid." But it is insisted that the land itself should be made the primary security, and title and the right reserved. This would not always furnish the best security for the liberal findings of commissioners and juries in such cases. The bond provided is to serve in case the owner and applicant are unable to agree. If the bond is deficient in form, amount, or surety, ample provision is made in the statute for correcting these defects. It is furthermore insisted that the bond should not be approved or entry made until the damages have been assessed by commissioners or jury. In the early Virginia case of Tuckahoe Canal Co. v. Tuckahoe & James River R. R. Co., 11 Leigh, Anno. 552, 36 Am. Dec. 374, a general statute, passed at the session of 1836-37, gave similar rights to railroad companies to enter upon land before condemnation and assessment of damages, and providing for injunction against the owner from interference, except in certain cases. This statute was upheld by the Virginia court. This case is cited in Spencer v. Point Pleasant & Ohio R. R. Co., 23 W. Va. 406. Speaking of the constitution and with reference to the statute there involved, providing that after the damages should be assessed, the condemning railroad might be enjoined from the use of the right of way until the damages assessed should be fully paid, the court by Judge Green says, 23 W. Va. at page 412: "Indeed, had the Legislature gone still further and permitted a railroad company to take possession of the land it wanted to condemn, when it first instituted its proceedings to condemn the land, before even the appointment of commissioners, without paying anything to the owner on simply giving a bond, with approved security, to pay the just compensation when ascertained, it would in so doing be complying with the words of our Constitution." True he adds: "But it does seem to me that it would be violating its spirit, if the spirit of this constitutional provision is correctly set forth by Chancellor Kent in the quotation which we have made from him, and I think that the real spirit of it is correctly stated by him." This expression is obiter. Chancellor Kent was apparently speaking of constitutional provisions limited to language like the first clause of our section 9, art. 8, providing that "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use, without just compensation." But with reference to the taking of such property for the purpose of internal improvements, the language of the next provision is "until just compensation shall have been paid, or secured to be paid." The expression "secured to be paid" must be construed according to the plain import of the words, unless a different meaning clearly appears from the context. A pipe line for transporting natural gas for the public use is an "internal improvement" within the meaning of our constitution. West Va. Transp. Co. v. Vol. O. & C. Co., supra, 5 W. Va. page 388. That a statute like the one in question here is not objectionable on constitutional grounds is clear from Tuckahoe Canal Co. v. Tuckahoe & James River R. R. Co., supra. Judge Tucker (11 Leigh [Va.] at page 80, 36 Am. Dec. 374) says: "It seemed to be considered by the counsel, that the condemnation must precede the execution of the work. This is, I conceive, a misconception of the law. The company have a right to proceed with their work before condemnation; and, indeed, there is no absolute obligation on them, to institute the process for assessing the damages to the land, since in case of their default the owner himself may do so. It is, therefore, clear that the work is not to be suspended until the damages are assessed and paid; and this is rendered more undeniable by the 13th section, which in connexion with the previous sections provides, that 'in the mean time' (that is, while the process of valuation or assessment is going on) 'no injunction shall be awarded to stay the proceedings of the company in the prosecution of their works, unless,' &c. It was not then necessary, that the damages should have been assessed and paid before the company proceeded to the erection of their bridges." In Old Colony R. Co. v. Framingham Water Co., 153 Mass. 561, 27 N. E. 662, 13 L. R. A. 332, it was held that the provision for compensation for land taken by water companies, precisely the same as the public statute relating to railroad companies, except that the selectmen of the town were thereby made the tribunal to determine the sufficiency of the security instead of the county commissioners, was held to be sufficient, and not violative of the constitution. That provision of the statute was that the water company might, "upon application by either party, require the Company to give security to the selectmen of said town for payment of all damages that may be awarded to them; and if, upon petition of the owner, the security appears to the selectmen to have become insufficient, they shall require the giving of further security." The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in Wallace v. Railroad Co., 138 Pa. 168, 22 Atl. 95, construing a statute from which the provisions of our act now under consideration were evidently taken, held, that after a bond had been taken with security approved a bill in equity would not lie against a railroad company to restrain the completion of the railroad, on the ground that both the railroad company and sureties had become insolvent. And speaking of the term security in the constitution of that state, that court says: "The only reasonable, and therefore the true construction of the word 'secured' in the constitution, is that it shall be made reasonably safe or sure that the owner of the property taken shall be able to collect the compensation for it, and the words 'sufficient sureties' in the act, must be construed to mean such sureties as at the time they are taken make it reasonably certain that the owner of the property taken can collect from them a just compensation." According to these authorities there can be no question that the bond provided for in the statute fully answers the requirement of the constitution "secured to be paid."

[2] The next point of error urged, is that the easement or right of way proposed is without width or depth or definite description. The plan attached to the bond shows the outside boundaries of defendant's land, and fixes the right of way or easement proposed to be taken through the same by reference to a distinct line of survey, with definite termini and definite and distinct courses and distances, so that there can be no doubt or controversy as to the true location of the line of the proposed right of way or easement. The petition filed by the applicant even more definitely describes this line, and alleges that the only pipe line which petitioner proposes to lay upon said route will be six inches in diameter and will be used exclusively for the transportation of natural gas. The application we think conforms strictly to the letter as well as the spirit of the statute. The plan required by the statute is one "showing the route of the proposed pipe line over said land." The plan attached to the bond in this case does that. Can more be required? We think not. The petition says the pipes will be buried under the surface of the ground to such a depth as not to interfere with the use of the land for agricultural purposes. True the application calls for no specific width, but the proposal is for a mere right of way or easement to bury a six inch pipe line upon defendant's land and maintain it there. When so buried the surface will be subject to use and occupation by the owner, except in so far as such use and occupation may interfere with petitioner's right to install and maintain the pipe line in place. After installation all that a right of way or easement of this character would call for would be right of entry and of ingress and egress to keep the line in repair. Unless a definite width should be actually taken to the exclusion of the owner of the fee, which would be unduly burdensome on both applicant and owner, no definite width could be accurately described. But it is argued that without width and depth it will be impossible to determine the damages. We think there is no difficulty confronting commissioners or juries on this score. The character of the entry and of the use and occupation of land for an easement or right of way of this character is so well understood in the country these days that we think a jury would find little difficulty, certainly not more so than in other cases, in reaching a proper estimate of the damages; not only this, but the jury could and would be enlightened by evidence on the question, and thereafter the owner of the right of way or easement would always be confined to a reasonable use, and liable to damages for abuse of his right. We think the statute clearly contemplates the taking of such a right of way or easement. Our case of Crosier v. Brown, 66 W. Va. 273, 66 S. E. 326, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 174, says in the first point of the syllabus, that "An easement of private way over land must have a particular definite line." That case related to a private way over another's land. It had no particular width or depth. In Lovett v. Gas Co., 65 W. Va. 739, 65 S. E. 196, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 230, the gas company it seems had condemned strips eighteen inches wide through two tracts of land, which of course might be done, but every one knows that eighteen inches would not be sufficient for ingress and egress in the work of laying and maintaining such a pipe line. The question which we have here, however, was not decided in that case. In Gas Transportation Co. v. Wilson, 70 W. Va. 157, 73 S. E. 306, the proposition was apparently the same as in this case, to take a mere right of way or easement less than a fee over defendant's land. The only question decided there, which can have any application here, was, that in such cases the landowner is entitled to damages not alone for the estate or interest actually taken but also damages to the residue, the fee in the whole tract, including therein the fee in that part of the tract covered by such right of way. We are of opinion to overrule this point of error.

[3] The next point is that the public use of the proposed right of way or easement is not sufficiently shown to warrant the judgment complained of. This question is raised by the demurrer, by the pleas filed, as well as by some of those rejected. The cases relied upon in support of this proposition are: Salt Co. v. Brown, 7 W. Va. 198; B. & O. R. Co. v. P. W. & Ky. R. R. Co., 17 W. Va. 812; Varner v. Martin, 21 W. Va. 534; Railroad Co. v. Iron Works, 31 W. Va. 710, 8 S. E. 453; Cemetery Association v. Redd, 33 W. Va. 262, 10 S. E. 405; Fallsburg Co. v. Alexander, 101 Va. 98, 43 S. E. 194, 61 L. R. A. 129, 99 Am. St. Rep. 855; Charleston Gas Co. v. Lowe, 52 W. Va. 662, 44 S. E. 410; Railroad Co. v. Coal Co., 62 W. Va. 185, 57 S. E. 401. In substance it is said of them that they affirm the following propositions: (1) That the use which the public is to have of the property taken must be fixed and definite, and on terms and charges fixed by law; (2) that such public use must be a substantial beneficial one, obviously needful for the public, which it cannot do without, except by suffering great loss or inconvenience; (3) that the necessity for condemnation must be apparent and that the public need must be an imperious one. These propositions are drawn mainly from the language of Judge Green in Varner v. Martin, supra. That case involved the constitutionality of an act of the Legislature giving right to take the land of another for a private way. The questions involved were rather legislative than judicial. The propositions were correctly applied in that case. True it is, however, that courts may generally inquire into the question whether the property proposed to be taken is for a public use, even though the condemnor be of a class of persons or corporations authorized to take land for public use. The court below properly exercised this jurisdiction in this case. It permitted issues to be made up to try this question, and by finding and adjudging that the petitioner had the right to take the property by condemnation, it necessarily decided that the use to which the right of way or easement proposed to be taken was to be devoted was a public use, giving the right to take. We do not propose to enter upon any lengthy discussion or review of the prior decisions of the court.

[4] On the first proposition, that the public use must be fixed and definite, and on terms and charges fixed by law, we observe first, that the legislature by general law has conferred upon pipe line companies, organized for transporting oil and natural gas, the right of eminent domain, and has thereby necessarily imposed upon them, as public service corporations the right and duty of performing a public service. That right and duty is fixed as firmly as if written into the statute. Pipe lines for transporting oil must carry oil, as railroads must carry passengers and freight, at reasonable rates, if such rates are not fixed by statute. Pipe line companies organized for transporting gas must serve the people with gas, under reasonable and proper regulations, along the entire line traversed, and for reasonable rates fixed by themselves, or by statute, or by contracts or ordinances of municipalities. Are not the rights of the public so fixed sufficiently definite to answer the requirements of the law? We think so. The rights of the people are thus protected in nearly every case where the public is served by public service corporations, furnishing water, gas, electricity, or transportation. Charleston Gas Co. v. Lowe, supra, and Pittsburg Hydro-Electric Co. v. Liston, 70 W. Va. 83, 73 S. E. 86, 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 602, recent decisions of this court support these conclusions. Calor Oil & Gas Co. v. Franzell, 128 Ky. 715, 109 S. W. 328, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 456, as well as Olmsted v. Proprietors of the Morris Aqueduct, 47 N. J. Law, 311, are likewise in point. So also are the cases of Gibbs v. Balt. Gas Co., 130 U. S. 396, 9 Sup. Ct. 553, 32 L. Ed. 979; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 133, 24 L. Ed. 77.

[5] On the question of the public necessity for the use of the property, covered by the last two propositions relied on, it may be said generally, that when a public service corporation is organized to serve the public it assumes the duties and responsibilities incident to that service and imposed upon it by law. If such corporation be a pipe line company to transport or serve the public with gas, it must of necessity have land or rights of way from the source of supply to the places of consumption. It is unnecessary to argue at this day that natural gas for light, heat and power is of great public utility, and if the public is served there is imperious demand for rights of way or easements in that service. Where a public service corporation has a public duty to perform what is necessary in the way of easements and other means of performing this service is largely a matter within its discretion. It is so with railroad companies, and we see no reason why the same rule should not apply to pipe line companies transporting gas. When the legislature clothed this class of companies with the power of eminent domain we must assume that it understood the nature of the public service to be performed, and determined that there was sufficient public necessity therefor. Want of general public necessity was urged in Hydro-Electric Co. v. Liston, supra, and the question was there met on the authority of Lewis on Eminent Domain, by the proposition, that the question was not a judicial but a legislative one; that whether necessity for taking the land exists in favor of the condemnor is largely a matter for its own determination.

[6] But it is argued that but few persons are or will be served in West Virginia by the proposed pipe line; that most of the gas is and will be transported into Pennsylvania; that the petitioner is a corporation under the laws of Pennsylvania, and that its principal business is to produce gas and transport it into that state, and that the sovereign right of eminent domain is properly limited to the service of the people of the state where the power is invoked. While the petitioner is a foreign corporation it avers and proves its authority to do business in this state. Having obtained authority to do business here, section 30, chapter 54, Code 1906, confers upon it the same rights, powers and privileges, and imposes upon it the same duties and liabilities, and subjects it to the same rules and regulations as domestic corporations. Floyd v. Loan & Investment Co., 49 W. Va. 327, 38 S. E. 653, 54 L. R. A. 536, 87 Am. St. Rep. 805. Section 24, chapter 52, of the Code, provides that, "Such company shall, for the purpose of transporting natural gas, oils and water, be considered and held to be a common carrier, and subject to all the duties and liabilities of such carriers under the laws of this state." The petition avers and the evidence shows that petitioner is serving many persons in this state with gas. True, but few at present are being served by the particular line in question, but it avers and proves its willingness to serve all persons applying, subject to its proper rules and regulations. It avers and proves that it has fixed reasonable prices and rates for such service. If the petitioner is serving the people of West Virginia with gas, and all who apply, as it avers and proves, it cannot be denied the right of eminent domain because it serves the people in another state into which its pipe lines go. There is not a particle of evidence in the case showing or tending to show that petitioner has ever neglected its duty toward the people of this state. That but few are shown to be taking gas from the particular line sought to be extended through defendant's land is of little consequence. The petitioner is seeking business. Practically the same objections were interposed to the rights of the petitioner in Hydro-Electric Co. v. Liston, and were met in the same way that we have met them here.

[7] Lastly, it is urged that it was error to deny the defendant the right of trial by jury, on the question of the public need or benefit of the proposed pipe line. This the authorities hold is a judicial question, and not one of fact to be tried by a jury. Hydro-Electric Co. v. Liston, supra; Sisson v. Buena Vista County, 128 Iowa, 442, 104 N. W. 454, 70 L. R. A. 440.

The foregoing conclusions lead to an affirmation of the judgment, and this will be the mandate of the court.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. June 17, 1913.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 113*) — NOTICE TO OWNER—PAYMENT TO PRINCIPAL CONTRACTOR.

The present mechanics' lien law, Code 1906, ch. 75, gives right of direct lien to one performing labor or furnishing material under a contract with the principal contractor or his subcontractor, and no notice to the owner in advance of the performance of labor or furnishing of material is necessary to a protection of the right as against payments by the owner to the principal contractor.

2. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 115*)—PAYMENT TO PRINCIPAL CONTRACTOR—DEFECTS.

Under the mechanics' lien law (Code 1906, ch. 75), payment by the owner to the principal contractor of a part or all of the contract price constitutes no defense against a lien the right to which exists or is incipient by the performance of labor or the furnishing of material prior to the payment.

3. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 100*) — PRINCIPAL CONTRACTOR — EFFECT — RECORDED CONTRACT.

By recording the contract with the principal contractor pursuant to Code 1906, chapter 75, section 5, the owner may limit his liabilities under the contract so that the amounts to be paid by him shall not exceed in the aggregate the contract price, and such amounts may include any payment, pursuant to the contract, made by the owner to the contractor when no incipient or perfected right to lien exists for labor performed or material furnished before the payment.

4. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 100*) — RECORDING OF CONTRACT — NOTICE TO LABORERS AND MATERIALMEN.

When the contract between the owner and the contractor is recorded, one proposing to perform labor or to furnish material under a contract with the principal contractor or his subcontractor, must take notice of the times of payment of the contract price provided for therein; and any payment made according to the terms of the recorded contract before the beginning of the performance of labor or the furnishing of material will limit a lien for Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Action by Creed Collins and others against Board of Trustees of Davis and Elkins College and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant College appeals. Modified and affirmed.

E. A. Bowers, of Elkins, and Price, Smith, Spilman & Clay, of Charleston, for appellant. W. B. Maxwell, D. H. Hill Arnold, and Talbott & Hoover, all of Elkins, for appellees.

ROBINSON, J. The decree sought to be reversed by this appeal subjects to sale the building and grounds of the Davis and Elkins College for the satisfaction of mechanics' liens.

The Board of Trustees contracted with Hobbs & Co. for the erection of the college building at the price of $47,378. The contractors so far proceeded with their undertaking that approximately $40,000 of the contract price was paid them under monthly estimates of the architect, as provided in the contract. Then, insolvency of the contractors intervened, and by proceedings in the Federal Court they were involuntarily declared bankrupts. In the bankruptcy proceedings, receivers appointed for the bankrupt contractors were directed to complete the building. The remainder of the contract price in the hands of the Board of Trustees, approximately $7,000, was taken over by the bankruptcy court and applied toward the completion of the contract by the receivers. When the building was completed a considerable sum remained as assets of the bankrupts and was applied as such in the bankruptcy proceedings. Thus, it will be observed, about $40,000 of the contract price was voluntarily paid by the owner to the contractors, and the residue was paid out by the owner under the order of the bankruptcy court.

Because of the insolvency of the contractors, many liens under Code 1906, chapter 75, section 3, were asserted against the property for labor performed and material furnished prior to the bankruptcy. It seems that the claims of the direct laborers were satisfied by orders and disbursements made in the bankruptcy court. The suit which we have before us involves the enforcement of liens claimed by material men and subcontractors of specific portions of the work. It is of course a proceeding under the statute, directed against the property, while the bankruptcy case had only to do with the residue of the contract price as assets of the bankrupt contractors.

Upon the report of a commissioner a number of liens have been decreed against the property, amounting in the aggregate to nearly $15,000. Appellant, the Board of Trustees, mainly insists that the property is not at all subject to any of these claims. Specific exceptions to certain of the claims decreed as liens are also assigned.

The main contention that the property is not at all subject to the claims that have been decreed as liens against it is based on the fact that all of the contract price was paid out by the owner. It is submitted that since about $40,000 of the contract price had been paid to the contractors before the claims were asserted as liens, and since the residue was paid on the contract by order of the bankruptcy court, there is no liability against the property under the statute giving liens to mechanics, laborers, and others. In other words, it is insisted that when the contract between the owner and the contractor is recorded, the owner may pay out the contract price pursuant to the terms of the contract without liability for the claims of those who have performed labor or furnished material for the building, as long as the owner is given no notice that such claimants will look to the property for the payment of their claims. Under the present mechanics' lien law, that enacted by the Legislature of 1891 and slightly amended in 1903, all of which is contained in Code 1906, chapter 75, we can not sanction this contention.

[8] That for which appellant contends was our law of mechanics' liens prior to our present law. It was the law as contained in Code 1887, chapter 75. Perhaps it was the better law; but as judges we have no province to say that it was, or to adopt it for that reason. Moreover, it may be that we should return to the principles of the enactment contained in Code 1887, chapter 75; but it is for the Legislature and not for this court to say that we shall. We must apply legislative enactments as we find them, though their policy or effect may be subject to sound criticism.

It will be necessary to define in a general way the meaning of the provisions of the present mechanics' lien law in relation to the rights of those performing labor or furnishing material under a contract with the principal contractor, since appellant contends for a construction widely at variance with that which we must announce.

By our former statute it indeed was provided that a mechanics' lien only affected what had not been paid by the owner to the contractor at the time the notice of the claim of lien was given, unless the person claiming had given notice to the owner before doing work or furnishing material that he would look to the owner for payment. No such provision is made by the present statute. The present law does provide, in section 3, for the claimant's notice to the owner before doing work or furnishing material, but that is clearly in another connection and for a wholly different purpose. We shall see that a very different scheme of the limiting of the owner's liability is embodied in the present statute, as compared with that contained in the former law.

[1] The present statute gives a direct lien to one performing labor or furnishing material under a contract with the principal contractor or his subcontractor. To that extent it embodies the so-called Pennsylvania system as contradistinguished from the New York system which was the basis of the former statute contained in Code 1887, ch. 75. Phillips on Mechanics' Liens, sec. 57; Boisot on Mechanics' Liens, sec. 225; 27 Cyc. 89; Hunter v. Truckee Lodge, 14 Nev. 24. But in construing the present statute, section 3, which gives this direct lien, must be read in connection with section 5, whereby the owner may limit his liabilities by recording his contract with the principal contractor.

[2, 3] Section 5 provides that "no payment by the owner or his agent, to a contractor, shall effect or impair the lien of a laborer, or material man, provided for in section three." But this provision is immediately followed by these words: "But such owner may limit his liabilities so that the amounts to be paid by him shall not exceed in the aggregate, the price stipulated in the said contracts between himself and the contractor, by having the said contract, or so much thereof, as shows the contract price, and the times of its payment, recorded in the office of the clerk of the county court of the county, where such house or other structure is situated, prior to the performance of the labor and the furnishing of the material, or the machinery for the same." Here we have that which gives the owner right to limit his liabilities under the contract. It does not define the liabilities as being merely those arising from liens. It is broad enough to take in any other liability under the contract. The provision, however, must be taken in relation to the preceding one that says no payment shall affect or impair any lien. Both provisions must be given effect. Taken together, they plainly say that though no payment by the owner to the contractor may affect or impair a lien, still the owner may record the building contract and thereby limit his liabilities under it, so that the amounts to be paid by him shall not in the aggregate exceed the contract price.

Now, the act says that the recording of the contract shall operate to confine the "amounts to be paid" by the owner to the contract price. What amounts? We must say all amounts that are properly payable under the contract, whether they are payable by its terms or by the law in relation to liabilities for liens. The recordation must not only show the contract price but "the times of its payment." Why give notice of the times of payment? Surely this must be for the purpose of notifying those about to perform labor or furnish material that part of the contract price may have theretofore been paid by the owner so that a lien for labor thereafter performed or material thereafter furnished will not affect the full contract price. It is plainly implied that if the contract is recorded, payments to the contractor according to the terms of the contract may sometimes safely be made by the owner. But we have seen that they can not be made to the impairment of liens. In view of the words of both of the provisions, we must hold that the first provision means that payments under the terms of the recorded contract can not be made to the impairment of liens that exist or have incipiently set in by virtue of section 3 when the payment under the contract becomes due. Suppose, however, that no liens have attached when a payment under the contract becomes due—that all labor or material has been paid for in cash by the contractor to that time. Or, suppose that the contractor has obtained waiver of all liens that have set in to that time. The payment can then be made without affecting any lien, if the contract is recorded. It is then an 'amount to be paid' under the contract that is protected by the recording. It is a liability then due, because no liens have set in. The contract demands that the owner pay it to the contractor and the law does not forbid, since payment will not affect any existing right to lien. It is one of "the amounts to be paid by him," in the language of the act. When paid, it counts on the limit of liabilities. Liens thereafter attaching are limited by such payment. And it is for this reason that the recordation must show the times of the payment. When one is about to perform labor or to furnish material, he has notice by the recorded contract that payments may have been made and his right to lien thereby cut down or limited to the residue of the contract price. The laborer or material man, before performing or furnishing, must take notice of the times of payment mentioned in the contract, whenever that contract is recorded. What other purpose could there be for the requirement that the recording shall show the times of payment?

We hold, therefore, that the owner must take notice of all liens under section 3 that have set in when a payment to the contractor becomes due; that he can at no time make a payment under the contract to the impairment of a lien that may be perfected and relate back under section 3 to a time prior to the proposed payment, on account of labor performed or material furnished before that time. But we also hold that the laborer or material man must likewise take notice of all payments that have become due and may have been paid under the terms of the contract prior to the beginning of the performance of labor or the furnishing of material by him.

We do not overlook the fact that under section 3 the right to lien begins to run when any labor is performed or material furnished, and that the incipient right continues on down during the performance and furnishing and even for thirty-five days thereafter. Let it be distinctly noted that we hold that after such lien right begins to run, the owner can not pay to the contractor even at the times mentioned in the recorded contract without still being liable to the laborer or material man. But where a payment at a time and in the amount mentioned in the contract can be made without interference of liens, or where it can be made by the contractor's clearing up all lien liabilities to the date of the same, it may be made by the owner and thereafter his liability for liens is reduced accordingly.

[4] When the contract is recorded, the amount of the contract price is, in a sense, a fund for the payment of liens given by section 3, for which fund the property may be resorted to, but the evident meaning of section 5 is that the fund may be reduced by payments made in accordance with the recorded contract, as to those who do not begin to perform labor or furnish material until after those payments are made. This provision works no injustice to laborers or material men. They may observe by the recorded contract when payments by the owner to the contractor may be made thereunder. They may ascertain what amount of the contract price is still in the hands of the owner before they begin to perform labor or to furnish material, and may refuse to extend credit to the contractor if they deem their right to lien security insufficient. They may in advance of giving their labor or material observe that by this limiting statute the fund has been so far paid to the contractor that it would be unsafe for them to extend credit because of the limited amount remaining, or because of many liens to which the remaining amount may be subject. On the other hand to hold, indeed in the face of the plain import of the provision for limiting liabilities, that the owner can not make a payment to the contractor without taking the risk of liens that may begin to set in long after the payment is due under the contract, is virtually to hold that the owner for his own protection must hold all the contract price in his hands until all work under the contract is finished, so as to be able to pay out prorately the amount in case mechanics' liens taken in the end should exceed it. Such a holding would be onerous on both contractor and owner. It would annihilate the contract between them as to the times of payment. If the contractor did not have independent means to carry on the work, it would readily cause him to fall in the execution of the contract, and would most frequently cause the owner the annoyance of liens on his property and the task of clearing them therefrom. It was certainly not so intended. The construction we give is the one justified by the spirit and purpose of the law, as well as by the letter of the law. It does no more than to enjoin on the contractor the payment of all bills for labor and material of every kind that have accrued to the date of the payment provided for in the contract, and the securing of waivers of liens therefor, before the owner can pay him according to the provisions of the contract. How well do we all know that the fulfillment of this injunction by the contractor always proves beneficial to himself as well as to the owner.

It is only when the contract is not recorded that the right to liens given by section 3 to those performing labor or furnishing material under a contract with the principal contractor or his subcontractor, has full sway. The alternative provision immediately following the provision for recording the contract makes this clear. When, however, the contract is recorded, the limitations by the statute on the right to liens under section 3 are such as to modify materially that right, as we have shown.

While it appears in the case under consideration that all of the contract price was paid by the owner to the contractors, the latter part thereof by the judgment of the bankruptcy court, still no case is pleaded or proved that brings appellant within any saving of the statute in relation to the limiting of liabilities under the building contract by the recording thereof. Though we consider the contract a recorded one, still appellant has made no showing that any payment of the contract price by the owner limited its liabilities thereunder in any way. The contract calls for monthly payments by the owner to the contractor in no specific amounts, but only for monthly payments of ninety per cent of the estimated work done at the time of each payment. It is not shown when the work was begun so that we may fix the dates when the monthly payments became due, nor is it shown what the date and amount of each payment was. Therefore, we can not see that any payment under the contract was made so as to be out from under liens claimed, or so as to limit the liens to any particular part of the fund. The burden was on appellant to show that its liabilities for liens was limited. As far as we can see from the record, none of the liens proved, reported, and decreed were limited by any of the payments which appellant made to the contractors. Indeed, from the record generally it would seem that all the payments, other than the one under the order of the bankruptcy court, were made regardless of the liens claimed. If appellant could have proved otherwise, it should have done so before submitting its case for final determination.

[6] The contract between the owner and the contractors involved in this case was recorded without having been acknowledged or proved by witnesses. The question whether it is a recorded contract in contemplation of the statute is raised and argued. We need not say, in view of our finding that no case of a limiting of liabilities is made, even if the contract was properly recorded. The aggregate of the liens claimed and involved in this case, about $15,000, is far under the $40,000 of the contract price paid by the owner to the contractors. The question of recording, therefore, becomes an immaterial one.

[6] It is submitted as to several of the liens decreed that they are not valid because claimed by parties to whom the contractors sublet portions of the work. It is said that a subcontractor of this character is not given a lien by the statute. We interpret the statute otherwise. Section 3 gives the right of lien to "every material man, workman, laborer, mechanic or other person, performing any labor or furnishing any material or machinery, under a contract with a principal contractor or his subcontractor." This is a broad provision. It surely gives right of lien to any one performing a portion of the work and furnishing material therefor under any kind of subcontract. All those mentioned are indeed subcontractors. The statute does not undertake to make distinction between them based on the kind of subcontract they fulfill. Nor shall we undertake to do so. The statute even allows those contracting with a subcontractor to take a lien. Shall we cut out the intermediate man? Note that it says, "or other person, performing any labor or furnishing any material or machinery, under contract with the principal contractor." That is, "any person who performs any labor or furnishes any material under a contract with the principal contractor." Is not one who erects the foundation or a porch under a contract with the principal contractor within this clause? Does he not perform labor and furnish material under his contract with the principal contractor? Does the statute make any distinction between this sort of subcontractor and one who performs a day's labor or furnishes a single plank? Plainly, the only test is that of a contract with the principal contractor. Such a contract makes one a subcontractor. Though the subcontract may be of the character that the subcontractor does not himself personally perform the labor or furnish the material, he is still one "performing labor and furnishing material." "Under statutes providing for liens in favor of persons who 'perform' labor, the better doctrine is that one who furnishes the labor of his employés, such as a contractor, is to be considered as performing labor." 20 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 340. The distinction sought to be made is not justified by the plain language of the statute. Moreover, it is too refined to be practical. Indeed, it is apparent that the plain import of sections three and five is to protect all persons who put labor or material into a building under contract with the principal contractor or his subcontractor, and though in different connections in these sections different terms are employed to designate such persons, the terms should be considered as used interchangeably and as referring to this same class of persons.

[7] It is suggested in appellant's brief that the question of the liability of the property for the liens claimed against the same in this suit is res judicata—that the bankruptcy court decided that which we are called upon to decide. This point is not sustained by the record. Indeed res judicata is not pleaded or presented by the record in any way. Of the orders and judgments of the bankruptcy court the record shows only that the contractors were declared bankrupts and that the residue of the contract price was expended under the order of that court. Such action by the bankruptcy court affects no question in this suit. We are cited to the published opinion of the court in the bankruptcy case. That alone will not do for a showing of res judicata. It appears from the opinion that the case involved only ascertainment of the assets of the bankrupts and ascertainment of the debts to which those assets were liable. For the purposes of that case all the mechanics' liens involved here, but one, were upheld as valid against the assets of the bankrupts. However, the case in bankruptcy did not and could not involve the question whether the property of appellant was liable for these mechanics' liens. Appellant was not the bankrupt, nor could these liens be there adjudicated as against its property.

The exception to the lien decreed Hanley, based on the fact that he was one of the bondsmen of the contractors, is not well taken. It suffices to say that no case was pleaded, or otherwise made out, calling for an adjustment of liabilities between Hanley and appellant.

Lyon, who was a subcontractor for the plumbing work, finished his contract under the receivers. It is contended that he lost his right to lien because he did not assert his claim by notice to the owner within thirty-five days after ceasing to perform labor and furnish material for Hobbs & Co. He gave the notice within the statutory time after ceasing work under the receivers. Was he working under the same contract? If so, he could claim the lien within thirty-five days after finishing it. He testifies that he proceeded under the old contract; the receiver who negotiated with him in the matter testifies that he made a new and independent contract with him. Thus the evidence is in direct conflict. We give weight to some considerations which tend to show that Lyon was merely completing his original subcontract under the successors of the contractors, the receivers, and to the fact that the commissioner found in favor of the lien and the court below confirmed that finding. The exception will be overruled.

The cross-assignment of error as to the lien of Kane & Keyser Hardware Company will be sustained. We are of opinion that the commissioner improperly disallowed a large part of the claim asserted by this company, and that the court erroneously overruled the exception to the report of the commissioner in this particular. The lien claimed was for the sum of $1,941.20. The amount allowed and decreed was $656.43, with interest to February 15, 1910, making in all the sum of $886.17 as of that date. The decree should have been for the full amount claimed, with interest to February 15, 1910, making the sum of $2,622.56 as of that date. From the evidence it appears that the items for which the lien is asserted are all within one continuous contract or running account, and that the commissioner was in error in considering that the right to lien had been lost as to some of the items by reason of lapse of time. We can not uphold the contention that the materials were furnished for separate and distinct purposes or under distinct contracts or orders. Therefore the decree will be modified and corrected as to the mechanic's lien of Kane & Keyser Hardware Company. The amount covered by that lien will now be decreed to be $2,622.56, as of February 15, 1910, instead of $886.17 as of that date.

If the college corporation is not protected by the bonds it took from the contractors and must lose the amount of the liens decreed, it is indeed unfortunate. But its officers in that event must be themselves chargeable with the blame. The contract with Hobbs & Co. in express terms gave them the right to retain from any payment of the contract price as it became due an amount sufficient to cover all claims of laborers or material men that had become chargeable to the property at the time. The law enjoined on them the duty to look out for liens of subcontractors, in any event. They could have fully protected the college corporation. But instead, they paid over to the contractors, ostensibly on the personal responsibility of the latter. An investigation before payment, such as owners under our law must make, would have disclosed the very claims now decreed against the property.

The decree in this cause must be affirmed, except so far as hereinbefore modified and corrected in relation to the lien of Kane & Keyser Hardware Company.

WILLIAMS, J. (dissenting). I think it is essential to determine whether the contract between the trustees and the Hobbs & Co. was recorded, in order to determine the rights of the appellees. If it was not a recordable paper, I admit that the simple act of spreading it upon the record by the clerk would not amount to a recordation. Raines v. Walker, 77 W. Va. 92; Abney v. Lumber Co., 45 W. Va. 446, 32 S. E. 256; Coal Co. v. Smith, 63 W. Va. 587, 60 S. E. 593.

It is contended that it was not recordable because it was not authenticated. I do not think authentication is necessary. There is nothing in the mechanics' lien statute requiring it to be acknowledged or verified, to make it recordable. Boisot on Mechanics' Liens, § 78, says: "Where the statute does not expressly so require, it is not necessary that a written contract, intended to secure a mechanics' lien, should be authenticated before being recorded, nor need it be verified by affidavit." Section 3, chapter 74, Code 1906, provides, in case of sale of goods where the seller delivers possession but retains title until the goods are paid for, that the sale shall be void as to creditors of, and purchasers without notice, from such buyer, unless a notice of such reservation be recorded in the clerk's office of the county where the property is. There is no authentication required by that statute and this court has held that none is necessary to make the contract recordable. Wagon Co. v. Hutton, 53 W. Va. 154, 44 S. E. 135; Hatfield v. Haubert, 51 W. Va. 190, 41 S. E. 144. And further, as indicating that the contract need not be acknowledged, the owner is not required to record the whole of his contract but may record only "so much thereof, as shows the contract price, and the times of payment." The contract in this case was recorded July 9, 1903, before any work had been done or material furnished by appellees. The statute says the owner may limit his liabilities, so that the amount to be paid by him shall not exceed in the aggregate the price fixed in the contract, by recording his contract with the principal contractor. I think it is clear that the purpose of recordation is to protect the owner so that he may not be compelled to pay, in the aggregate to all persons concerned, any more than he agreed to pay the principal contractor; and at the same time to notify the laborers.

and materialmen of the price contracted for with the contractor, and of the times when the payments therein become due. Boisot on Mechanics' Liens, § 78; Pimlott v. Hall, 55 N. J. Law, 192, 26 Atl. 94; Ayres v. Revere, 25 N. J. Law, 474.

A comparison of the present statute with the mechanics' lien law, as it was in 1887, will afford material aid, I think, in ascertaining the purpose for which the changes in the law were made.

Some of the prominent features of the former statute were as follows:

(1) It gave the principal contractor, the laborer, and materialmen liens of equal dignity.

(2) It required thirty days' written notice to the owner, after ceasing to furnish material or perform labor, in order to preserve the lien.

(3) It limited all liens to the balance due from the owner to the principal contractor, at the time he was given notice of the lien, unless he had been notified in writing by the laborer or materialman, before he did any work or furnished material, that he would look to him for his pay; and in such case the lien was for the full value of the work done or material furnished by such person after giving notice, notwithstanding it might exceed the contract price.

(4) It made no provision for recording the contract, and permitted the owner to make payments to the contractor according to the terms of his contract, and thus to affect or limit the liens of the laborer and materialman pro tanto, unless he had been notified by them in writing, as above stated.

The distinguishing features of the present law are:

(1) It subordinates the lien of the principal contractor to the liens of the laborer, materialman, and subcontractor, and makes the latter liens of equal dignity.

(2) The time within which notice of the lien is to be given the owner is changed from thirty to thirty-five days.

(3) It contains the same provision as the old law, whereby the laborer or materialman may secure a lien for the full amount of his claim, by notifying the owner in writing before performing labor or furnishing material, that he will look to him for his pay; and, in the event such notice is given, it dispenses with the thirty-five days' notice, unless the owner, in writing, requires it. It also gives the owner the right to demand of the laborer or materialman, in writing, that he file with him his itemized account; and, in the event of his failure to do so within ten days thereafter, releases the owner and his property from any liability for all work or material done or furnished, prior to the time of his giving the notice.

(4) It does not expressly limit the amount of liens to the price stipulated with the principal contractor, but it provides that the owner may do so by having his contract with the principal contractor, "or so much thereof, as shows the contract price and the times of its payment," recorded.

If the owner records his contract before any work is done or material furnished, the liability of his property for liens is no greater, I think, than it was under the law of 1887. That such is the result of recording the contract, is clearly implied from the language of the latter part of section 5, which says what shall be the effect of his failure to record his contract. It says that, if he fails to record the contract, the property shall "be held liable for the true value of all labor done, and material and machinery furnished therefor, prior to such recording, although the same may exceed, in the aggregate, the price stipulated in the contract between the owner and the contractor." Note the words, "prior to such recording." Must not the converse of this be true? If his property is made liable because of his failure to record his contract, is it not clear that the Legislature intended that the recording should have the effect to relieve it of liability; and more especially so, when the act expressly says the owner may thus limit his liability so that the amount for which the property is liable shall not exceed, in the aggregate, the amount stipulated in the contract. What effect should be given to the language of section 5, viz.: "No payment by the owner or his agent, to a contractor, shall affect or impair the lien of a laborer, or materialman, provided for in section three of this chapter." To give it full effect, as if it stood alone, would nullify the provision for limiting the owner's liability, and would prevent him from carrying out his contract with the principal contractor. But all parts of the act must be given some effect and all made to harmonize, if possible. Hence the effect of that provision must be limited. To what extent? The opinion limits its application to payments made to the principal contractor, after the materialman or laborer has begun to furnish material or perform labor, notwithstanding the owner has recorded his contract before that time, and gives no effect to the recordation as a notice to the lien claimants. But the statute says that, if he fails to record his contract, he shall only be liable for what has been done prior to the recording of the contract. To my mind, that means that if the owner records his contract before anything is done or furnished, his property is not liable, unless he has received the written notice which section 8 provides may be given him by the laborer or materialman, before he has begun work or furnished material. Hence, I think, the words, "No payment by the owner," etc., should be construed to mean, no payment made by the owner to the principal contractor, before his contract shall have been recorded, shall impair the lien of a laborer or materialman provided for in section 8 of this chapter.

The construction placed upon that clause of the statute by the opinion imposes upon the owner the burdensome duty of ascertaining that every materialman and laborer is paid the full amount due him for material or labor, before he can safely make a payment to the principal contractor according to the terms of his contract. It will place upon him the burden of giving personal oversight to the construction of his building, to ascertain who is doing labor upon it, and, if possible, who is furnishing material to be used in its construction, the very thing which, as it appears to me, the making and recording of his contract was designed to relieve him of. I think the recordation of the contract is designed to be constructive notice to every materialman and laborer, who thereafter becomes interested, both as to the price for which the contractor has agreed to build the house and the amounts and times when he is to receive his payments. And, having such notice, they must assume that the owner will comply with his contract and make payments when they become due; and in order that their liens shall attach to and bind such payments, they must give to the owner the written notice, provided for in section 8, that they will look to him for pay. It seems to me that this construction is not only consistent with the language of the statute, but is much more reasonable and practical than the one given in the opinion, and will operate justly upon all persons interested. If the owner is to be held liable, notwithstanding the recording of his contract, for all labor and material done and furnished after the recording of it, he is in a position where he is liable to be imposed upon, if the principal contractor happens to be a dishonest man. The contractor usually buys his material from many different persons, located in different parts of the country, and the owner must get his information from him on whose order they were furnished. And if he fails to give him correct information, and the owner should make payment to the contractor, he would, nevertheless, be liable to the materialman according to the opinion, even though he had recorded his contract. By the law of 1887, which did not provide for recording the contract, the owner could pay to the contractor, and thereby cut off the liens of the materialmen and laborers, pro tanto, unless he had received written notice that he would be looked to for payment. I think the clause in question was designed to prevent a payment to the principal contractor from having that effect only in case the contract was not recorded.

The contract in this case was recorded before any material was furnished or work done; there is no evidence that the trustees were notified in writing by any of the lien claimants that they would be looked to for pay before they did work or furnished material; the decree shows that the property is made liable for several thousand dollars more than the contract price; and, for the foregoing reasons, I think the decree should have been reversed.

POFFENBARGER, J. (concurring). I concur in the conclusion in this case, but not in the construction of the statute adopted by my Associates. Under the rules of interpretation, a slight and unnecessary implication raised from certain terms used in section 5 of the statute cannot be permitted to limit, cut down, or destroy the positive terms of section 8, giving the laborer and materialman liens for their labor and materials, superior to that of the principal contractor, and of section 5 itself, saying no payment to a contractor shall impair those liens.

No extensive argument in support of this position is offered here, because it rests upon the plain letter of the statute, entirely accordant with its spirit. Since the terms thereof contravene no constitutional provision nor settled policy or system of law pertaining to a different subject, there is no basis for an assumption or presumption of legislative intent to except anything therefrom by implication, as is sometimes the case. To effect an exception by an implication arising from the terms of the statute itself, not from presumption founded upon a constitutional limitation or an established principle of public policy, the implication must be a necessary, not a mere probable or possible, one. The court here limits and restrains the express terms of sections 3 and 5 of the statute by a clearly unnecessary and barely probable or possible implication.

I must dissent from another proposition asserted by the opinion. Section 3 gives no lien to a subcontractor as such. He has a lien only for labor, materials, or machinery furnished by him, and none for any share in the principal contractor's profit. The first proposition asserted by my Associates will permit the owner and principal contractor, by the terms and provisions of their recorded contract, to defeat claims of laborers and materialmen, and the second will permit the same thing to be done by transactions between the principal contractor and the subcontractor, contrary to the manifest purpose and spirit of the statute as well as its letter.

Properly applied, the statute may be more onerous and burdensome upon owners and principal contractors than due protection to the rights of laborers and materialmen requires, but that does not justify any modification by the courts. It is a question of policy or expediency for the Legislature. Nothing will bring about the repeal of a bad law more quickly or effectually than rigid enforcement thereof.

TURNER et al. v. HINCHMAN et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 19, 1912. Rehearing Denied
June 30, 1913.)

1. DEEDS (§ 196*) — EXECUTION — UNDUE INFLUENCE.

When a deed is made by a man 88 years of age, long suffering from painful disease, feeble in body and mind from age and disease, which deed conveys all his lands, of great value, to two sons, in whom he reposed confidence, who transacted his business, and resided close to him, the deed drawn by one of the sons at his own home, not in the presence of the father, executed in the presence of the two sons, in the absence of four daughters living at a distance, the deed not read or explained to the father, the sons having had a private interview with him the day before, which deed conveys to the sons all the father's land, of great value, whereas the daughters are to be paid money far less than the value of the land. He had often expressed an intent to bestow his land equally upon all his children. At the date of the deed one of the sons held a deed for all his father's land. The father, within a few months before and after the deed to the two sons, made wills and deeds inconsistent with the deeds to the two sons, as if he still owned the land. These circumstances make a strong prima facie case of undue influence, and call for clear evidence of fair dealing on the part of the sons.

2. DEEDS (§ 211*) — UNDUE INFLUENCE — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The facts and circumstances of this case establish undue influence upon the grantor in the procurement of a deed conveying land.

Williams and Robinson, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Bill by William Turner and others against Joseph W. Hinchman and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Vinson & Thompson and T. J. Bryan, all of Huntington, for appellants. J. S. Miller, C. H. Hudson, and Ellison & England, all of Logan, and Geo. J. McComas, of Huntington, for appellees.

BRANNON, P. By a deed dated May 29, 1905, James H. Hinchman conveyed to his two sons, George R. Hinchman and Joseph W. Hinchman, five tracts of land in Logan county aggregating 1,162 acres. This is a suit brought by other children of James H. Hinchman to annul and set aside the deed on the grounds that James H. Hinchman was mentally incompetent to make it, and that his sons obtained it by undue influence upon their father. The case resulted in a decree dismissing the suit, from which William Turner and wife and other parties have appealed.

The evidence in the case is from many witnesses on both sides. It is useless to recite it. We have come to the conclusion, from the evidence and circumstances of the case, that James H. Hinchman was mentally incompetent to make the deed, from weakness of mind and undue influence exerted upon him by his sons, leaving his mind not free.

[1, 2] Opinion evidence is given on both sides to show that he was competent and incompetent. Perhaps we may say that this oral evidence of incapacity is stronger than that of his capacity, because coming from persons who were with Hinchman more than those asserting his capacity and better able to judge. But we test the case more by the circumstances, and when we add to those circumstances, beyond dispute the oral evidence of incompetency, we think such oral evidence has great weight, taken along with such circumstances. James H. Hinchman when he made that deed had attained the great age of 88 years. He was then, and for some time before had been, afflicted with chronic diarrhoea, angina pectoris, and senile infirmities. He was confined to his bed most of the time, for several years not going out. His acts touching his valuable estate were utterly inconsistent with each other, and tend to show that he really did not know his estate or its value, and had no fixed ideas as to the object of his bounty. He had left six children, the two sons to whom the deed in question was made and four daughters. See how unreasonable and inconsistent were his acts as to his land. By a deed the 19th of March, 1904, he conveyed all these lands to one son, George R. Hinchman. Though not the owner of the land after that deed, yet he made a will on the 30th of August, 1904, at the instance of Joseph Hinchman, saying that he understood that a deed was on record purporting to be signed by him, conveying to George R. Hinchman said land, and reciting that at the date of the deed he was sick and unable to transact business of any character on the account of ill health and age, and saying that George Hinchman that day prepared and brought it to him in the nighttime, and without reading it insisted on his father executing it, and had paid nothing, and had thereby obtained from him, against the interest of his other children, and without just reason to do so, all the real estate owned by him; and saying that it was not his purpose to discriminate against his other children and take from them an equal share of his estate in favor of George Hinchman; and saying that George had obtained the deed by misrepresentation, undue influence, and improper conduct, and that he (the father) desired to annul it, and to give all his children equal shares; and by said will he devised said land equally among his children. James H. Hinchman had been recorded of Logan county, and had been a member of the House of Delegates in days gone by, and yet his mind had so far weakened that he did not know that he could not by will cancel the deed to his son or give the land to others. The old man thought he was still owner of the land.

What his next act? George Hinchman likely heard of that will. He went to his father with a prepared deed, and had him execute it on the 15th of September, 1904, conveying the same land by more particular description, saying this second deed was to cure any defect that might exist in the former deed by reason of vagueness of description. The former deed seems sufficient in this respect, and the true reason likely was to get the father's confirmation and doubly bind him, and to frustrate and defeat the will of 30th of August, 1904. On the stand he said that he got up his deed to make assurance doubly sure. He was after the lion's share. Now, on the 12th of September, three days before this confirmatory deed, he wrote his father, as is not denied, that he had just been fixing to come to see him, when a child took sick. The letter went on to say, "I have that deed made to you all right, and will have it recorded today. I have had it wrote some time, but never got a notary here, so Marg could sign it. I will be up as soon as I can." This shows that his father had requested a reconveyance, and that George acceded to it; but lo, three days later, this reconveyance turns out to be one by which the old deed to George is approved and re-executed by his father. This goes to show, not only undue influence and fraud, but weakness of mind of the father. If competent, why would he consent to a deed confirming a deed which he had asked to be revoked?

What the next act? In October, 1904, James H. Hinchman brought a suit against George Hinchman to cancel the two deeds which James H. Hinchman had made to him, alleging in his bill that George R. Hinchman had advised him to convey his land to him so that it could be better divided among his children, and promising to hold it for them all, and that he came with the deed of the 15th of September at night, when the old man was sick in bed, and that he executed the deed, being at the time so sick and feeble that he could not understand it, and that it was procured by fraud and misrepresentation. He alleged that he wanted all children to share, and that George had promised to reconvey, as he could not make a division between the children, and that he (the father) thought he was only getting back his land by this deed. This is very likely. He made his son Joseph his attorney in fact to attend to all his business, and Joseph was active in the prosecution of this suit by producing witnesses and taking other steps in it. As witness the old man swore, in a deposition in that suit as to the September deed, that he thought it gave him his land back, as George had promised. A compromise was made of that suit and it was dismissed. It seems clear that by the compromise the land was to be conveyed back to James H. Hinchman and divided between the six children equally. By deed dated the 29th of May, 1905, George R. Hinchman conveyed the land back to his father, and by deed of the same date the father conveyed the same land to his two sons, George and Joseph Hinchman, the deed in controversy in this case. On June 23, 1905, the father, James H. Hinchman, made a will by which he confirmed the deed which he had made to George and Joseph Hinchman of the 29th of May, 1905. If that deed was good, why this will? Did the sons fear as to its validity, and desire their father to confirm it by will? The old man seems to have thought that he still owned the land and could devise it. A little later on, on the 27th of July, 1905, James H. Hinchman made another will, which was probated. This will states that certain litigation between James H. Hinchman and George R. Hinchman had been compromised, and that the compromise was not carried out according to the agreement, and that it had come to his knowledge that a deed was on record purporting to have been made by him, James H. Hinchman, on the 29th of May, 1905, conveying all his real estate to Joseph W. Hinchman and George R. Hinchman, and that said deed was contrary to his wishes, because he desired a fair division made of all his property between all his heirs. This will then repudiated and rescinded the deed of May 29, 1905, as being no act of the testator. The will further recites that it had come to the knowledge of the testator that a will was in existence purporting to be made by him, conveying all his real estate to Joseph W. Hinchman and George R. Hinchman, and stating this was contrary to his wishes. By the will of 27th of July he devises all his land equally among all his living children and the children of one dead. The old man seemed not to comprehend that he did not own the land; he seemed to think he could yet give it to his children impartially by will.

Now may we not say that these acts of James H. Hinchman, making inconsistent disposal of this land, giving by one act to George R. Hinchman, by another to his two sons, by another to his children equally—six of these inconsistent acts within 16 months—show that he was incompetent? He does and undoes. These circumstances are strong to show that the old man was in second childhood. He was broken by age and disease and suffering. He was a mental wreck. He was plastic clay in the potter's hand. We can the more truly say this when we reflect that he did not write one of these papers, but they were brought to him by interested parties. It does not appear that he suggested or drew up or originated any of these inconsistent papers. It does not appear that he manifested any desire as to the disposition of his property other than a heartfelt desire that all his children should share equally. That was his only ruling purpose. Those inconsistent papers go to show that James H. Hinchman in the dotage of age and weakness of body would yield to any child that would solicit his action. He had no force of will to resist. If not so, why would he yield to first one, then another? The very fact that he was once a man of intellect lends strength to the statement that he was later an imbecile; for if he had not lost all his natural business capacity, we would not find him making such inconsistent papers, such disposition of his property. No man in his senses would do this. This charge of incompetency is sustained by the shocking injustice to his daughters from the deed involved in this suit. The land was about 1,300 acres in a fine coal region in Logan county, worth anywhere from $30,000 to $50,000. The four daughters had never received anything from their father. That deed gave each of them only $1,500. The sons got the lion's share. Can we think that a man who had held a responsible position, and of good character and principle, who is shown to have had strong love for his children, would thus make rich men of two sons and give his daughters pittance?

Any one reading a deposition given by James H. Hinchman a few months before the date of the deed must be struck with the fact that he was of very feeble mind. I cannot give the details of that deposition, but it shows great feebleness of mind. So much as to the want of capacity of James H. Hinchman to make the deed. As to Joseph W. Hinchman, he was an active prosecutor of that suit, in the name of his father, to set aside the two deeds made by his father to George R. Hinchman, based on the charge of mental weakness of his father. By letters to his sisters he called upon them to fight George R. Hinchman in the suit to set aside those deeds. In letters to his sisters he did this, and denounced his brother as guilty of fraud, calling him a "sneak thief." He said in one letter that his father was "but a poor old feeble thing; he is a mental and physical wreck & the man that would dare to take advantage of him how could I call him my brother." In a letter about the suit of his father against George R. Hinchman he said: "I have got pap fully awakened, but he is just like a little child, perfectly inactive, forgetful, and indifferent. Have to tell him again to day what I told him day before yesterday." He told several persons that owing to age and infirmity he was a mental wreck and incapable of transacting any business of importance, and, childlike, could be influenced to sign any paper, and said he would so state on oath. Such was Joseph's opinion as to his father's mental condition. So much as to the question of capacity of James H. Hinchman to make the deed.

Now as to undue influence. The two brothers were men of mature age and seemed astute. They lived within less than a mile of their father's house. The old man transacted no business, but left it all to those two sons, particularly to George R. Hinchman. The daughters lived in another county. They and their husbands seldom saw the old man, but those two sons were in almost daily intercourse with their father. George R. Hinchman cut a large amount of timber from his father's land and received the money therefor, and collected oil rental, and deposited the money in his own name in the bank. He did not turn it over to his father, and only paid him petty sums now and then. When his father sued him to set aside the two deeds above mentioned, he also sued him in assumpsit for those moneys, claiming some $5,000. All the evidence shows that the old man had confidence in these sons, committed all his business to them, and that they had unbounded influence over him. They could get him to make any paper they wished, as shown by the inconsistent papers, above mentioned, and other evidence. On Sunday May 28th, George and Joseph Hinchman went to their father's home. One of them came from Ohio, to which he had a few weeks before moved. Shortly before that, about the 5th of May, the two brothers had arranged a compromise of the suits to cancel the deed to George Hinchman, by which compromise George was to give up the land, and it was to be divided equally among the six children. For such a result Joseph Hinchman had been struggling for months. On that Sunday a private conference took place between the father and those two sons. A grandson swears that one of the sons suggested to him that he and his wife, then living with James H. Hinchman, visit a neighbor and leave the two sons with their father, as they had some business matters to talk over with him. The grandson and his wife did so. The two sons and their father had that conference to themselves. What did they say to the old man? We do not know. Did they tell him that on the next day the compromise would be carried out and thus misrepresent the character of the deed which the old man made next day? Did they tell him that he was to get back his land and make a deed of equal division among all the children? Or did they overween him to consent to the deed of the next day, giving all his large estate to the two sons. That secret conference speaks strongly in this case. It was on Sunday. The case was pressing. It is not without force to remark that George and Joseph seemed afraid to say whether they were there together. They say that they cannot say as to this. Strange! But there they were. George had a deed for all the land. The old man says George made a proposition. What? There he was, having all the land in his clutch. He had received it in trust to divide among all the children. Perhaps he said to his father, "If you will deed the land to me and Joseph, I will surrender the land to you." He had the land in his hand as a weapon of coercion. Both brothers may have used it as a club to compel such deed. The old weak man, thus coerced, was in vinculis, moved by undue influence.

We do not deny the rule of Delaplain v. Grubb, 44 W. Va. 612, 30 S. E. 201, 67 Am. St. Rep. 788, that a man is presumed to be able to make a deed; we do not say that Hinchman was incompetent to make a free and voluntary deed, but, old and weak as he was, he was not free under the circumstance that George had his land and could dictate terms of surrender. Anyhow, the next day is born a deed by which the old man gives all his land, worth from $30,000 to $50,000 then, and prospectively more, to his two sons. Joseph Hinchman, who had been writing to his sisters that he was fighting for equal division, suddenly deserts them, and becomes owner of half himself and concedes the other half to his late antagonist. Sudden change this desertion of his allies. What is the reasonable explanation? Confederacy and combination between the two brothers to wrong the sisters, and defeat their father's cherished object, equality between the children of his loins. What did the aged man think the deed meant? Joseph had been made by him, by power of attorney, his agent to transact his business. Joseph had been fighting George to cancel the deed. They compromised. The father thought they had made peace; that Joseph had succeeded in regaining his land. What more reasonable than to say that he thought he was getting back his land, and distributing it after his death among all his children? How could he think that Joseph, whom he had chosen to fight for his children, was doing anything else? Why did the compromise perish so soon? It perished, as in thousands of instances, at the bidding of gain. Who believes, knowing that, the father who wanted equality would so suddenly change and sedately cut off his daughters? In a will made in less than two months before his death, when he was nearing its portal, he denounced that deed, declaring that it was contrary to his wish, tried to carry out that wish by devise equal among all his children. Anybody reading this case must realize more clearly than I can express it, that the deed of May 29, 1905, is the child of undue influence and fraud upon an old dying father. See the injustice it has done among children having equal claims. George Hinchman had received thousands of dollars from his father's money for timber and oil rental, for which he never accounted. He and his brother get $12,000 each, likely much more, in land. The sisters get $1,500 each, and out of this the hard deed makes them deduct certain costs. The boys indeed get the lion's share. We know that George R. Hinchman importuned his father to make a conveyance, as he told his father that if he intended to give him anything he wanted it at once, as life was uncertain. This demand resulted in the deed of March 19, 1904, giving George all the land. He had his aim set all the time to secure the lion's share.

I might detail other circumstances against this deed, but it is useless. "We admit that if a party is capable, his wish is law, but there is no fixed rule; each case must stand on its own facts, and the facts in one case rarely govern another," says Greer v. Greer, 9 Grat. (Va.) 330. There it is laid down as a rule that: "Although the grantor or testator may labor under no legal incapacity to do a valid act or make a contract, yet if the whole transaction, taken together with all the facts, mental weakness being one of them, shows that the particular act was not attended with the consent of his will and understanding, it is void."

I find in Minor on Real Property, § 1164, the following in respect to unjust acts: "This class comprehends cases where advantage has been taken of the mental weakness; or of the necessities or actual condition of one of the contracting parties, putting him under the power of the other; or of undue influence arising out of the nature of the social relation in which the parties stand to each other; or of business relations inconsistent, for the time being, with the transaction in question. Weakness of mind alone, where there is a legal capacity for business, does not invalidate an instrument; but if connected with any circumstances of surprise, inadequate consideration, undue influence, or the like, it affords strong and, in general, satisfactory proof of fraud. The question always is whether the party has yielded an intelligent and willing consent to the transaction; and if it appear, considering all the facts—mental weakness being one—that such consent is wanting, the act is void." Samuel v. Marshall, 3 Leigh (Va.) 567, lays down this principle, namely: "A person, reduced to a state of mental imbecility by habitual intoxication, makes a voluntary and irrevocable deed of gift of his whole estate, to a cousin german, to the disinheritance of his half-sisters, reserving the use to the donor for life, without any reasonable motive assigned for such an act: held fraud and imposition may be inferred from the circumstances, and from the very nature of the contract; and this deed of gift is fraudulent and void."

Hartman v. Strickler, 82 Va. 238, tells us that when a will of an old man differs from his previously expressed intention, and, in favor of those standing in relation of confidence, it raises a violent presumption of fraud and undue influence, which must be overcome by satisfactory testimony. Repeated in Whitelaw v. Simma, 90 Va. 588, 19 S. E. 118.

"This deed was prepared by Joseph Hinchman at his own home, not at his father's home, not in his presence. It was not read to him. These are important facts. The deed was handed to him while in or sitting on his bed. He was nearly blind. When asked if he understood it he remarked, 'We have talked it over.' But what the talk of the day before was we do not know. Perhaps he was told he was getting back his land, or making a division of it among his children. The notary who took his acknowledgment is clear that the deed was not read to the old man, but he had it in his hand as if reading it. A physician swears that he knew the old man could not read well. May we not ask, Why was not so important a deed read and explained to the frail old man?"

The fact that the execution of a will was kept secret from some of the children is often entitled to great consideration in connection with evidence tending to show undue influence. "Thus, where a testatrix was old and feeble, with a mind so impaired that she was easily influenced by those possessing her confidence, * * * and her will was executed in the presence of one of her children, who was greatly benefited by it, the court regarded the secrecy of its execution as a circumstance tending to establish undue influence." 31 Am. St. Rep. 684. There we also see that when it is alleged that the instrument was procured by undue influence, or was made while its maker was not of disposing mind, the fact that its provisions are not in harmony with a free and rational mind must always lend probability to the charge. It may happen, too, that the evidence discloses what were the affections and wishes of the testator but a short time before, and nothing has occurred to change them, and the act is variant from them, the change must be explained; else it will show that his act was not that of a free and disposing mind. We know the old man's cherished intent of equality among his children. We see nothing to make him change it, except the pressure of his two sons to grasp the lion's share. Why should they get all?"

In Leonard v. Burtie, 226 Ill. 422, 80 N. E. 992, the syllabus is as follows: "Proof that the testatrix, who was old and feeble, reposed great confidence in her son, who acted as her agent, and that the latter procured his attorney to draw the will, and that the son and the attorney were alone with testatrix at the drawing and execution of the will, which made the son practically the only beneficiary of a large estate, whereas the other children and grandchildren were given but small amounts, establishes prima facie the charge of undue influence by the son."

I quote from 1 Underhill on Wills, 197, the following: "Thus if the testator is an old and feeble man, unable to devote his attention to the active management of his estate, and if he had for some time prior to the execution of the will permitted the legatee to exercise an exclusive and complete control of all his property, the drawing of a will in his own favor by the confidential agent, to the total exclusion of the claims of members of the testator's family, would be a circumstance of the greatest suspicion; presumption of fraud and of undue influence would, in such a case, be almost irresistible. But it is still a presumption of fact and may be rebutted. The clearest evidence would be required from the proponent, extending much further than mere proof of due execution and acquaintance with the contents of the will." Pomeroy's Eq. § 947, says that when mental weakness and failure of memory are accompanied by other inequitable incidents, equity will annul the conveyance, and the burden, where there is real weakness, is on the grantee to show "perfect fairness and capacity." Our own case of McMechen v. McMechen, 17 W. Va. 683, 41 Am. Rep. 682, holds such principles where an interested party draws a will. See 31 Am. St. Rep. 685.

I do not intend to say that mere relationship affords a legal presumption of undue influence; but I do say that it is an important fact to be considered in connection with other circumstances of the case. I do not deny the principles laid down in Delaplain v. Grubb, 44 W. Va. 612, 30 S. E. 201, 67 Am. St. Rep. 788, and Buckey v. Buckey, 38 W. Va. 168, 18 S. E. 383, and like cases, that a man is presumed to be competent at the factum of a deed; but each case stands on its own facts and circumstances, and I place the decision of this case on its facts and circumstances differing it from those cases. I draw a marked distinction between those cases and this. In them the parties making the instruments were active in having them prepared, whereas in this case the father did not do so, but the deeds were made ready in his absence by the beneficiary.

Our conclusion is to reverse and set aside the deed of the 29th of May, 1905, from James H. Hinchman to George R. Hinchman and Joseph W. Hinchman, and remand the case for other purposes contemplated by the bill.

POFFENBARGER, J. (concurring). The rule announced by this court in Black v. Post, 67 W. Va. 253, 67 S. E. 1072; Woodville v. Woodville, 63 W. Va. 286, 60 S. E. 140; Bade v. Feay, 63 W. Va. 166, 61 S. E. 348; Teter v. Teter, 59 W. Va. 449, 53 S. E. 779; Noffsinger v. Farnsworth, 46 W. Va. 410, 33 S. E. 246; Delaplain v. Grubb, 44 W. Va. 612, 30 S. E. 201, 67 Am. St. Rep. 788; and Buckey v. Buckey, 38 W. Va. 168, 18 S. E. 383—renders it very difficult to overthrow a deed or will for mental incompetency or undue influence, or both. Tested by that rule, the grantor in the deed here assailed was clearly competent to execute a voluntary deed, and that rule will sustain this deed against many of the facts relied upon as proving the exercise of undue influence. But this case is distinguished from those referred to by two weighty circumstances, not found in any of them, numerous inconsistent dispositions indicative of defective mentality respecting the disposition of property by gift, and contemporaneous possession of the title to the property by one of the grantees, naturally and necessarily working restraint and control of the will, wishes, and power of the grantor. As to his property, he was not a free agent, because it was already out of his ownership and beyond his control, and in the hands of the son as a weapon of coercion. At the date of the deed of May 29, 1905, and the execution thereof, father and sons did not stand at arm's length and on an equal footing. The aged and feeble father was not then in law the owner of his very considerable estate, nor in a position to do with it as he pleased. One of the sons had previously gotten the title thereto in himself, and the father was then endeavoring to regain it. Mentally and physically unable personally to conduct the litigation necessary to reclamation, he had intrusted this important business to his other son. When both sons appeared, recommending a compromise, a relinquishment of at least one-half of the land and all the money in controversy, we may well suppose the father felt still more deeply his helpless position.

The deed, making flagrantly unequal distribution of the estate, corresponds in character with the untoward circumstances under which it was made. On the face of the transaction, we perceive the natural relation of cause and effect, calling for a satisfactory explanation. These circumstances shift the burden of proof to the shoulders of the grantees, under a well-settled equity principle. A mortgagee, or other person, having in his hands the title to another's property as a security or for some other special purpose, and obtaining an absolute conveyance or acquittance as to the equity of redemption in some form, must show he obtained it fairly. Liskey v. Snyder, 56 W. Va. 610, 49 S. E. 515. Though the element of purchase is not involved here, the principle applies, for the advantage of the grantee over the grantor, the inequality of footing, giving rise to the presumption of unfairness in the class of cases referred to, is present and presumptively operative. This rule applies in cases of admitted competency on the part of the grantor. This circumstance, regarded in equity as a coercive influence strong enough to overpower the will of men in full possession of mental vigor and power, may well be supposed to doubly influence the aged, afflicted, deserted, and mentally weak. Under such circumstances, these two sons were under a duty, in securing a conveyance of their father's estate, to proceed in such manner as to place their good faith in the transaction beyond question and leave no doubt as to the grantor's full knowledge of the purpose and character of the conveyance and his full, free, and deliberate choice in the matter of the disposition of his property by gift.

The unusual and anomalous character of the transaction here involved becomes manifest when the attendant circumstances are compared with those under which testamentary gifts are generally made. Ordinarily the donor has full and unquestioned dominion, and his will, not that of the donee, is dominant, controlling, and has free course. Here the donor legally had nothing in his power to give. It was already in the hands of one of the donees. The latter, not the real owner, was master of the situation, and the former an antagonist or suppliant.

If the record can be said to disclose any effort to show the fairness of the transaction, it is abortive. The two sons went to the father in secret, and prearranged some sort of an understanding as to a deed. Then one of them prepared it, not in the presence and under the direction of the donor, but at his own home some distance away. It was not read and explained to the grantor. Nobody was present when he signed it except the two sons and the notary, who took his acknowledgment. They say he had the deed in his hands as if reading it, but do not say he actually read it. Under the circumstances, it ought to appear, not only that he read it, or that it was read to him, but also that it was fully explained to him, and the question of his comprehension of the full meaning and import thereof placed beyond the shadow of a doubt.

The claim of an equity in the two sons, conforming to the character and effect of the deed, is founded upon transactions dating back to the year 1871, more than 30 years prior to the date of the deed. This is the old deed found among the grantor's papers, indicating intent, at the time of its execution, to convey the land to the two sons in consideration of love and affection and covenants of maintenance of the grantor and his wife during their natural lives. It is claimed this deed was actually delivered and then lost, and that it was made partly in consideration of indebtedness of the grantor to be paid by the two sons. If there was such indebtedness and they paid it, and the delivery of the deed was postponed pending the discharge of the indebtedness, they were no doubt entitled to a delivery thereof within 10 or 15 years after the date of the deed. Or, if it was delivered and then lost 15 or 20 years before the date of the deed in question here, there is no evidence of any effort to procure a new deed, and it is highly improbable that these two men, entitled to a valuable estate, would remain silent for so long a period, with knowledge of the nondelivery or loss of their muniment of title. The facts and circumstances are inconsistent with the theory of reliance upon an equitable title to the land or title under the lost deed. The evidence of this claim is obviously lacking in certainty and directness.

WILLIAMS, J. (dissenting). I think the decision of this case clearly wrong, if former decisions by this court of similar cases are to have any weight as precedents. I think the evidence in the case of Teter v. Teter, 59 W. Va. 449, 53 S. E. 779, and Black v. Post, 67 W. Va. 253, 67 S. E. 1072, and others I might name, make much stronger cases against the validity of the deeds thereby assailed than appellants have made in the present case, and yet in those cases this court held that the evidence was not sufficient to overthrow the deeds.

The law presumes the grantor was competent, and that his deed was made without undue influence, or fraud, and imposes the burden upon plaintiffs, who have assailed it, to overcome those presumptions by proof. I do not think the proof, in the present case, is sufficient to overcome either of the presumptions. On the question of competency, I think the testimony of Mr. Hinchman himself, taken to be read as evidence in the suit then pending against his son, George, and the testimony of persons who had dealings with Mr. Hinchman, not very remote from the time the deed in question was made, is the most valuable evidence in the case on that point. True, Mr. Hinchman was enfeebled by disease and age, and at times was forgetful. Loss of memory is common to old age. But I cannot doubt that he then well knew the property which he was conveying, and the persons to whom he was conveying it, and also knew the legal effect of his deed. That knowledge is sufficient to satisfy the legal requirement as to capacity. That he was physically weak does not prove that his mind was so impaired that he did not know what he was doing. A sample of his own testimony, taken in March, 1905, about two months before the deed in controversy was made, will best illustrate the state of the old gentleman's mind at that time: "Q. State your age, residence, and occupation. Ans. I was 87 years old the 4th day of last January, Logan county, West Virginia. My occupation now is sitting around the fire. Q. Are you the plaintiff in this suit? Ans. Yes, sir. Q. How many children have you living? Ans. Four. Q. How many dead that have living heirs? Ans. Two. Q. What relation are you to the defendant? Ans. I am sorry to tell you that I am his father."

He had been a man of more than ordinary mind, he had served as clerk of the court of his county for a number of years, and had represented his county in the state Legislature, and, not more than four or five years before his death, he served as secretary to the board of education of his school district. Mr. Curry, the assessor, visited him on the 9th or 10th of April, only five or six weeks before the deed was made, and he states that Mr. Hinchman gave him a list of his property on that occasion. Millard Stafford, his grandson, and Millard's wife, were living with him at the time. They both testified as plaintiff's witnesses, and their testimony, I think, proves his capacity, beyond question. None of the witnesses were experts, and their mere opinions concerning his capacity are of little value. The witnesses who have given opinions as to his competency are about equal in number, pro and con. The state of the old man's mind can be best judged by what he said and did, at the time, and near the time, when the deed was executed. Millard Stafford and his wife had been living with him about six months, and Millard says that his sons, Joe and George, came to see their father on Sunday, the day before the deed was executed; that Joseph told witness that he and George wanted to have a talk with their father about the suit, which he then had against George, and which Joseph was seeking to have settled; that he had better take his wife, and go over to Huse Ellis'; that he and his wife did go to Ellis', and returned that evening about 4 o'clock, and found Joe and George still there. But before Millard and his wife left the house, the old gentleman was seized with a severe pain, and Millard and George helped him to bed. He was suffering with arteriosclerosis which at times would give him violent pain, and after the pain would pass off he would then be able to be up and go about the house, and it would be some time before another attack. True, Millard Stafford gives it, as his opinion, that the old man was not capable of making a deed. But the following facts, and conversations with him, related by Millard as having taken place on the day before, and on the same day on which the deed was made, are worth more to prove competency than the mere opinions of all the witnesses who have testified in the case. They are facts which are like figures, and from such facts the court can reach its own conclusion. He says: "Grandpap was sitting at the kitchen window, and he said that he didn't believe that George was going to do what he promised to do, and that he was going back on him. I asked him what he promised to do, and he said, 'I made a proposition to him yesterday evening, and it was for him to deed me back the land as it was, and George took me up on the first proposition.'" Stafford further says that at noon on the following day the old man told him "that George had done what he promised to do, and that he had deeded his land back to him and taken the deed to be put on record for him." Continuing, this witness also says that, on the same day, and only a short while after the foregoing statement was made to him by his grandfather, he went down to his Uncle Joe's, and his Uncle Joe told him how the matter had been fixed up, and that it was altogether different from what his grandfather had told him. Now, if Stafford's evidence proves anything, it proves that the old man was capable of making his son George some kind of a proposition respecting the settlement of the pending lawsuit between them. Moreover, it proves that he was capable of recollecting it on the next day after it was made. Does that not prove capacity? I think it does. I will again refer to this bit of testimony, a little later on, in relation to its bearing on the question of fraud and undue influence. Can any one, for an instant, believe that was the whole of the understanding, or agreement, between George and his father? Certainly not, it is altogether unilateral. But it is very reasonable to believe that it was all of it that was told to Stafford. The old man had reason to keep the part which he was to perform to himself.

Helen Stafford, Millard's wife, says that at times the old man "seemed that he wasn't exactly right in his mind." She also says that on the day before the deed was made he was not well, "but on that day (May 29, 1905) he seemed pretty pert." Now, taking the testimony of these two witnesses together, it proves that on May 28th, the day on which he was seized with severe pains, and therefore less capable of transacting business than when not suffering physically, he was capable of submitting to his son George a proposition whereby the pending suit was to be settled, and was capable on the next day of recollecting it, and of expressing a fear that George would not comply with his promise to carry it out. If he had capacity to do that on the 28th, does it not show sufficient capacity to execute a deed, and would he not have even greater capacity on the next day, when he was not suffering so much pain, but was able to be out of bed and to occupy a seat by the kitchen window? I have no doubt that he had all the capacity the law requires a grantor to have in order to make a good deed. It is proven by facts, not opinions of biased, non-expert witnesses, and the proof is established by plaintiff's own witnesses. That he thereafter made wills, inconsistent with his deed, proves nothing as to capacity. It only proves that he afterwards changed his mind. He was very old, and no doubt childish, a condition common to most persons who live to so great an age, and I have no doubt he was influenced to change his mind on account of the importunities of plaintiffs, or at least of some of them, who were less favored by the deed than the two sons. That the deed made an unequal distribution among his children proves nothing as to capacity, nor can it properly be said to savor of injustice. The property was old man Hinchman's, and he had a right to do what he pleased with it. It is a common occurrence, in making disposition of their property, for parents to make an unequal division of it among their children. We do not know what may have influenced Mr. Hinchman to do so, and we have no cause to inquire into his motive for giving his sons the lion's share. The law justifies his deed, if he was competent to make it, and was not deceived.

Is the charge of fraud and undue influence sustained? I think not. Giving all the evidence that appears in the case the greatest force to which it is legally entitled on this point, it proves no more than that the two sons had an opportunity to commit a fraud, had they been so disposed. But we held in Black v. Post, 67 W. Va. 253, 67 S. E. 1072, that fraud could not be inferred from mere opportunity to commit it. Should we infer that fraud was actually committed because the sons asked Stafford and his wife to visit a neighbor near by, in order to give them an opportunity to adjust a matter of business, and settle a bitterly contested lawsuit between the father and one of the sons, in which the other son was acting as attorney in fact for the father? I think not. It is perfectly natural and reasonable that they should want to transact such business in private. Important business is usually transacted in private. Again, is it at all probable that Joe Hinchman would have told Millard Stafford, on the same day, and almost immediately after, the deed had been executed exactly how the business had been settled, if he and his brother George had, in fact, practiced a fraud on their old father? It is unreasonable to think so. It is a circumstance, which, to my mind, is more consistent with square dealing than with fraud. Instead of proving that the old man submitted to his son George a proposition on the 28th, which he accepted, and agreed to consummate on the 29th, but that, instead of carrying it out, he united with his brother, Joe, in the fraudulent consummation of a wholly different arrangement, Millard Stafford's testimony tends to prove the contrary. That which the old man told Stafford was to be done harmonizes with the presumed fairness of what was done. Stafford does not say that his grandfather told him all that was embraced in the proposition that he submitted to George, and even if he had told him all that had passed between him and George, and it had afterwards turned out differently, it would not be sufficient to prove fraud. Because the old man might very reasonably have agreed to a different proposition when he and George met. But Stafford's testimony does not prove that a proposition, different from the one which the old man had made to George, was actually carried into the deed. He says the old man told him that George had agreed to deed the land back to him, but he does not say that he told him what he, the old man, had agreed to do with it after he got it. So much of the agreement as the old man told him George was to perform was in fact performed, but what the old man was to do was not apparently made known to Stafford. So that, what the old man told him George had agreed to do is altogether consistent with what his uncle Joe told him had actually been done. George did reconvey to him the land, just as the old man said he had agreed to do. But is it unreasonable to suppose that the old man purposely withheld from his grandson information respecting the disposition which he was to make of the land after it was reconveyed to him? I think not, because he knew it would cause dissatisfaction among his other children, as soon as it became known to them. Again, if the sons had planned to deceive their father, why did they not send Stafford and his wife away from the house on the day the alleged fraud was consummated, rather than on the day before, when the agreement was made? They were at home on the 29th of May.

In 1904 the old man had conveyed all his land to his son George, and there was a bitterly contested suit then pending to have the deed set aside, and depositions of many witnesses had been taken. It was a doubtful contest, and no one could anticipate the outcome of it. Now, does it comport with good reason to say that George had consented to surrender that contest and reconvey all the land to his father, for no other consideration than that he should receive an equal share in the land with the other children? I think not. He knew he would certainly get that much by inheritance, in case the deed should be declared void. Because, if the old man was incapable of disposing of his property by making an unequal division of it in George's favor, he was equally incapable of making any kind of disposition of it, either by deed or will, which would operate to defeat his inheritance.

The previously expressed intention of the old man to make all his children equal in the distribution of his property is not evidence to defeat his deed. His intentions may have changed, and the execution of the deed is the best possible evidence that he did change his mind, if, in fact, he ever intended to make them equal. That Mr. Hinchman was easily influenced, and could have been unduly influenced by the persuasions of his two sons, does not prove that he was, in fact, unduly influenced by them to make the deed. We repeat, the law does not infer fraud from mere opportunity to commit it. The proof in this case rises no higher than to show opportunity to commit fraud.

Two deeds were executed on the 29th, one to Mr. Hinchman and the other by him. One was acknowledged by him, and the other by his son George. The notary testifies that, while he was writing out the certificate of George's acknowledgment, the old man was looking over the other deed. He was an intelligent man, and the presumption is that he read it. It is not necessary that it should have been read to him. Again, if the sons were engaged in a game of fraud, it is not to be presumed that they took the notary into their confidence; neither is it reasonable to suppose that they would have undertaken it in his presence. There was too much risk of its discovery.

Much probative force seems to be given, in the majority opinion, to the letters written by Joe to his sisters, pending the suit between the old man and George, concerning the view Joe then had as to the old man's mental condition, and also as showing deception and fraud on his part. His conduct, in that regard, was certainly not commendable, nor even excusable. But he was then seeking to enlist the sympathy and assistance of his sisters, in a suit against George, which he was prosecuting under power of attorney from his father. The old man was then living, and none of his children had any kind of interest in his lands of which they could be defrauded. While the old man lived they could have no estate in his land. And, even if Joe did deceive his sisters, it does not prove that he deceived his father into making the deed. But whatever effect Joe's conduct might have, as proof of his own bad faith, it cannot be read as evidence against George. It was a transaction between other parties, and the familiar maxim, "res inter alios acta alteri nocere non debet," applies.

I am clearly of the opinion that the evidence is wholly insufficient to overcome the legal presumptions that James H. Hinchman was capable of executing the deed, and that its execution was unattended with fraud. On the contrary, every fact proven, in relation to the execution of the deed, is perfectly consistent with fair dealing. It became known, as soon as the deed was made, how the old man had disposed of his property; he lived for nearly four months thereafter, and plaintiff made no effort to take and preserve his testimony.

In conclusion, it appears that the suit of James H. Hinchman against George Hinchman was settled and dismissed, in consideration of the deed which the majority opinion holds to be void. Is it not exceedingly unfair to George Hinchman to declare this deed void, and not restore him to his rights as they were before that suit was dismissed? The parties should be placed in statu quo, but how can that be done? Is there not great danger that the decision of this court may operate to do him an irreparable injustice? I would affirm the decree.

ROBINSON, J. (dissenting). The decision of the majority meets an emphatic, but respectful, dissent on my part. It is totally at variance with principles enunciated in Buckey v. Buckey, 38 W. Va. 168, 18 S. E. 383; Delaplain v. Grubb, 44 W. Va. 613, 30 S. E. 201, 67 Am. St. Rep. 788; Farnsworth v. Noffsinger, 46 W. Va. 410, 33 S. E. 246; Teter v. Teter, 59 W. Va. 449, 53 S. E. 779; Woodville v. Woodville, 63 W. Va. 286, 60 S. E. 140; Black v. Post, 67 W. Va. 253, 67 S. E. 1072, and other cases. The evidence in the case does not overthrow the presumption in favor of the mental competency of the grantor in the deed. Nor does it successfully assail the deed as one secured through fraud or undue influence. It is useless to mention significant features of the testimony not discussed in the majority opinion. To say the least, the evidence is conflicting along every line. Different minds might draw different conclusions from it. An able and cautious chancellor has passed on it. A well known and salutary rule forbids that his finding and the decree made thereon be overthrown.

1. CONTRACTS (§ 147*)—CONSTRUCTION—INTENTION.

In construing the provisions of a contract in an effort to ascertain the true intent, meaning, and purport thereof, courts will and must always examine the contract in its entirety, or such parts thereof as may disclose or tend to disclose the object and purpose sought to be attained by the parties thereto.

Where a particular purpose is sought by a contract, and the language pertaining thereto is clear and certain, no general terms used therein will extend the meaning thereof beyond the intent and purpose so definitely expressed.

Under a mining lease, which, in the first clause, specifically described the property leased, and in a subsequent clause reserved to the owner of an interest in such property a 5 per Appeal from Circuit Court, Mingo County.

Action by R. N. Taylor against the Buffalo Collieries Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Modified and affirmed.

G. R. C. Wiles, of Williamson, and Campbell, Brown & Davis, of Huntington, for appellant. Stokes & Bronson, of Williamson, for appellee.

LYNCH, J. The bill in this cause was dismissed by the circuit court, upon defendant's demurrer thereto. Plaintiff appeals.

His right to relief is based upon a contract between him and Leftwich (who is not a party and apparently not interested) and the Buffalo Collieries Company, dated August 3, 1903. It is unnecessary to quote more than two clauses of the contract, the first and the thirteenth, because they sufficiently express the true intent, meaning, and purpose thereof, so far as necessary to the proper determination of plaintiff's right to the relief sought:

"First. That in consideration of the terms, conditions, and stipulations hereinafter set out, to be kept and performed by the parties hereto respectively, the parties of the first part do hereby let and lease to the party of the second part, with the consent of the Buffalo Land & Coal Company, which said consent is hereto attached, as part of this lease, the exclusive right and privilege of mining, shipping, and selling all the coal on, under, and from the premises hereinafter described (800 acres), together with the privilege of manufacturing coke and all other by-products of coal on and from said premises, for a term of 50 years, or until all the merchantable coal on, in, and under said land shall have been mined and removed therefrom."

"Thirteenth. It is further agreed, stipulated, and understood by and between the parties hereto that the lessors, Everett Leftwich and R. N. Taylor, shall have and do hereby retain and reserve unto themselves, their heirs or assigns, a one-tenth interest in and to all the rights, privileges, and property interest in or pertaining to the property or lease herein demised, contracted, and described, which interest shall be held in the nature, shape, and condition of paid-up and nonas-sessable stock in the lessee's company, which stock shall be evidenced by certificate properly issued, executed, and signed by the proper officers of said company, one-half of the said 10 per cent. of the stock of said company to be issued to each of the lessors above named or his personal and legal representatives separately and in such denomination as he may direct; but in case no such direction be given then the proper officers of said company shall issue to each of the lessors above named 5 per cent. of each and every issue of stock which may now or hereafter be made, and evidence the same by one certificate for each lessor or his representatives, as above, covering his said 5 per cent. of said stock issued, whether preferred, common, or otherwise, and whenever or under whatever circumstances said company, its successors or assigns, may issue any stock. And whenever said company, its successors or assigns, may issue any stock of whatever kind, or for whatever purpose, 10 per cent. of such stock shall be issued to said lessors as above described, and the said 10 per cent. shall be paid-up and nonassessable stock, without cost to or charge upon the said lessors above named or their representatives; and the holders of the nonassessable stock herein provided for shall be entitled to their pro rata dividends as are other stockholders."

By its articles of incorporation and charter, defendant was authorized to issue, and subsequent to its organization did issue, 1,000 shares of its capital stock, of the par value of $50 per share, and distributed the same to its stockholders in the proper proportions, including the plaintiff, to whom it issued 5 per cent. thereof, or 50 shares. Of this plaintiff does not complain. Some time thereafter he sold and assigned, in the usual manner, the certificate thereof so delivered to him.

The gravamen of the complaint alleged by the bill is that from time to time thereafter, and without plaintiff's knowledge until within a few months before the institution of the suit, defendant obtained from the state, by the regular method, authority to increase its capital stock to a maximum of $300,000, and that, pursuant thereto, it did increase the same from $50,000 to or near the authorized maximum limit, 5 per cent. of which, though demanded by him, it has failed and refused to issue to him, which he claims under the provisions of the thirteenth clause of the contract. As incident to the rights thus asserted, plaintiff, by the bill, further complains of defendant's denial of the privileges legally due him as one of its stockholders. He admits that defendant has successfully conducted its corporate business, has acquired and is operating mining leases on lands other than those leased to it by himself and Leftwich, "and has lately acquired and is now the owner of large holdings of valuable real estate purchased from the profits made in its said business of mining and shipping coal, * * * and has made large dividends and profits," in which it refuses him any participation under the contract as he interprets it. The relief sought is a decree requiring defendant to issue to him 5 per cent. in value of the shares issued by it in excess of the first issue of 1,000 shares, and to accord to him all the rights and privileges of a stockholder therein, and for discovery and an accounting.

[1, 2] The provisions of clause 13 are, it is true, comprehensive and explicit, and, on a cursory examination, seem to sustain plaintiff's claim to relief. But, when carefully examined, and tested by the canons of construction applicable alike to all contracts whatever their purpose or character, the proper conclusion accords with the rulings of the circuit court on the demurrer to the bill. As is said in Natural Gas Co. v. Oil Co., 56 W. Va. 402, 49 S. E. 548: "When a contract is made for the accomplishment of one main purpose, as is usually the case, it is necessarily the purpose of both parties, the thing on which their minds met, and as to which they are in perfect accord; and every provision of the contract must be read in the light of such purpose. In other words, the whole instrument must be considered in seeking its true meaning." See, also, Mining Co. v. Fuel Co., 69 W. Va. 47, 70 S. E. 857; Lumber Co. v. Wilson, 69 W. Va. 598, 72 S. E. 651; Johnson v. Welch, 42 W. Va. 18, 24 S. E. 585; Hurst v. Hurst, 7 W. Va. 289; Oil Co. v. Knox, 68 W. Va. 362, 365, 69 S. E. 1020; Coal Co. v. Coal Co., 67 W. Va. 503, 515, 68 S. E. 124. "Where a particular purpose is to be accomplished, and the language which expresses it is clear and certain, no general words used in the same agreement shall extend the meaning of the parties." Bloss v. Plymale, 3 W. Va. 393, 100 Am. Dec. 752; Ice Co. v. Ice Co., 99 Va. 245, 37 S. E. 351; Glenn v. Building Co., 99 Va. 695, 40 S. E. 25; 9 Cyc. 579, 584, 587. Measured by these principles, established by this court and in accord with our views, is plaintiff's interpretation of the contract under consideration the proper interpretation thereof? The answer to this inquiry finally determines the issues between the parties to the controversy.

[3] Plaintiff's contention is that, by clause 13, he is entitled to, and has the equitable right to compel defendant to issue to him, a definite percentage of its capital stock, whenever or for whatever purpose or character issued, whether issued for operations on the premises leased by him and Leftwich, or by others with whom or in whose lands or the coal thereunder the plaintiff has not and possibly may never have any interest or claim—a right without limit in duration, except perhaps by the dissolution or insolvency of the corporation. Of course, courts cannot, nor do they attempt to, either make contracts for parties competent to transact business for themselves, or relieve them from self-imposed imprudent agreements, except where fraud is charged and clearly established. They seek only, by fixed and definite rules, to ascertain and declare, not whether the terms of the contract are prudent or imprudent, but what the actual terms of their agreement are, and, when thus determined, to enforce them according thereto.

[4] With this purpose in view, it is, as heretofore stated, necessary to construe clause 13 in connection with the first clause, because thereby the parties identify or provide means for identification of the property to which the agreement relates, and to which clause 13 refers. The latter states with precision that "it is further agreed, stipulated, and understood by and between the parties hereto that the lessors, Everett Leftwich and R. N. Taylor, shall have and do hereby retain and reserve unto themselves, their heirs and assigns, a one-tenth interest in and to all the rights, privileges, and property interest in or pertaining to the property or lease herein demised, contracted, and described"—thus clearly limiting the application of the otherwise general and comprehensive subsequent provisions thereof to the particular property forming the subject-matter of the entire contract. This limitation is further prescribed by the additional provision that the one-tenth "interest" in "the rights, privileges, and property" therein "demised, contracted, and described" "shall be held in the nature, shape, and condition of" paid-up and nonassessable shares in each and every issue of the capital stock of the company, of whatever character, for whatever purpose, or whenever issued, pertaining, not generally to all the property thereafter acquired by it, but specifically to the property which the contract definitely describes, and to which its application is thereby confined. This is a reasonable construction thereof, and the one apparently first adopted by the plaintiff, because he delayed assertion of any claim to or share in the authorized increase from February, 1907, the date when authorized, the certificate for which was promptly recorded in the proper office of Mingo county, until June, 1910. This delay he seeks to excuse by an indefinite statement that he "has lately discovered" the authority thus acquired by the defendant. As further evidence of an intent, sufficiently expressed in the lease, that the interest of the plaintiff should be limited to the demised premises, the contract provides, in addition to clause 13, for a rental of 10 cents per ton and a minimum royalty of $5,000 annually. Any other construction or interpretation of these provisions is not only unreasonable, but in violation of the established rules therefor previously announced herein, as well as in conflict with the real purpose expressed in the agreement.

Not having asked and not granted leave to amend his bill before final decree, and asking it now, the decree of the circuit court is to that extent modified, and, as so modified, it is affirmed.

ALLEN v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 12, 1913.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 603*)—CONTINUANCE—DENIAL OF MOTION.

It does not appear that there was any abuse of discretion in overruling a motion for a continuance in the present case, there being no showing on the part of the movant that the absent witness resided in the county in which the case was pending, or even in this state. Motions for a continuance are peculiarly within the discretion of the trial court, and that discretion will not be controlled by this court, unless it has been manifestly abused. Hardy v. State, 117 Ga. 40, 43 S. E. 434.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 762*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EXPRESSION OF OPINION.

The court did not err in charging the jury that "in prosecutions for rape the fact that the woman made complaint soon after the assault took place is evidence, but the particulars of the complaint cannot be gone into." This was a statement of a general legal principle, and did not amount to an expression of an opinion on the facts of the instant case. Nor was it unauthorized by the evidence in the case.

3. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

There was sufficient evidence to authorize the verdict of the jury; and that verdict, having received the sanction of the trial judge, will not be disturbed here.

Error from Superior Court, Fayette County; R. T. Daniel, Judge.

Bob Allen was convicted of crime, and brings error. Affirmed.

LYNN v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 13, 1913.)

1. GRAND JURY (§ 7*)—ORGANIZATION—VALIDITY.

By the act approved August 18, 1911 (Acts 1911, p. 81), creating the Dublin judicial circuit, four terms of court were created for Laurens county, namely, January, April, July, and November, and it is provided in this act that the grand juries of the counties of the circuit shall not be convened except for the spring and fall terms of the court, unless in the discretion of the presiding judge it shall be deemed expedient to call a special session of the grand jury at some other term. At the close of the October term, 1912, of the superior court of Laurens county the presiding judge drew the required number of names of persons to serve as grand jurors at the January term, 1913, of the superior court. Before any indictment was returned against them the defendants challenged the array of grand jurors, for the alleged reason that they could only be convened legally at the April and October terms of the court. A demurrer was filed to the challenge to the array, which was sustained by the court. After indictment, and before arraignment, the defendants filed a plea in abatement, substantially on the same grounds as set out in the challenge to the array. A demurrer was likewise filed to the plea in abatement, and sustained by the court. Held, that the court did not err in sustaining the demurrers.

2. JURY (§ 66*) — PANEL — JOINT CRIMINAL TRIAL.

Where two persons are jointly indicted for murder, and a panel of 48 jurors is put upon them as trial jurors, and they elect to be tried together, they cannot demand a panel of 96 jurors from which to strike.

The court did not err in refusing to give the jury the written requests to charge as contained in the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth divisions of the opinion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 984-988, 1731-1748, 1752, 1768, 1770, 8164-8168; Dec. Dig. §§ 422, 763, 764, 1173.* Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 261, 624, 633; Dec. Dig. §§ 144, 301.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 427, 779*) — CONSPIRACY — CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE — INSTRUCTIONS.

The instruction contained in the seventh division of the opinion was not erroneous.

(a) A conspiracy may be shown by circumstantial evidence, as well as direct testimony.

(b) That there was no conspiracy charged in terms in the bill of indictment between the defendants jointly indicted does not make the giving of a correct instruction to the jury on the subject of conspiracy error, where there is evidence to authorize such a charge.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 695½, New, vol. 17 Key-No. Series) — WITNESSES (§ 37*) — COMPETENCY — TRIAL — RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE — RULING.

Where objection is made to the admissibility of testimony, and the court does not rule upon the objection, but the testimony is allowed to go to the jury, the failure of the court to rule upon the evidence, under the facts, is equivalent to overruling the objection.

(a) That a witness did not hear all of the conversation between two defendants, jointly indicted, and about which he is asked to testify, is no ground of objection to his stating so much of it as he did hear.

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 427*) — EVIDENCE — CONSPIRACY.

Where two persons are jointly indicted for murder, and the state relied largely upon circumstantial evidence for conviction and the existence of a conspiracy to commit the murder, it was not error to admit the following letter to the deceased in evidence (which, according to admission of counsel for defendants in open court, was written jointly by the defendants), as tending to show a conspiracy between them: "Dublin, Ga. Dec. 13th 1912. Uncle Frank Hightower Alonzo and the children is planning to go and getting ready to go to Wilks Co next Tuesday, they will be gone three days you dont know how desolate it is out here when me and the baby is left alone. We cant all leave on account of our stock. We have plenty of lightwood ready cut. You can come in your wagon every day and get a load I will give you a good, good good dinner. Please come visit me in my loneliness. You will never regret the time. Alice Lynn R 6 Dublin, Ga."

7. WITNESSES (§§ 274, 355*) — CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*) — EVIDENCE — CHARACTER OF DEFENDANT — COMPETENCY OF WITNESSES — APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR.

A witness was called by the defendant for the purpose of proving his general good character. On direct examination he testified that he did not know the defendant's general character; that all he knew was personal. The court declared the witness incompetent, and he withdrew from the witness chair. Subsequently the state asked leave to put the witness back on the stand as defendant's witness and cross-examine him, which was allowed to be done by the court. The witness, over objection of defendant's counsel, testified in answer to a question from state's counsel: "I have heard him [the defendant] use words that carried with them a meaning which implied a threat on his [Davis', a third person] life." Held, that this was error, but under the facts of this case will not require a new trial.

8. VERDICT SUSTAINED — NO ERROR.

The evidence is sufficient to authorize the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Laurens County; K. J. Hawkins, Judge.

A. L. Lynn was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

Davis & New, of Dublin, for plaintiff in error. E. L. Stephens, Sol. Gen., of Wrightsville, J. S. Adams and Davis & Sturgis, all of Dublin, and T. S. Felder, Atty. Gen., for the State.

HILL, J. At the January term, 1913, of the superior court of Laurens county, A. L. Lynn and Alice Lynn, his wife, were jointly indicted and tried for the murder of F. M. Hightower. The jury rendered a verdict finding the defendant Alice Lynn not guilty, and the defendant A. L. Lynn guilty, with a recommendation to life imprisonment in the penitentiary. To the judgment of the court overruling his motion for a new trial, A. L. Lynn excepted.

[1] 1. One ground of the amended motion for a new trial is because the court erred in sustaining a demurrer filed to the challenge to the array of grand jurors before they had returned a true bill against the defendants. The grand jury by whom the defendant was indicted was drawn at the regular fall term of court, and summoned to appear at the next term, to wit, the January term, when they were impaneled. At that term the defendant was indicted. He challenged the array on the ground that the grand jury was not a legal one. He contended that the provision of the act creating the Dublin circuit (Acts 1911, p. 82), which provides that the grand juries of the counties of that circuit "shall not be convened except for the spring and fall terms of the court unless in the discretion of the presiding judge it shall be deemed expedient to call a special session of the grand jury at some other term," was unconstitutional because not uniform with the practice in regard to summoning grand juries for each term of court prescribed by general laws, and also because the grand jury were not called in special session at the January term of court in accordance with that act, if it were constitutional. It is unnecessary to decide whether the provision of the act above quoted is or is not constitutional. In either event the grand jury which indicted the defendant was a legal grand jury, and that is all that concerns him. Under the general law provision is made for having a grand jury at each term of court. Penal Code, § 823. If, therefore, the above-quoted provision is invalid and should be stricken from the act, under the general law a grand jury could be drawn at the fall term of court and summoned for the next regular term thereafter, to wit, the January term. If, on the other hand, the provision of the act above quoted should be held to be constitutional, there is nothing in it which would make the grand jury so drawn and summoned an illegal grand jury. It declares that the grand juries shall not be "convened" except for the spring and fall terms of the court unless in the discretion of the court it shall be deemed expedient "to call a special session of the grand jury at some other term." When the presiding judge drew a grand jury at the fall term of court, and caused the jurors so drawn to be summoned to appear at the January term thereafter, and impaneled them and caused them to proceed to discharge the duties of a grand jury, this was sufficient evidence that in his discretion he deemed it necessary for the grand jury to be in session at that term, and that he called a special session of the grand jury thereat. No formal order or declaration further than this was necessary for that purpose. The act requires the grand jury to be convened at the spring and fall terms of the court, and leaves it to the discretion of the presiding judge to call a special session of the grand jury at some other term. It was held in Tompkins v. State, 188 Ga. 465, 75 S. E. 594, that grand jurors who had served at one regular term of the superior court were declared by the Legislature to be ineligible for jury duty at the next succeeding term, and that under the act creating the Dublin circuit the presiding judge could not summon a grand jury which had served at one regular term to serve at the next succeeding regular term of court. It was suggested that probably, under the power to call a special session of the grand jury at some other term, the same grand jury might be recalled at such a term as grand juries could be called in special session under the general law; but what was said in regard to calling back a grand jury to serve at two succeeding terms was not a construction of the entire provision of the act, or a declaration that it had no meaning except in regard to such a situation. In the present case there was no effort to require a grand jury which had served at one term to return and serve at the next succeeding regular term. A new grand jury was drawn at the fall term, and summoned to serve at the January term, and then impaneled. As to that situation, the action of the judge was a sufficient compliance with the provision of the act authorizing him to call a special session of the grand jury at the January term. Thus, if the constitutional attack on this provision of the act should be sustained, under the general law the grand jury which indicted the defendant was legally drawn, summoned, and impaneled at the term when the indictment was found. If the provision of the act should be treated as valid, what was done was a sufficient compliance with its terms, and the grand jury was a legal grand jury. This being so, in either event the court properly refused to sustain the challenge to the array and the plea in abatement, which raised the same question.

[2] 2. After arraignment a panel of 48 traverse jurors was put upon the defendants, A. L. Lynn and Alice Lynn, and a list of the names of the 48 jurors was furnished them, and the court ordered the striking of the jury from the list so furnished. The defendants objected to the ruling of the court that they strike from the list of 48 jurors, and demanded a panel of 96 jurors to be furnished them before being compelled to commence their strikes. The defendant assigns error on the refusal of the court to furnish a panel of 96 jurors, insisting that, as there were two defendants on trial jointly, each defendant was (as the court held) entitled to 20 peremptory strikes, and as the defendants were jointly indicted and jointly on trial, they were entitled to a panel of 96 jurors from which to commence striking, so that each might have his or her 20 peremptory challenges with knowledge of the personnel of the entire panel of 96. At common law the preparation of a list of those liable to be summoned to serve as jurors at a succeeding term of court was unknown. The sheriff, coroner, or officials known as "elisors" had an uncontrolled discretion to summons such "good and lawful men" as they might select, by virtue of a writ of venire facias. This practice was said to have led to abuses, mainly in "packing juries," and blackmailing citizens. 1 Thompson on Trials, § 13. To prevent a recurrence of this evil, statutes have been passed in nearly, if not all, American states, providing for the drawing from the jury box, previously prepared by officials designated for that purpose under fixed rules, at "a given time before the commencement of any term of court, or at other stated periods, of a list of persons, within the county, or other jurisdiction, from whom jurors are to be summoned." Id. § —. Thus, our statute provides how juries are impeled to try any person indicted for a felony: "When any person shall stand indicted for a felony, the court shall have impaneled forty-eight jurors, twenty-four of whom shall be taken from the two panels of petit jurors, from which to select the jury. If the jury cannot be made up of said panel of forty-eight, the court shall continue to furnish panels, consisting of such number of jurors as the court, in its discretion, may think proper, until a jury is obtained." And see section 863. The defendant can require no more than the statute grants to him. He is granted a panel of 48 jurors; and, while two were indicted jointly, each had the right, as did the state, to a severance on the trial, if the election was made. Penal Code, § 995. Had the defendant elected to be separately tried, he would have had a full panel of 48 jurors from which to strike. But as he did not elect to sever, but to be tried jointly, it cannot be held that he was entitled, as a matter of law, to a panel of 96 jurors. It is apparent what such a ruling would lead to, if a number of persons were jointly indicted and all the defendants elected to be jointly tried, and each insisted on the rule contended for here. The defendant is entitled to all that the statute grants to him, and no more, and it grants to him a panel of 48 jurors, and the right to sever on the trial. If, therefore, he was furnished a panel of 48 jurors, as required by the statute, and he declined to sever on the trial, he has been deprived of no right. See Cason v. State, 134 Ga. 786 (1a), 68 S. E. 554.

[3] 3. Error is assigned because the court left off the last clause of the following request to charge the jury: "Before there can be any conviction of murder, either express or implied, malice must be shown from the evidence. Where the state proves the killing, a presumption of malice arises; but where the defendant admits the killing with a deadly weapon, but adds an explanation which might negative malice, no presumption would arise that the homicide was murder from such an admission. In other words, where the killing is shown by the admission, and at the same time the admission is made there is an explanation justifying the defendant, it is still necessary in order for the jury to convict, for the state to prove malice, either express or implied." The charge and refusal to charge could not have injuriously affected the defendant A. L. Lynn. It could only apply to the defendant Alice Lynn, who admitted the killing and sought to justify it, and who was acquitted by the jury. The state did not rely upon any confession of the defendant A. L. Lynn, and he could not therefore be hurt by the charge as given, and the refusal to charge.

4. It was not error to refuse to give the following charge to the jury: "The state is not compelled to show a motive in order to convict of murder, provided either express or implied malice is shown, but there can be no conviction of murder without either the proof of express malice, or a presumption from which malice can be implied, for there is no murder without malice, and no malice without motive, and the absence of the proof of motive is a strong circumstance in favor of innocence, and this is especially true where the guilt of the accused is doubtful." Campbell v. State, 124 Ga. 432 (5), 435, 52 S. E. 914.

5. Error is assigned because the court refused to instruct the jury as requested by the defendant in writing, as follows: "I also charge you, if you believe that the deceased was attempting to have carnal knowledge of Mrs. A. L. Lynn forcibly and against her will, that her husband A. L. Lynn would have been justified in killing the deceased." The court did not err in refusing to charge as requested. There was no evidence to authorize the charge, nor was there any evidence to show that any assault had been made upon the defendant Mrs. A. L. Lynn, or that her husband, A. L. Lynn, had killed the deceased to prevent an assault being made upon his wife. Her statement, not under oath, that she killed the deceased could not be taken as evidence in favor of her husband. Berry v. State, 122 Ga. 429, 50 S. E. 345. The defendant's whole defense was based on the theory that he was not present at the killing, or that he took any part in it; he sought to establish an alibi, and to prove that at the time of the killing he was at a place other than the scene of the homicide. The court had fully instructed the jury as to the right of the defendant Alice Lynn to protect herself from the assault she claimed was made upon her, but he correctly declined to charge that her husband would have been justified in killing the deceased under these circumstances, or on the theory that it was necessary for him to kill the deceased to prevent the assault from being made.

6. The court did not err in refusing to give the following request to charge to the jury: "I charge you, gentlemen of the jury, that the testimony of a detective or person interested in the outcome of the case, or that has any prejudice or bias resting on his mind against the accused, should be scanned with care. A detective or person interested in the outcome of the case is not thereby rendered incompetent from testifying, and no person, no matter how much they are interested, or how strongly they are prejudiced, or how unworthy they are of belief, and [are?] merely for that reason rendered incompetent as a witness, but their testimony must be admitted, and their truthfulness or untruthfulness is to be determined by the jury." The competency of testimony is for the court to determine, and the weight to be given it and the credibility of the witnesses is exclusively for the determination of the jury. Calvin v. State, 118 Ga. 73, 75, 44 S. E. 848; Merritt v. State, 107 Ga. 875 (4), 34 S. E. 361; Ryder v. State, 100 Ga. 528 (6), 28 S. E. 246, 38 L. R. A. 721, 62 Am. St. Rep. 334; Rouse v. State, 135 Ga. 227, 69 S. E. 180.

[4] 7. The following charge of the court was not erroneous: "The state contends in this case that there was a conspiracy on the part of the defendants A. L. Lynn and Alice Lynn to take the life of the deceased, F. M. Hightower. It is for you to determine from the evidence whether or not there was a conspiracy. A conspiracy may be defined as a combination or agreement between two or more persons to do an unlawful act. The existence or nonexistence of a conspiracy or common intent may be established by proof of acts and conduct, or by proof of express agreement, if any. It may be proved by circumstantial evidence, as well as direct testimony. If you determine there was a conspiracy between two or more persons to do the act alleged in the indictment, then I charge you that any act done in pursuance of that agreement, by any one of the persons to the agreement, is the act of both, if done within the scope of the agreement. If you believe there was a conspiracy and common intent between the defendants to do an unlawful act, as charged in this true bill of indictment, then I charge you, if one of them, if there was such, did the act alleged in the indictment—that is kill F. M. Hightower—and the other defendant stood by aiding and assisting about the act, then the other would be guilty of the act that the one who struck the fatal blow would be guilty of." It is insisted that this charge was error because there was no evidence to support or warrant a charge on the question of conspiracy, and that the charge amounted to an expression of opinion on the part of the court that there was a conspiracy between the movant and his wife, Alice Lynn; also that the charge "raised circumstantial evidence to the same dignity as that of positive evidence." We do not think the charge open to any of the objections urged against it. There was sufficient evidence to warrant a charge on the law of conspiracy, and the fact that the indictment did not in terms charge a conspiracy did not make it erroneous for that reason. Nor is the charge open to the objection that a conspiracy cannot be shown by circumstantial evidence. This court has repeatedly ruled that a conspiracy may be shown by such evidence. Turner v. State, 138 Ga. 308, 312, 76 S. E. 349; Dixon v.

State, 116 Ga. 186 (9), 42 S. E. 357; McElroy v. State, 125 Ga. 37 (2), 53 S. E. 759; Weaver v. State, 135 Ga. 317 (1), 69 S. E. 488.

[5] 8. The defendant and his wife were jointly indicted for murder. On their trial certain evidence of a detective was offered by the state, which tended to show a confession on their part while they were confined in jail. The witness testified to certain conversations between the husband and wife, secured by means of a dictagraph, which had been placed in the cell occupied by them. It is insisted that this evidence was inadmissible because the testimony of the witness showed that he did not hear all of the conversation, and that a part of their conversation would not be admissible unless all of it was heard by the witness. To the objection thus urged the court did not rule one way or the other, but the testimony was before the jury, and was argued by the attorneys to them. Under the facts the failure of the court to rule upon the objection urged to the admissibility of the evidence was equivalent to overruling the objection. As to the first ground of the objection, that the witness was incompetent to testify unless he heard all of the conversation, this court has held that the fact that a witness did not hear all of a conversation between defendants jointly indicted, and about which he is called to testify, "is no ground of objection to his stating so much of it as he did hear." Westmoreland v. State, 45 Ga. 225 (3); Woolfolk v. State, 85 Ga. 71 (12), 90, 11 S. E. 814.

[6] 9. The following letter was offered in evidence by the state, and evidence was introduced to prove its execution by the defendants jointly: "Dublin, Ga. Dec. 13th 1912. Uncle Frank Hightower Alonzo and the children is planning to go and getting ready to go to Wilks Co next Tuesday, they will be gone three days you dont know how desolate it is out here when me and the baby is left alone. We cant all leave on account of our stock. We have plenty of lightwood ready cut. You can come in your wagon every day and get a load I will give you a good, good good dinner. Please come visit me in my loneliness. You will never regret the time. Alice Lynn R 6 Dublin, Ga." It was admitted by counsel for the defendants, in open court, that the defendant Alice Lynn wrote a portion of the letter, and, owing to her nervous condition, her husband, A. L. Lynn, wrote the remainder, but objection was made to its being admitted in evidence, on the ground that it was irrelevant, and had no bearing one way or the other on the case. We think the letter was admissible as tending to show a conspiracy on the part of Lynn and his wife to have the deceased visit their home for the purpose of murdering him, as contended by the state. This theory was contested by the defendants, and for the purpose indicated it was admissible in evidence.

[7] 10. The sixteenth ground of the motion assigns error because, during the progress of the trial, "and while witnesses were being examined in behalf of the defendant, and, as movant contends, specifically in behalf of himself, the witness M. H. Blackshear was called to the stand by the defendants for the purpose of proving their good character, but said witness testified as follows: Witness was asked: 'Q. Do you know Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Lynn? A. I know Mr. A. L. Lynn. Q. How long have you known him? A. I have known him seven or eight years. Q. Do you know his character or general reputation in the neighborhood? A. I don't think I do; the only knowledge I have of him is personal.' The court held that said witness had not qualified as a character witness, and no further questions were then asked said witness by either side, and he was excused. The following day, after the defendants had closed their testimony, and the state was offering testimony in rebuttal, Capt. W. O. Davis, who was examining the witnesses for the state stated to the court as follows: 'I desire to recall Mr. Blackshear for the purpose of examining him on the cross as the defendant's witness.' This being allowed by the court, witness was asked the following questions: 'Q. Did you ever hear Mr. A. L. Lynn threaten to kill Mr. Geo. B. Davis?' This was objected to by movant, on the ground that the witness had not qualified as a character witness on the direct examination, and had not testified to good character on the direct, and that it was not lawful for any witness who had failed to qualify as a character witness on the direct to answer specific acts of bad character on the cross examination, which objection was overruled by the court, and the witness answered as follows: 'A. Yes, sir; I have heard him use words that carried with them a meaning which implied a threat on his life. Q. Why did he do it? A. I presume it was because he was very angry. Q. What had Mr. Davis done to him? A. It was in connection with a suit that Mr. Davis had brought for Mr. Lynn's brother against A. L. Lynn.' The defendant objected to this testimony going to the jury, and excepted to the ruling of the court overruling the objection. We understand the general rule to be that where the defendant's character is put in evidence, and a witness for the defendant has testified on direct examination as to the defendant's general good character, he may, on cross-examination, be questioned as to specific acts of bad character or of violence on the part of the defendant. Did the testimony in this case come up to this rule? On direct examination the witness answered, as to his knowledge of the general reputation of the defendant in the neighborhood: "I don't think I do; the only knowledge I have of him is personal." We think the court correctly held that the witness was not qualified as a character witness. But the serious question arises when the witness, who was put back on the stand by the state to be cross-examined, testified: "I have heard him [the defendant] use words that carried with them a meaning which implied a threat on his [Geo. B. Davis'] life." Do these words mean that the defendant was a man of violent character? Can the question be asked on cross-examination, and the answer admitted, as not being in violation of the rule as to proof of violent character on the part of the defendant, who had voluntarily put his character in issue by other witnesses? And did the question and answer prejudice the defendant before the jury so as to require a new trial? There are cases in which it has been held that where there is ample competent evidence to support the verdict, a new trial will not be granted notwithstanding evidence had been erroneously admitted to the jury. Luby v. State, 102 Ga. 633, 646, 29 S. E. 494. The defendant had put his good character in issue. As to whether it was good is a substantive fact, and the jury will consider and weigh the evidence on that question in connection with all the other evidence offered by the state, in arriving at their verdict. His good character is not a substantive defense, but may be considered by the jury, and may of itself raise a doubt in their minds as to his guilt. See Scott v. State, 137 Ga. 337 (3), 73 S. E. 575. We think it was error to allow the witness to answer the question propounded as to specific threats of violence; and, while the answer is not a direct statement of a threatened act of violence on the part of the accused, it might be equivalent to that. But we do not think the evidence could have been prejudicial to the defendant, under the facts of this case. The person said to have been threatened by the defendant was, according to the record, Mr. George B. Davis, counsel for the defendant in this case, and who examined the witnesses for him. If the language objected to amounted to a threat on the life of Mr. Davis—and we doubt it—it made little impression on the witness Blackshear, for he testified further, "If I had thought he was going to kill you, Mr. Davis, I would have told you." If the language of the defendant testified to, therefore, made no impression on the mind of the witness who heard it that it amounted to a threat to take the life of Mr. Davis, it can hardly be supposed that it would impress the jury that it was a threat to take Mr. Davis' life, or to impress them with the idea that the defendant was such a violent man as that he would likely commit a homicide without sufficient provocation. It will be observed that the witness did not testify that the defendant was a man of violent character. He merely said that he had heard him use words which carried a meaning that implied a threat on the life of the person alleged to have been threatened. We cannot conceive that a jury of average intelligence would be influenced by language so hedged about as to convey only the idea that a threat was implied. The language itself was not given. Surely no jury trying one for his life would convict merely because of this testimony. And while we think that the admission of the evidence was erroneous, we cannot say it was sufficiently so to require a new trial, especially in view of the fact that the jury knew that the "implied" threat was with reference to one of defendant's own counsel. Elliott v. State, 132 Ga. 758 (1), 64 S. E. 1090; Strickland v. State, 137 Ga. 115, 116 (5a), 72 S. E. 922; Chestnut v. State, 112 Ga. 366 (1), 37 S. E. 384.

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 490*) — ACTION ON NOTE—PAYMENT.

"The maker of a negotiable promissory note pays the amount due thereon to any person other than the holder at his own risk, and a defense to an action on such note, setting up payment to one authorized by the holder to collect for him, casts upon the defendant the burden of showing, not only that he has paid the money, but that he has made payment to a person authorized by the holder to receive it, or else that it actually reached the holder's hands."

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 426*) — PAYMENT — EVIDENCE.

In the present case there was no evidence from which the jury could rightly infer that the person to whom the alleged payment was made was the agent of the holder, or was authorized generally or specially to receive for it payment of the note, or that the holder ever received the money; and, the only defense made being that of payment, the court did not err in directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

Error from City Court of Reidsville; E. C. Collins, Judge.

Action by the Savannah Trust Company against J. R. Edwards. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

H. H. Elders, of Reidsville, for plaintiff in error. Travis & Travis, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. [1, 2] The facts in this case bring it squarely within the rule stated in the headnotes, which we quote from Bank of the University v. Tuck, 101 Ga. 104, 28 S. E. 168. It appears from the record that the plaintiff in error has fully paid the note, and it is indeed (as he insists) a hardship that he is compelled to pay the note the second time. However, the rule is well settled that the maker of a note, who pays it to any other person than the holder, does so at his peril. There does not appear in the case any proof that Heyward & Co., the original payees of the note sued on, were the agents of the Savannah Trust Company, the holder of the note. When Edwards made each payment upon his note, it was his duty to himself to have seen that Heyward & Co. had the note, and that the payments were properly credited upon it, and when he made the final payment he should have demanded the surrender of the note. If he had done this, he would have ascertained that before its maturity the note had been transferred as collateral to the Savannah Trust Company, and he would thus have been saved having to pay it a second time. While the hardship of having to pay a note the second time is very great, one who does not exercise sufficient care to ascertain whether the person to whom he is paying the money really owns the note or not cannot complain of the result of his own carelessness.

It developed upon the trial that almost all of the testimony of T. S. Heyward was without any probative value whatever. His testimony certainly did not establish the fact that he was authorized to collect the note as agent for the Savannah Trust Company, nor even establish that it was the custom of the Savannah Trust Company to permit its debtors to collect notes placed with it as collateral; for the witness who testified to this point, in his first answer upon cross-examination, stated that he did not know, of his own personal knowledge, anything he had testified to. The chief complaint of the plaintiff in error is that the court erred in ruling out his own testimony. This testimony merely showed payment in full on his part to the original payees of the note; but there was nothing in his testimony which was relevant so far as the Savannah Trust Company, the plaintiff in this case, was concerned. As to the Savannah Trust Company the payments to Heyward & Co. were entirely irrelevant. It is perhaps true that the court ruled out this testimony at too early a stage in the trial. If subsequently evidence had been tendered which would show that Heyward & Co. were still the owners of the note at the time that the payments were made, or if there had been any proof that Heyward & Co. were authorized to collect the note in behalf of the Savannah Trust Company, this ruling would have been error. But, since there was no such evidence, the ruling did not harm the defendant, or afford him any ground for complaint.

This note appears to have been twice transferred—first by Heyward & Co. to the Electric Fertilizer Company, and thereafter by that company pledged as collateral to the Savannah Trust Company. Without the production of the note, the maker was not required to pay Heyward & Co., for, as he knew, the note was negotiable. There was no error in directing the verdict for the plaintiff.

Judgment affirmed.

MAYOR, ETC., OF AMERICUS v. PHILIPS. (No. 4,500.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 16, 1913.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 101*)—CHANGE OF STREET GRADE—LIABILITY TO ABUTTING OWNER.

A municipal corporation is liable to a property owner for the damage consequent upon altering the grade of the street or sidewalk in front of his premises, whereby his means of ingress and egress are impaired or destroyed, or a diminution of the market value of his property results. Central of Ga. Ry. Co. v. Garrison, 12 Ga. App. 366, 77 S. E. 193, and cit.; City of Atlanta v. Green, 67 Ga. 386; Augusta v. Schrameck, 96 Ga. 428, 23 S. E. 400, 51 Am. St. Rep. 148; Boughton v. Atlanta, 113 Ga. 948, 39 S. E. 816; Columbus v. McDaniel, 117 Ga. 823, 45 S. E. 59; East Rome v. Lloyd, 124 Ga. 852, 53 S. E. 103; Rome v. Rhodes, 134 Ga. 650, 68 S. E. 330.

2. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 203*)—CHANGE OF STREET GRADE—EVIDENCE OF DAMAGE.

The fact that the plaintiff had put down a brick sidewalk in front of his property, and had been required to pay for the curbing thereof, was illustrative of the value of the premises prior to the municipal improvement by which he alleged he had been injured, and was therefore properly admitted in evidence. The fact that the grade on which the sidewalk had been put down was fixed by the city engineer was irrelevant; but, as the objection went to the evidence as a whole, the court was not required to separate the irrelevant testimony from that which was relevant, in order to exclude the former.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 542; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 845*)—CHANGE OF STREET GRADE—EVIDENCE OF DAMAGE.

There was no demurrer to the petition, and since it was therein alleged that the city, in raising the grade of the street in front of the plaintiff's property, had failed, neglected, and refused to provide suitable and adequate means for the conveyance of the volume of water which flowed through a natural depression of the land at that point, and by reason of this failure water dammed up and ponded into an alleyway adjacent to his lot, whence it flowed into his store, any testimony tending to show that his store was subject to overflows of rainwater, caused by failure to provide adequate means of conveyance for the water, was relevant and material. While the petition may be subject to special demurrer calling for information as to how the water dammed up by the elevation of the street and sidewalk flowed into the plaintiff's property, still in the absence of such demurrer it was permissible for him to prove that, owing to the city's act in raising the sidewalk, water overflowed his store, and to prove that the water entered either in front, or in the rear, or upon the side, or from all these directions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1796-1802; Dec. Dig. § 845.*]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 845*)—CHANGE OF STREET GRADE—EVIDENCE OF DAMAGE.

Under the allegations of the petition, evidence that water overflowing from an inadequate manhole spread over the street and sidewalk, and thence flowed into the plaintiff's store, was admissible.

5. TRIAL (§ 228*)—INSTRUCTION—LANGUAGE—DEFINITENESS.

The action being one to recover damages for injuries to the plaintiff's storehouse, and consequent diminution of the market value of the storehouse and the lot whereon it was situated, it was not error for the court, in charging the jury, to refer to the lot as "the property."

6. TRIAL (§ 259*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

The defendant pleaded that the grade of the street had been changed with the consent of the plaintiff. In the absence of an appropriate written request for more specific instructions, the court was not required to give the jury the meaning of the word "consent," as defined in section 4480 of the Civil Code of 1910.

7. EMINENT DOMAIN (§§ 79, 80*)—CHANGE OF STREET GRADE—WAIVER OF DAMAGES—"WAIVER."

Since "waiver" is a relinquishment of a known right, the court correctly charged the jury that the plaintiff would have to be in possession of all the facts, and know the condition in which the municipal improvement in question would leave his property, before he could be so bound by his consent or acquiescence in the proposed municipal improvement as to waive any damages which might result to him thereby.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, pp. 7375-7381.]

8. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 839*)—CHANGE OF STREET GRADE—LIABILITY FOR DAMAGES.

According to the evidence, the overflows into the plaintiff's store were of such character, and occurred at a time sufficiently antecedent to the action, as to raise the inference and authorize the presumption that the municipality knew of the defects in the sewer, to which the injury of the plaintiff's property was traceable.

9. EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

The verdict is supported by evidence which would have authorized a larger finding in behalf of the plaintiff than that returned by the jury, and the contention that it is excessive is without merit.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. LOFTON. (No. 4,437.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 16, 1913.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

RAILROADS (§ 400*)—INJURY TO LICENSEE ON TRACK—QUESTION FOR JURY.

The court did not err in overruling the demurrer.

(a) It is for the jury, and not for the court, to say whether it is want of ordinary care for a licensee, who does not know that a train is due or coming, to step upon a railroad track without looking for the approach of a train. Failure to look out for a train may be such negligence as will defeat a recovery for any injuries which might have been avoided by the injured party; but the question as to whether, under the facts and circumstances of a particular case, it was the duty of the licensee to look and listen (or look, if a deaf man), is for determination by the jury.

(b) In an action by a wife against a railway company for the killing of her husband, it is alleged that he was proceeding along a pathway between the main line and a side track on the north side of the main line to the defendant's depot, for the purpose of becoming a passenger upon one of the defendant's trains; that the pathway was such that the defendant was bound to anticipate the presence of pedestrians thereon, and that it crossed to the south side of the defendant's main line to the usual place of taking on and putting off passengers at the defendant's depot; that as he was crossing this track, at the usual and customary place, in plain view of the defendant's engineer, he was struck and killed by an engine which was 40 feet away at the time he started to cross, and which was running at a speed of from 15 to 20 miles an hour, although a municipal ordinance forbade that the train should be operated at a greater rate of speed than 6 miles per hour; that the deceased was hard of hearing, but the employees of the railway company did not blow a whistle, sound a bell, or give any other signal as required by law, when approaching the crossing mentioned in the petition, and even after they saw him, or could have seen him if they had been keeping a lookout in anticipation of his presence at that time and place, the emergency brakes were not applied, nor any other effort made to slacken the speed of the train. It was alleged that the defendant was negligent in failing to anticipate the presence of pedestrians, or to keep a proper lookout, and in operating the train at from 15 to 20 miles an hour, in violation of a municipal ordinance; and it was charged that by the use of ordinary care the train might have been stopped by the use of emergency brakes before reaching the point where the deceased was struck, if any effort had been made to stop the train after the defendant's servants in charge of the train became aware of his presence upon the track. Held, that the petition shows a case for submission to a jury, in order that they may determine, in the light of any evidence that may be submitted, whether the running of the train in the place in question, at the speed designated, was in violation of the alleged municipal ordinance, and was, for this or any other reason, negligence as related to the deceased, whether the engineer, under the circumstances, should have looked out for the deceased, and, if so, whether he failed to observe that duty. Furthermore, in view of the amendment alleging willful and wanton negligence, the jury may find, if the allegations of the petition be supported by evidence, that the negligence of the defendant's agents was so gross as to be wanton. The decision in this case is controlled by the rulings of the Supreme Court in Crawford v. Southern Railway Company, 106 Ga. 870, 33 S. E. 826, and Ashworth v. Southern Railway Company, 116 Ga. 635, 43 S. E. 36, 59 L. R. A. 592.

Error from City Court of Baxley; A. V. Sellers, Judge.

Action by Mary Lofton against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Bennet, Twitty & Reese, of Brunswick, and J. B. Moore, of Baxley, for plaintiff in error. Parker & Highsmith, of Baxley, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Judgment affirmed.

POTTLE, J. (concurring specially). I concur in the judgment of affirmance solely on the ground that in the petition as amended it is alleged that after the defendant's servants saw the person for whose homicide the suit is brought, and observed his presence in a position of peril, they could, in the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided killing him. Under the facts alleged the plaintiff is not entitled to recover for mere negligence less than willfulness and wantonness. McIver v. Georgia Southern & Florida Railway Company, 108 Ga. 306, 33 S. (Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 15, 1913.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

EVIDENCE (§ 445*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—CONTRACTS.

The rule that parol evidence is inadmissible to add to, take from, or vary a written contract has no application in a case where a waiver of one of the stipulations of the contract is asserted, and it is proved that the waiver was subsequent to the execution of the original contract. The general rule does not purport to exclude negotiations respecting written contracts, except such as are prior to or contemporaneous with the making of the written instrument, and it is admissible to prove by parol a subsequent partial modification or the entire discharge of the contract.

Error from City Court of Jackson; H. M. Fletcher, Judge.

Action by the Elyea-Austell Company against the Jackson Garage, a partnership. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

C. L. Redman, of Jackson, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Watkins, of Jackson, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. The Elyea-Austell Company sued the Jackson Garage, of Jackson, Ga., a partnership, upon an account, and the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, but only for a portion of the amount claimed. Thereupon the plaintiff moved for a new trial, and it excepts to the judgment overruling this motion.

Upon the trial the plaintiff's president testified to the correctness of the account as stated. Among other defenses, the defendants sought to recoup damages on account of an alleged breach of one of the stipulations of the contract between the parties, and it appears from the verdict that the jury sustained this contention. In the contract, which was introduced by the defendants, the plaintiff agreed not to sell "Indian" motorcycles at a discount in the territory allotted to the defendants, during the continuance of the agreement. It appears from the evidence that in violation of this stipulation, the plaintiff sold to Edwards and Jenkins, both of whom live at Jackson, Ga., an Indian motorcycle at the list price of $225. Edwards and Jenkins both testified that the plaintiff told them they had a contract with the Jackson Garage by which they could not ship the motorcycle to Jackson, and so it was shipped to the purchasers at Locust Grove. According to the stipulation of the contract in question, the discount which would have represented the profit to the defendants, in case they had sold the motorcycle to Edwards and Jenkins, was 20 per cent. of the list price of $225, or $45, which the jury apparently allowed the defendants to recoup. There was other testimony on the part of the defendants which authorizes and accounts for the remainder of the difference between the amount of the verdict and the sum originally claimed by the plaintiff.

In the contract introduced by the defendants there is a stipulation requiring the Jackson Garage to carry a sample motorcycle or motorcycles always in stock during the continuance of the agreement, but the defendants testified that subsequently to the signing of the contract, the Elyea-Austell Company agreed to waive this condition. The testimony as to this waiver was permitted by the court, over the objection of the plaintiff that it was inadmissible to vary the written contract by parol evidence. The error assigned upon the admission of this testimony is the only point seriously insisted upon here. The burden of the plaintiff's complaint is that the court erred in allowing the defendants to testify that the portion of the contract (wherein the plaintiff agreed that the defendants should have a certain commission on motorcycles) was waived in respect to the condition requiring the defendants to keep a sample motorcycle on exhibition. We find no error in the ruling upon the admissibility of the evidence. The case is not one of an attempt to alter or vary the terms of a written contract, by seeking to prove a prior or contemporaneous parol agreement, but is one in which the testimony is to the effect that subsequently to the execution of the contract, and entirely disconnected therewith, there was an express waiver of the condition to which we have referred.

The cases cited by counsel for plaintiff in error do not sustain his contention. In Hawkins v. Studdard, 132 Ga. 268, 68 S. E. 852, 131 Am. St. Rep. 190, Judge Holden points out that parol testimony as to the agreements in question were contemporaneous with the contract, and the same is true of the case of Reams v. Thompson, 5 Ga. App. 226, 62 S. E. 1014, in which Judge Powell delivered the opinion of this court. The rule stated in the headnote is announced in Loveless v. Bridges, 136 Ga. 339 (1), 71 S. E. 166, and it had been previously and frequently recognized by the Supreme Court and by text-writers. See Jones on Evidence, 442, 557; Civil Code, § 5794.

FAISON v. STATE. (No. 5,023.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 12, 1913.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 825*)—INSTRUCTIONS—SUFFICIENCY—REQUESTS.

While it is the duty of a judge in the trial of a criminal case to state the contentions of both the state and the defendant, still, in the absence of a request for more definite instructions, a statement by the court that the grand jury has returned an indictment against the defendant, charging him with the offense of murder, and that to this the defendant has filed a plea of not guilty, which makes the issue for them to try, sufficiently presents the issue. Especially is this true where the court, in its instructions, defines the various grades of homicide applicable to the evidence.

2. HOMICIDE (§ 309*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

In the present case testimony was adduced which tended to show a mutual intent to fight, and which authorized the instruction of the court upon the subject of voluntary manslaughter. Gann v. State, 30 Ga. 67; Young v. State, 10 Ga. App. 116, 72 S. E. 935; Rickerson v. State, 10 Ga. App. 464 (1), 73 S. E. 681.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 824*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

"Where the court gives in charge to the jury the principles of law with respect to the right of a slayer to kill in order to prevent the commission of a felony, the failure to define the term 'felony,' as used in such charge, in the absence of a request to give such definition, is not error requiring a new trial." Helms v. State, 138 Ga. 827 (7), 76 S. E. 353.

4. HOMICIDE (§ 340*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

The defendant, having been convicted of voluntary manslaughter, cannot complain of the alleged errors of the court in charging the law of murder.

5. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1122*)—APPEAL—RECORD—INSTRUCTIONS.

Under the evidence there was no error in charging the jury upon the subject of justifible homicide, as contained in section 70 of the Penal Code of 1910, nor the doctrine of reasonable fears as contained in section 71; and, since there was no request that the entire charge be sent up in the record, it is not made to appear that the charge of the court as to mutual combat, and the defense which could arise under section 73 of the Penal Code, was so given as to confuse the jury, or that this instruction was injurious to the defendant. Where only fragmentary excerpts from the charge, in themselves abstractly correct, are presented for the consideration of this court, and the plaintiff in error does not cause the entire charge to be transmitted to this court, it will be presumed that the instruction of which complaint is made was properly qualified, and so presented as not to be confusing to the jury or injurious to the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 614, 616-620, 622-630; Dec. Dig. § 300.* Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2940-2945; Dec. Dig. § 1122.*]

6. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—INSTRUCTIONS—DEFENSE.

Upon an inspection of that portion of the charge to which general exception is taken, on the ground that the charge upon sections 70, 71, and 73 of the Penal Code of 1910 followed in such quick succession as to confuse the jury, it appears that the exception is without merit.

7. REVIEW.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and there was no error in refusing a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Johnson County; K. J. Hawkins, Judge.

Charley Faison was convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and brings error. Affirmed.

J. L. Kent, of Wrightsville, for plaintiff in error. E. L. Stephens, Sol. Gen., of Wrightsville, for the State.

MARTIN v. COX. (No. 4,573.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 16, 1913.)

1. PLEADING (§ 221*)—DEMURRER TO PETITION—ERROR IN OVERRULING—EFFECT.

Since the trial judge erred in overruling the demurrer to the petition, the further proceedings on the trial were nugatory.

2. CONTRACTS (§ 10*)—VALIDITY—UNILATERAL CONTRACT.

The contract upon which the plaintiff based his right of action is plainly unilateral, for under it he did not assume an obligation to sell the stock which he contended the defendant had bound himself to buy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 21-40; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

Error from City Court of Columbus; G. Y. Tigner, Judge.

Action by W. J. Cox against M. M. Martin. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

S. M. Davis and Wynn & Wohlwender, all of Columbus, for plaintiff in error. McCutchen & Bowden, of Columbus, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Cox sued Martin, alleging that Martin entered into a contract with him to purchase from him 12 shares of the capital stock of the Martin Furniture Company at a price not less than $1,500, and that he tendered the stock to Martin in pursuance of the contract, stating his desire to sell, but that Martin refused to take the stock, and consequently is indebted to him in the sum of $1,500, with interest. The contract (a copy of which is attached to the petition) was as follows: "State of Alabama, Jefferson County. This agreement, entered into this the 19th day of August, 1909, witnesseth: That I, M. M. Martin, do hereby agree to purchase of Wm. J. Cox, one year from date, 12 shares of the capital stock of the C. A. Martin Furniture Company, at a price to be mutually agreed upon of not less than $1,500, should said W. J. Cox wish to sell same. Should the said Wm. J. Cox desire to sell, he shall give to the said M. M. Martin 30 days' notice of his intention to sell." [Signed] M. M. Martin. W. J. Cox." The jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $1,500. The defendant excepted to the overruling of his demurrer to the petition, and also to the judgment overruling his motion for a new trial.

[1] 1. The motion for a new trial contains 19 grounds, in which error is assigned upon various rulings as to the admissibility of testimony, and upon instructions to the jury. We shall not concern ourselves with any discussion of the numerous grounds of the motion for a new trial, for the reason that, in our opinion, the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the petition. The demurrer should have been sustained and the petition dismissed. For that reason all of the subsequent proceedings in the trial were nugatory.

[2] 2. In the demurrer the point is made that the contract upon which the suit is based is unilateral. It is specifically pointed out in three grounds of the demurrer that by the alleged contract the plaintiff was not bound to sell his stock, or to do any other thing whatsoever, and that he made no promise or agreement whatsoever. Nothing is better settled than that neither party to an ostensible executory contract is bound, unless both parties are bound. "That the promise by one with nothing in return is void is axiomatic." Bishop on Contracts (2d Ed.) 35. Of course, this statement does not apply in full force to an option, because it is equally well settled that a contract by which the owner of property agrees with another that the latter shall have the right to buy the property at a fixed price within a certain time, if based upon a valid consideration, is binding and will be enforced. Weaver v. Burr, 31 W. Va. 736, 8 S. E. 743, 8 L. R. A. 94; Bradford v. Foster, 87 Tenn. 4, 9 S. W. 195; Linn v. McLean, 80 Ala. 360; Souffrain v. McDonald, 27 Ind. 289; Herrman v. Babcock, 103 Ind. 461, 3 N. E. 142. An option rests upon the principle that "it is just as competent for a man to bind himself to make a contract of sale as it is for him to bind himself to buy a contract of sale." De Rutte v. Muldrow, 16 Cal. 505. We think that under the rule laid down in Morrow v. Southern Express Company, 101 Ga. 310, 28 S. E. 993, in which it was said that, "where mutual promises are relied upon as consideration to support a contract, the obligations of the contract must be mutually binding upon the respective parties; and if one assume under such an agreement to do a special act beneficial to another, and that other under the terms of the contract is under no obligation to perform any act of corresponding advantage to the former, the agreement is without such consideration as will support the promise of the party assuming to perform," the demurrer raising the point that the contract in the present case is without consideration is good. See, also, Cooley v. Moss, 123 Ga. 707, 51 S. E. 625.

Without ruling upon this point, however, it is very clear, from a reading of the contract which we have quoted, that the contract is unilateral, and this phase of the case is not affected by the fact that Cox, as well as Martin, signed the instrument. Martin promised to buy the stock from Cox, if Cox, at the time designated, wished to sell it; but Cox did not promise to sell his stock to Martin, even if Martin should wish to buy it at that time, nor did he in any way obligate himself to sell, no matter how anxious Martin might be to buy. Under the provisions of the instrument Martin was bound to buy, but Cox was not bound to sell. The ruling upon the demurrer is controlled by the decisions of the Supreme Court in McCaw Manufacturing Co. v. Rountree, 115 Ga. 408, 41 S. E. 664, Simpson v. Sanders, 130 Ga. 265 (1), 60 S. E. 541, and Mallet & Nutt v. Watkins, 132 Ga. 700, 64 S. E. 999, 131 Am. St. Rep. 226, and the decision of this court in Oliver Construction Company v. Reeder, 7 Ga. App. 276, 68 S. E. 955. In the latter case Judge Powell says: "It would be profitless for us to elaborate the proposition that a contract, to be enforceable, must be mutual. Negotiations, propositions, and tentative understandings between parties do not become contracts until both parties are bound. * * * Generally speaking, if one party cannot hold the other to the terms of the contract, and compel him to perform under it, or bring an action against him for his refusal to perform, the transaction is unilateral, and no contract exists as against either party."

1. TORTS (§ 1*)—CONTRACT LIABILITY—LEGAL DUTY.

A tort may consist in the violation of a public duty imposed by the general law upon all persons occupying the particular relation involved in the given transaction or res gestæ. If a contract imposes a legal duty upon a person, the neglect of that duty is a tort founded upon a contract. In such a case the liability arises out of the breach of duty incident to and created by the contract, but is only dependent upon the contract to the extent necessary to raise the duty. The tort consists in the breach of duty.

2. DAMAGES (§ 20*)—TORTS—NATURE OF RECOVERY.

The petition sets forth an action ex delicto, and therefore the plaintiffs were not restricted to the recovery of such damages as were reasonably within the contemplation of the parties, but were entitled to recover for such damage as might be properly directly traceable to the defendant's neglect or failure to use due care in delivering the shipment which it had accepted for transportation.

3. CARRIERS (§ 105*)—TRANSPORTATION OF FREIGHT—DELAY—DAMAGES.

Where, in a suit brought to recover damages on account of the failure of a common carrier to deliver a shipment within a reasonable time, it appeared from the petition that the plaintiffs were contractors constructing a building under a time limit, and that the material constituting the delayed shipment was of an unusual kind, especially designed for the building then under construction, items of damages set forth in the petition, consisting of wages paid to a workman who was idle while waiting for the shipment, the expense of tracing the shipment, the forfeit which the contractors were compelled to pay by reason of the delay, and interest upon money which they were for the same reason compelled to borrow, were not subject to demurrer as being too remote for recovery.

4. CARRIERS (§ 105*)—TRANSPORTATION OF FREIGHT—DAMAGES—LOST TIME.

The court properly sustained the demurrer to those items of damages set forth as "lost time" of the two partners composing the plaintiff firm upon the ground that such damages were too remote; it not appearing how or why it was necessary for the plaintiffs to lose the time, or (except as a conclusion of the pleader) that they did not or could not at that time have obtained any other contracts of employment of the value alleged, especially since the petition alleges that the plaintiffs were contractors, and, in the absence of distinct allegations, showing a certainty of profits, it would be entirely speculative as to whether the contractors would have made or lost money upon the contract, even if they had had the opportunity of making another contract within the time alleged to have been lost.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by J. B. Carr & Co. against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Green, Tilson & McKinney, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. McDaniel & Black, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiffs, who are alleged to be a firm of contractors engaged in the construction of houses and other buildings, filed a suit against the Southern Railway Company for damages for failure to deliver within a reasonable time a shipment which it had accepted for transportation. The petition sets out that plaintiffs were under contract to build a courthouse for Columbia county, Ark. They had the inside woodwork gotten out by the Woodward Lumber Company of Atlanta, Ga. The Woodward Lumber Company delivered a car of this inside finish to the defendant railway company at Atlanta, Ga., consigned to J. B. Carr & Co. at Magnolia, Ark. This finished building material was loaded in Illinois Central car No. 15,934, and was delivered to the railway company with direction, as appears from the bill of lading, to transport the same by way of the Queen & Crescent route at Meridian, Miss. It is alleged in the petition that instead of transporting the car load of material as directed in the bill of lading, and as it had contracted to do, the Southern Railway Company carried the car to Chattanooga, Tenn., and there delivered the car load of building material to the Queen & Crescent route marked "Empty," and that it was thus carried to Louisville, Ky., as an empty car, and lay there for two months, although two weeks was a reasonable time for the transportation of the car from Atlanta to Magnolia, Ark. The petition alleges that "said Southern Railway Company was negligent in the transmission of said car of builder's material from Atlanta, Ga., to Magnolia, Ark., in that said car was by said Southern Railway Company negligently marked 'Empty' and delivered to said Queen & Crescent route at Chattanooga, Tenn., to be carried to the yards of the Illinois Central Railroad at Louisville, Ky., to which place said car load of material was carried as an empty car, as above stated, and there remained until on or about the 30th of July, 1906, as above stated; said Southern Railway thus negligently diverting said car from the route directed in said bill of lading and thus causing an unusual, unnecessary, and unreasonable delay in the transmission of said car from Atlanta, Ga., to Magnolia, Ark." The plaintiffs made constant effort to trace the car, and the condition of the courthouse was such that the inside finish was needed by the middle of June, 1906, and this material would have been at its destination, in the ordinary course, within this time, and yet the plaintiffs did not receive it until two months thereafter.

It is alleged that, because of the delay consequent upon the nondelivery of the car load of material, the plaintiffs were compelled to suspend work on the construction of the courthouse about the middle of June, 1906; that they were compelled to keep certain of their men employed upon the construction of the courthouse on wages; that by reason of said nondelivery they were compelled to pay E. A. Zobell $3 per day for 45 days, amounting to $135 during which time Zobell was idle by reason of the nondelivery of said car of material; that petitioner H. A. Carr, by reason of the nondelivery of said car of builder's material, lost two months of time while waiting at Magnolia, Ark., for said car, which time was worth $100 per month or $200; that petitioner J. B. Carr lost two months of time while waiting at Magnolia, Ark., for the same reason, and his time was worth $200 per month or $400; that petitioners were compelled to expend $114.20 for the expenses of J. B. Carr on two trips from Magnolia, Ark., to Atlanta, Ga., and return, in their efforts to locate the car of builder's material; that the contract of the petitioners with said Columbia county, Ark., provided for a forfeit of $20 per day should petitioners fail to complete the courthouse by the 27th day of July, 1906; that by reason of the nondelivery of said car of material they were unable to complete the courthouse until the 29th day of September, 1906, when the petitioners, by compromise, settled the forfeit, due to their failure to complete the building on time, for $200; that by reason of the delay caused by the nondelivery of the car they were compelled to borrow $14,000 and pay interest thereon for two months, amounting to $186.66. The petitioners therefore place their damages at $1,235.86, with interest from the 15th day of August, 1906, alleging that they were "damaged by the negligence of the Southern Railway Company as above stated."

The ninth paragraph of the petition alleges that: "By reason of the above-stated facts, said Southern Railway Company is indebted to your petitioners in the sum of $1,235.86, with interest from the 15th day of August, 1906, which amount has been demanded of said company by your petitioners, and payment of the same was refused by said company, and is still refused." Attached to the petition as an exhibit is a bill of lading acknowledging receipt of a car of builder's material, I. C. 15934, consigned to "J. B. Carr & Co." at "Magnolia, Ark.," and marked "c/o Q. & C. at Meridian, Miss."

The defendant demurred to the petition generally, because no cause of action is set out, and because the items composing the $1,235.86 sued for are not a subject-matter of recovery, and not the legitimate consequences of the failure of the company to deliver the shipment, as the items of damage could not have been held to have been reasonably within the contemplation of the parties when the shipment was delivered to the defendant. The defendant demurred specially to the eighth paragraph (in which the various items of damage are set forth as a whole), and also demurred specially to each specific item set forth in paragraph 8. The trial judge sustained the demurrer and dismissed the petition.

[1] 1. Necessarily the first question which presents itself is whether the action is one for damages arising ex contractu or is one for a tort based upon a breach of public duty, in which the contract is only referred to as a necessary matter of inducement and to fix liability upon the tort-feasor, for the learned trial judge, in sustaining the demurrer which sets up that the damages could not be held to be reasonable in the contemplation of the parties, must have adjudged that the suit was one upon contract. In suits to recover damages for breach of contract, the damages recoverable must necessarily be such as were within the contemplation of the parties, but in an injury due to tort any damages may be recovered which might reasonably have been anticipated as a consequence of the breach.

[2] We think the petition in the present case is very plainly an action upon a case in which the injured party is proceeding for a wrong, and that the contract is not counted on, though it is necessarily shown, in order to make it appear how the wrong was injurious. If a contract imposes a legal duty upon a person, the neglect of that duty is a tort founded upon a contract. 1 Addison on Torts, § 27. And in such a case "the liability arises out of a breach of duty incident to and created by the contract; but it is only dependent upon the contract to the extent necessary to raise the duty. The tort consists in the breach of duty." Id. note 1. Tested by these principles, this action is not a suit to enforce a contract, though the contract is referred to when it asks for damages. Since the breach of the contract alleged is a breach of a public duty by a common carrier, the action must be construed as one ex delicto. Even if there were doubt upon the question, we should hold, as has been several times held, that the doubt should be resolved by construing the action as one sounding in tort, since a waiver of the tort must be implied when, in such a case, the action is based upon the contract.

Pleadings are always to be construed most strongly against the pleader, and it is true that the ninth paragraph of the petition, if standing alone, would incline us to the view that the plaintiffs were attempting to sue, in the same action, for a tort and upon a contract, but the defendant did not take this view and has filed no demurrer raising this point; and, while the ninth paragraph is somewhat inconsistent with the petition as a whole, it cannot be held to detract from or withdraw the allegations in the other paragraphs of the petition which plainly evidence the intention of the plaintiffs to stake their case upon a tort. We do not consider that the fact of the bill of lading being attached to the petition evidences any intention on the part of the plaintiffs to sue upon the contract, because, as was held in City & Suburban Railway Co. of Savannah v. Brauss, 70 Ga. 376: "The tort in such a case is connected with the contract only as it enabled the tort-feasors to bring the wrong into it. * * * If a contract imposes a legal duty upon a person, the neglect of that duty is a tort founded upon a contract. * * * And in such a case, the liability arises out of a breach of duty incident to and created by the contract; but it is only dependent upon the contract to the extent necessary to raise the duty. The tort consists in the breach of duty."

[3] The insistence of the defendant was that the damages sought to be recovered were not in the contemplation of the parties; and, if the suit could be held to be an action ex contractu, the demurrer should properly have been sustained, because it is very easy to see that neither party, at the time of making the contract, contemplated that any of the losses or expenditures claimed by the plaintiffs would be probable or necessary. Construing the action, however, as we do, as one in tort, it is entirely immaterial that these matters were not within the contemplation of the parties at the time the contract for shipment was made. The tort-feasor is liable for any damages consequent upon his act and which are directly traceable to it, if they could reasonably have been anticipated as likely to be the result of his neglect or failure to perform his duty. In an action sounding in tort, the measure of damages is different from that in an action based upon a contract. In a suit upon a contract, no element of damage is recoverable, unless it can reasonably be considered to have been within the contemplation of the parties at the time they entered into the contract. In actions ex delicto, however, the rule of liability is much broader. "In the field of delict liability is much more far reaching. Here the rule is that the wrongdoer is liable for all consequences which naturally follow from his wrongful act, provided only they be not too remote." 1 Street on Foundations of Legal Liability, 88, and citations. In other words, according to Mr. Street, foresight and hindsight respectively furnish the key to the question of the extent of liability in the respective fields of contract and tort.

The rule, as we understand it, is well stated in Stevens v. Dudley, 56 Vt. 166: "The general rule is that the person who is guilty of a negligent act is responsible for all the injurious results which flow therefrom by ordinary natural sequence without the interposition of any other negligent act or overpowering force. * * * It is the unexpected, rather than the expected, that happens in the great majority of the cases of negligence."

Measured by the rule laid down by Mr. Street in his Foundations of Legal Liability, vol. 1, p. 90, the present action must be treated as one ex delicto, because the law of negligence is one single homogeneous body of legal principle, and negligence considered as pure delict cannot be discovered from negligence considered as a breach of imposed positive duty. Foresight of harm is an essentially antecedent condition of liability, but, when negligence is shown, a defendant, who is charged with the discharge of a duty to the public, is chargeable with all the injurious consequences which proximately follow and which are not too remote. Mr. Bevan, in his work on Negligence (1 Bevan, Negligence in Law, 106), says that reasonable foresight of harm supplies the criterion for determining the preliminary question as to whether negligence in fact exists in a particular case, but that, notwithstanding negligence being established, the extent of liability is determined by the rule of liability which applies in tort; that is to say, liability for established negligence extends to all consequences of which that negligence can be considered the legal, natural, and proximate cause. Upon this point see Chappell v. Western Railway of Alabama, 8 Ga. App. 792, 70 S. E. 208, citing Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Daniels, 8 Ga. App. 775, 70 S. E. 208. The rule announced in City & Suburban Railway Co. of Savannah v. Brauss, supra, has been followed in Head v. Georgia Pacific R. Co., 79 Ga. 353-360, 7 S. E. 217, 11 Am. St. Rep. 484; Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Earle, 118 Ga. 507(5)-510(5), 45 S. E. 319; Wolff v. Southern Ry. Co., 130 Ga. 251, 60 S. E. 569.

We have dealt with the measure of damages, in the determination of the nature of the action, because none of the items of damage alleged by the plaintiffs would be recoverable if the action is one upon the contract, since none of them could be said to be properly within the contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was made. On the other hand, construing the contract, as we must, as one in tort, dependent upon the defendant's breach of duty, as evidenced by the contract, we will next inquire whether any or all of these items of damage are too remote to be the subject-matter of recovery. Of course what we shall say upon this point is not conclusive, except as a matter of law, for of course the plaintiffs will have to prove the allegation that these damages were, as alleged, the necessary result of and directly traceable to the alleged failure to "deliver within a reasonable time." We think that if the plaintiffs establish the allegation that it was necessary, in anticipation of the daily arrival of the finished inside work of the courthouse, to retain the services of Mr. Zobel, and they paid him the sum mentioned, they would be entitled to recover it, upon proof of the allegations as to the cause of the delay. Likewise it has been ruled more than once by the Supreme Court that the necessary expenses for tracing lost shipments is a proper subject of recovery in an action for damages, such as the present case. We think, also, that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the amount they paid in compromise of the penalty for failing to complete the buildings in time, provided the jury are satisfied that their liability to this penalty was due to the delay in the delivery of the shipment set out in the petition. And if, by reason of the delay, the plaintiffs were required, in order to maintain their credit and meet demands when due, to borrow $14,000, which they would not have had to borrow but for the delay in delivery of this shipment, they would be entitled to have judgment, for the reasons stated in the headnote.

[4] We think the trial judge properly sustained the demurrer, so far as relates to the alleged value of the time of the two partners composing the plaintiff firm, upon the ground that these items were too remote for recovery, since there are no allegations showing how or why it was necessary for the plaintiffs to lose the time, and it not appearing, except as a conclusion of the pleader, that these contractors did not or could not at that time have obtained any other contracts of employment of the value alleged. This is especially true since the petition alleges the plaintiffs were contractors, and, in the absence of distinct allegations showing a certainty of profits, it would be wholly speculative as to whether the contractors would have made or lost money upon the contract, even if they had had the opportunity of making another contract within the time alleged to have been lost.

HARPER v. V. HAMMOND & SONS. (No. 4,583.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 16, 1913.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 354*)—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE.

The mere fact that a book is kept in ledger form is not a valid objection to its admission as a book of original entries, under section 5769 of the Civil Code of 1910.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 354*)—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE.

Even if the book offered in evidence in this case was not a book of original entries, it was properly admitted in corroboration of an admission by the defendant that he was indebted to the plaintiffs in an amount approximately the same as that claimed by them. Whether the plaintiffs' witnesses, who testified to the correctness of the entries, be considered as clerks or as partners, their testimony as to the correctness of the books was admissible.

3. EVIDENCE (§ 354*)—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE.

As a general rule, the testimony of those persons who have knowledge of the facts from which the books are made up is in itself primary evidence, and the books themselves are admissible only by way of corroboration. The provisions of the Code are designed to admit the books of original entries as direct and primary evidence in cases such as those where, perhaps, the fact of the delivery of specific items of an account, or the performance of particular services, cannot otherwise be definitely proved, and in similar cases.

4. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

The trial judge did not err in overruling the exceptions of law and of fact to the report of the auditor, and in rendering judgment for the plaintiffs.

Error from Superior Court, Chattooga County; J. W. Maddox, Judge.

Action by V. Hammond & Sons against C. D. Harper. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Harris & Harris, of Rome, for plaintiff in error. C. D. Rivers, of Summerville, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. Hammond & Sons sued Harper in the county court of Chattooga county upon an account, and that court rendered judgment for the plaintiffs. Upon appeal to the superior court his honor, Judge Maddox, referred the case to Hon. J. M. Bellah as auditor, and the auditor filed a report finding in favor of the plaintiffs an amount $13 less than their claim. The defendant filed exceptions both of fact and of law, and the case was as a whole submitted to the judge of the superior court without intervention of a jury. The only exception of law complains that the auditor erred in admitting the plaintiffs' ledger as a book of original entries. The exception of fact was based upon the contention that the evidence of V. Hammond did not prove a complete admission of indebtedness on the part of the defendant, and also that, in the absence of the plaintiffs' ledger, there was no evidence whatever to support the finding in favor of the plaintiffs.

[1] 1. The testimony as to the book which the auditor admitted in evidence as the plaintiffs' book of original entries was to the effect that, while memorandum entries in pencil were made by the Hammond boys at the time of each purchase in small memorandum books (about 4x7 inches), each item was shortly thereafter transcribed upon what the witnesses called the "ledger." In no instance was there delay beyond Saturday night of each week in transcribing these items, and the only purpose of the so-called "ledger" seems to have been to separate into distinct accounts the purchases made by the different tenants or croppers of the defendant. We think it is well settled that the provisions of section 5769 of the Civil Code, in so far as they relate to books of original entry, are not confined to mere memorandum slips, or memorandum books upon which is first entered a memorandum of a buyer's purchase. We think the trial judge rightly held, from the description of the so-called ledger given by the witnesses, that it was a book of original entries. "The mere fact that a book is kept in ledger form is not a valid objection to its admission as a book of original entries." 9 Am. Eng. Enc. Ev. 922; Bush v. Fourcher, 3 Ga. App. 43, 59 S. E. 459; Bracken v. Dillon, 64 Ga. 250, 37 Am. Rep. 70; Hinkle v. Smith & Son, 127 Ga. 437, 56 S. E. 464. This principle is also recognized by the courts of last resort of other states. Sanborn v. Cunningham, 33 Pac. 894; Faxon v. Hollis, 18 Mass. 427; Swain v. Cheney, 41 N. H. 232; Wells v. Hatch, 43 N. H. 246; Jones v. De Kay, 3 N. J. Law, 955; Rodman v. Hoops, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 85, 1 L. Ed. 47; Hoover v. Gehr, 62 Pa. 136; Mathews v. Sanders, 15 Ark. 255.

[2] 2. We are of the opinion that the testimony of V. Hammond as to the defendant's admission of indebtedness was properly admitted by the auditor. It is true that the admission did not go to the exact amount claimed by the plaintiffs; but it included that amount, for it can be construed as an admission of a greater liability than that claimed by the plaintiffs. For this reason, even if the book tendered by plaintiffs was not admissible at the time it was first offered, the error was harmless, and was cured by the subsequent testimony as to the defendant's admission of liability. Whether the Hammond boys be considered as clerks or as partners, their testimony was admissible; for if they be considered as clerks, the bias of interest is removed, and if they were partners in the firm of V. Hammond & Sons (and they testified that they together made all the entries), their testimony would be admissible as that of a party who kept no clerk.

[3] 3. As a general rule, the testimony of those persons who have knowledge of the facts from which the books are made up is in itself primary evidence, and the books themselves are admissible only by way of corroboration. The provisions of the Code are designed to admit the books of original entries as direct and primary evidence in those cases where, perhaps, the fact of the delivery of specific items of an account, or the performance of particular services, cannot otherwise be definitely proved, and in similar cases. Bush v. Fourcher, supra; Swift v. Oglesby, 3 Ga. App. 544, 70 S. E. 97; Alexander Lumber Co. v. Withers Foundry Works, 9 Ga. App. 266, 70 S. E. 1125. As was ruled by the Supreme Court in Hinkle v. Smith, 127 Ga. 437, 56 S. E. 464, the book, when taken in consideration with the testimony as to the defendant's admission of indebtedness, "only tended to prove facts already established by other uncontradicted evidence," for the defendant withdrew all of his testimony which tended to show that he had paid the account by putting an equal amount into a business venture in Chattanooga.

[4] 4. The trial judge did not err in overruling the exceptions of law and of fact to the report of the auditor, and in rendering judgment for the plaintiffs. The only real question raised in the case was whether the auditor erred in admitting Hammond & Sons' ledger. The only parties who made entries in the book both testified fully and satisfactorily to the correctness of these entries, and the case was tried under the rule laid down by Judge Lumpkin in Day v. Crawford, 13 Ga. 510, when he said: "Let the clerk prove the books who made the entries in the due course of his business." Under the evidence, the book which is called the ledger in this case was no more than a "daybook" or journal, from which were copied, item by item, the temporary memoranda of purchases made by the defendant's agents. Only the book of original entries is admissible in proving an account, under the provisions of section 5769; but it is the nature of the proof in relation to the book, and not the name by which the book is called, which must at last determine whether the book in question is or is not the book of original entries.

Judgment affirmed.

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 180*)—"CHARTER"—DUTY OF STOCKHOLDERS—DIVERSION OF ASSETS.

The charter of a corporation is a contract between the state and the shareholders and between the shareholders themselves. The state contracts to permit the exercise of the powers granted in the charter, and not to impair the obligation of any contract made in pursuance thereof. The shareholders engage not to exceed the powers conferred upon them by law, and each stockholder, by accepting the charter, agrees with the others not to divert the assets of the corporation to a purpose foreign to the objects of the organization. As to this matter

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 370*)—POWERS.

Corporations are granted no rights and clothed with no powers except those which are expressly conferred by law or the charter, or which arise therefrom by necessary implication.

3. CORPORATIONS (§ 484*)—POWERS—LENDING OF CREDIT.

No corporation, whether public or private, organized under the laws of this state can, in the absence of express charter authority so to do, lend its credit for the mere accommodation of third persons.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1815; Dec. Dig. § 484.*]

4. CORPORATIONS (§ 467*)—POWERS—COMMERCIAL PAPER—ACCOMMODATION INDORSEMENT.

5. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 367*)—ACCOMMODATION PAPER—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—CORPORATIONS.

If a corporation having the power to indorse commercial paper in furtherance of its business should indorse and put such paper in circulation, a bona fide purchaser thereof will be protected, even though the indorsement was made merely for the accommodation of third persons, if he have no notice of this fact.

6. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 337*)—ACCOMMODATION PAPER—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—CORPORATIONS.

The plaintiff in this case was not a bona fide holder of the note sued on, without notice of the character and purpose of the defendant's indorsement; and the evidence demanded a finding that the contract of indorsement was for the mere accommodation of the maker of the note, and that the indorsing corporation received no benefit from its indorsement.

8. CORPORATIONS (§§ 385, 388, 487*)—"ULTRA VIRES ACT"—ESTOPPEL—RIGHT TO RESCIND CONTRACT.

An ultra vires act of a corporation is one in excess of charter power. A corporation may, like any other person, be estopped to plead the want of authority of an agent to do an act which the corporation had the legal right to perform, but a corporation is not estopped to challenge the legality of an ultra vires contract which is executory, unless some innocent person has been misled to his injury and has parted with something upon the belief that the contract was executed in furtherance of the corporate enterprise. If an ultra vires contract be executed, the corporation cannot retain the benefit which it has received and repudiate the contract.

10. CORPORATIONS (§ 487*) — ILLEGAL CONTRACT—RATIFICATION.

A corporation cannot ratify a contract which it has no legal power to make.

11. CORPORATIONS (§ 487*) — ILLEGAL CONTRACT—RIGHT TO ENFORCE—RATIFICATION.

An executory contract of a corporation wholly beyond the scope of corporate power cannot be enforced against it by one who, at the time the contract was made, had notice of its illegality, even though all of the stockholders assented to its execution or ratified it after it was made. This rule is applied whether the corporation be of a public or a private nature, and without reference to whether any public policy is contravened by the contract, or any interests of creditors are injuriously affected by it. The stockholders in a corporation cannot substitute their will for the legislative grant of power.

Osborne & Lawrence, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error. W. L. Clay and O'Byrne, Hartridge & Wright, all of Savannah, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. The Canal-Louisiana Bank & Trust Company sued the Savannah Ice Company, a corporation, upon a promissory note made by the Crescent Ice Company to its own order and indorsed by that company and the defendant. The defendant pleaded that its indorsement was merely for the accommodation of the maker; that it had no charter authority to indorse for accommodation; and that these facts were well known to the plaintiff. A demurrer to this plea was overruled and exceptions pendente lite duly filed by the plaintiff. The case was submitted to the judge without the intervention of a jury, and he rendered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant has filed a bill of exceptions complaining of this judgment, and the plaintiff excepts to the overruling of its demurrer to the defendant's plea.

The judgment of the trial judge in favor of the plaintiff was based upon the following facts: The Central Ice Company was incorporated under the laws of New Jersey and organized for the purpose of holding and owning stock in a number of subsidiary companies engaged in the business of the manufacture and sale of ice. It owned all of the capital stock of the Savannah Ice Company, except one share issued to each of the directors to qualify them to act as officers of the company. In like manner it owned all the shares, except the directors' shares in several other subsidiary companies. It owned two-thirds of the stock of the Crescent Ice Company; the other third being held by the Electric Corporation of Boston. Each of these various subsidiary companies had been in the habit of lending its credit to the other companies at various times in order to aid them in the conduct of their business. The Crescent Ice Company was in need of money to be used in rehabilitating its plant and aiding it in the conduct of its business. The owners of the stock in this company, to wit, the Central Ice Company and the Electric Corporation of Boston, agreed to supply the funds necessary for the purpose; the Central Ice Company to furnish two-thirds and the Electric Corporation one-third. A part of the money to be supplied by the Central Ice Company was realized from a note (of which the note sued on was a renewal) for $6,000, dated March 19, 1900, due four months from date, executed by the Crescent Ice Company, payable to its own order, and indorsed by the maker and the Savannah Ice Company by its president, Louis P. Hart. This note was discounted in the regular course of business by the Canal-Louisiana Bank & Trust Company. It was renewed ten different times; the principal being reduced somewhat in amount by payments. The note sued on was for $5,000 principal, and was dated October 16, 1911, and became due January 14, 1912. The stockholders and directors of the Central Ice Company and of the Savannah Ice Company were identical, with the following exceptions: R. G. Hopkins and one Mulky were directors and stockholders of the Central Ice Company, but had no connection with the Savannah Ice Company. R. W. Hopkins resigned as director in both companies in December, 1909, and in the spring of 1910 Joseph A. Bailey succeeded Hopkins as a director in both companies. R. G. Hopkins resigned as a director in the Central Ice Company on May 15, 1911. All of the directors of the Savannah Ice Company, except Hill, were directors in the Crescent Ice Company, and, in addition, there were three other directors who had no connection with the Savannah Ice Company. Hart, the president of both the Central Ice Company and the Savannah Ice Company, testified that every director and stockholder in the Savannah Ice Company and every director in the Central Ice Company, except Mulky, knew of the manner in which the original note discounted with the bank was indorsed and discounted. On May 25, 1909, at a stockholders' meeting of the Savannah Ice Company, a resolution was passed ratifying, approving, and confirming all of the acts of the board of directors for the past year. On May 3, 1910, and again on April 13, 1911, similar resolutions were passed by the stockholders of the Savannah Ice Company, and at the last meeting all the acts of the officers of the company in making indorsements in the name of the company were ratified and confirmed. The Savannah Ice Company was incorporated for the purpose of buying, selling, and manufacturing ice, beer, soda, and mineral waters, and generally to conduct a wholesale or retail jobbing and commission business in all kinds of personal property. The charter authorized the company amongst other things, to "lend or borrow money on note, bill, bond, pledge, deed, mortgage, or other obligations and liens," and generally to exercise such powers as are usually incident to corporations under the laws of this state.

[1,2] 1. The charter of a corporation, whether granted directly by the General Assembly or by the executive or judicial department of the government under authority delegated by the General Assembly, is a contract between the state and the shareholders, and between the shareholders themselves. The obligation of the state is that it will permit the shareholders to exercise the power and enjoy the privileges granted in the charter, and that the contracts of the corporation, made in pursuance of the charter, will not be impaired by the state. The shareholders on their part contract with the state that they will not exceed the powers granted in the charter, and agree with each other that they will devote the assets of the corporation to the objects and purposes of the charter and not otherwise. Central Railroad Co. v. Collins, 40 Ga. 583, 624; Midland City Hotel Co. v. Gibson, 11 Ga. App. 829, 76 S. E. 600. No principle is better settled in this state than that the stockholders in a corporation are granted no rights and clothed with no powers except such as are expressly set forth in the charter or as arises therefrom by necessary implication. 8 Enc. Dig. Ga. Rep. 641. This principle has been embodied in the statutory law of this state in reference to corporations chartered by the superior court. "Corporations thus created may exercise all corporate powers necessary to the purpose of their organization, but shall make no contract or purchase or hold any property of any kind, except such as is necessary in legitimately carrying into effect such purpose, or for securing debts due to the company." Civil Code, § 2823 (5). Under the present law of this state, corporations exercising a public or quasi public function are chartered by the Secretary of State, except municipal corporations which are chartered directly by the General Assembly. All other corporations are chartered by the superior court. The primary object of every private corporation, other than charitable or eleemosynary institutions, is private gain for its stockholders. The contract which every shareholder makes with the others is that the funds and property of the corporation will be used solely for the benefit of the shareholders and in the manner set forth in the charter.

[3, 4] It is not open to serious argument that, in the absence of charter authority, a corporation has no right to lend its credit for a purpose which will not promote the objects and purposes of the corporation. First National Bank v. Monroe, 135 Ga. 614, 69 S. E. 1123, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 550; Houser v. Farmers' Supply Co., 6 Ga. App. 102, 64 S. E. 293. There is nothing in the charter of the Savannah Ice Company which either expressly or by necessary implication authorized it to lend its credit for the mere accommodation of third persons. No such power will be presumed to have been granted unless the language of the charter requires such a construction. It is the duty of the governing authorities of a corporation to devote its assets for the benefit of its stockholders; and it would require express language in a charter to authorize a court to hold that the corporation had the power to divert its assets to a purpose wholly foreign to the business which the corporation was organized to carry on, and in a manner detrimental to the interests of the stockholders. The assets of a corporation constitute a trust fund to be administered for the benefit of the shareholders and creditors of the corporation. Without express authority so to do, the officers of a corporation have no power to use its funds for any other purpose.

[5] The Supreme Court of this state has held that a bona fide purchaser for value of a note indorsed by a corporation for accommodation only, and without notice of the real character and purpose of the indorsement, will be protected even though the corporation had no authority to make the indorsement. Jacobs Pharmacy Co. v. Southern Banking & Trust Co., 97 Ga. 573, 25 S. E. 171. That decision is based upon the theory that, since a corporation has the power to make and indorse negotiable instruments in the course of its business in furtherance of its enterprise, one who acquires for value such an instrument, made or indorsed by a corporation, has the right to assume that it was executed or negotiated in due course of business and not for accommodation.

[6] The record in the present case, however, does not justify the conclusion that the plaintiff bank was an innocent purchaser of the note sued on. The note was made by the Crescent Ice Company payable to its own order, and this fact alone was enough to suggest to the bank that the Savannah Ice Company probably had no interest in the proceeds of the note. But in addition to this, before the original note was discounted by the bank, the Crescent Ice Company, acting through its president, Louis P. Hart, wrote to the bank a letter stating that the ice company applied for a loan of $8,000 for four months, upon a paper which would be indorsed by Louis P. Hart and the Savannah Ice Company, with the understanding that not less than 15 per cent. of the loan would be kept on deposit with the bank, and that at least 25 per cent. of it would be paid on maturity. Inclosed with this letter was a copy of the last financial statement of the Savannah Ice Company. A short while after this letter was written the loan was made, and the money was deposited in the bank to the credit of the Crescent Ice Company. The bank was chargeable with notice of the law of this state which prohibits a corporation from making accommodation indorsements, and therefore knew that the Savannah Ice Company had no power to lend its credit in the absence of express charter authority so to do. Certainly the bank was not justified in assuming that charter authority had been granted. On the contrary, persons dealing with a corporation must assume that it has no power to use its assets or pledge its credit, except to subserve the interests of the stockholders and the enterprise which the corporation is authorized to carry on. The bank knew that the principal business of the Savannah Ice Company was the manufacture and sale of ice. Its very name imported this. When the bank accepted the indorsement of this corporation and advanced its money on the faith of it, it did so with the knowledge that the corporation had no power to make the indorsement.

[7] It is also contended that the indorsement of the Savannah Ice Company was in due course of business and for its own benefit, and not for the mere accommodation of the Crescent Ice Company. It is urged that the Central Ice Company and the Savannah Ice Company were substantially one and the same; that the money supplied by the bank was directly for the benefit of the Central Ice Company; and that for this reason the advancement of the money inured to the benefit of the Savannah Ice Company. A corporation is a legal entity, separate and distinct from the stockholders. A corporation represents all of the stockholders, but for many purposes is regarded as a distinct entity. Hence, though one person should acquire all the stock in a corporation, the individual shareholders and the corporation would still in law be two separate and distinct persons. And so one corporation may own all the stock in another corporation, but the two corporations do not become merged, but remain separate and distinct entities. See Waycross Airline Railroad Co. v. Offerman & Western Railroad Co., 109 Ga. 827, 35 S. E. 275; Garmany v. Lawton, 124 Ga. 876, 53 S. E. 669, 110 Am. St. Rep. 207. Although it appears from the record that, at the time the original note was discounted at the bank, the Central Ice Company owned all of the stock in the Savannah Ice Company, except the directors' shares, still, in law the two corporations were as separate and distinct as if the Central Ice Company had owned none of the stock of the Savannah Ice Company. And the latter company had no more power to lend its credit for the accommodation of the Central Ice Company than it did for any other purpose. So that, even if the indorsement could be treated as having been for the benefit of the Central Ice Company, it was none the less ultra vires.

[8, 9] It is next insisted that the indorsement should not be regarded as merely for accommodation, because it was made in accordance with a system of financing the subsidiary companies which the parent company had been conducting for many years. It is argued that the holding company was really the head, having the will and the subsidiary companies were but the members of the body acting in response to this will; that in the past other members of this body had loaned their credit for the benefit of the Savannah Ice Company; and that the ice company's indorsement was really in return for similar favors of this kind which had been extended to it. The fact that these other companies had exceeded their charter powers and indorsed for the Savannah Ice Company and for each other could not render legal an act of the Savannah Ice Company in excess of its charter power. If two corporations should exchange indorsements in order to raise the same amount of money to be applied for the benefit of each, the one indorsement might be regarded as a consideration for the other, though it has been held that a corporation would not be liable even though its indorsement be on an independent consideration. Rogers v. Jewell Belting Co., 184 Ill. 574, 56 N. E. 1017. But this is not the case here. The record discloses that the Savannah Ice Company received absolutely no present benefit from its indorsement nor promise of future benefit in consideration for the indorsement. And, unless it obtained one or the other, its indorsement must be treated as merely for accommodation.

power, and the other where an officer of a corporation undertakes to do an act, within the charter power which he had no authority to perform. In reality it is a misnomer to speak of the latter character of acts as ultra vires, because such acts are within the power of the corporation, and are simply in excess of the authority of the officer or agent attempting to perform them. Strictly speaking, an ultra vires act of a corporation is one which it has no power under its charter to perform. Some confusion has arisen in the decided cases on account of what seems to be a misapprehension of the distinction between these two classes of acts. Where a corporation has charter authority to do an act, it will always be estopped to question the authority of one whom it held out as having the power to act for it, or whose act has been ratified by the corporation after its performance. Hazlehurst v. Savannah, etc., R. Co., 43 Ga. 55; City Fire Ins. Co. v. Carrugi, 41 Ga. 673. A corporation can act only through its agent, and the law of principal and agent is applicable to it in substantially the same way as it is applied to natural persons. In reference to acts which are strictly ultra vires, the Supreme Court of the United States holds broadly that neither consent of, nor ratification by, all the stockholders can estop a corporation from pleading its want of power. Thomas v. Railroad Co., 101 U. S. 71, 83, 25 L. Ed. 950.

In First National Bank of Concord v. Hawkins, 174 U. S. 364, 19 Sup. Ct. 739, 43 L. Ed. 1007, the court said: "A contract of a corporation which is ultra vires in the proper sense (that is to say, outside the object of its creation as defined in the law of its organization, and therefore beyond the powers conferred upon it by the Legislature) is not voidable only, but wholly void and of no legal effect. The objection to the contract is not merely that the corporation ought not to have made it, but that it could not make it. The contract cannot be ratified by either party, because it could not be authorized by either. No performance on either side can give the unlawful contract any validity or be the foundation of a right of action upon it. When a corporation is acting within the general scope of the powers conferred upon it by the Legislature, the corporation, as well as persons contracting with it, may be estopped to deny that it has complied with the legal formalities which are prerequisites to its existence or to its action, because such requisites might in fact have been complied with. But when the contract is beyond the powers conferred upon it by existing laws, neither the corporation nor the other party to the contract can be estopped by assenting to it, or by acting upon it, to show that it was prohibited by those laws." See, also, 4 Ency. U. S. Supreme Court Reports, 747.

In this state, however, the strict rule above announced has been modified to some extent so that with us the rule is that the courts will not interfere with an ultra vires contract of a corporation which has been executed, but will refuse to aid in the enforcement of such a contract when it is merely executory. See Harriman v. First Bryan Baptist Church, 83 Ga. 186, 36 Am. Rep. 117; Johnson v. Mercantile Trust Co., 94 Ga. 324, 21 S. E. 576; Towers Excelsior & Ginnery Company v. Inman, 96 Ga. 506, 23 S. E. 418; Kohlruss v. Zachery, 77 S. E. 812; Cozart v. Georgia R. R. Co., 54 Ga. 380. This view seems to be in accordance with modern authorities. 1 Clark & Marshall, Private Corporations, § 206. It is very clear that the contract of indorsement was executory. The corporation engaged to pay if the maker did not, and until it complied with its engagement its contract was executory.

The serious question in the present case, and the one with which we have had most difficulty, is whether consent of all the stockholders of a private corporation to the performance of an ultra vires act, upon the faith of which another has parted with his money, would estop the corporation from pleading the illegality of the act. Of course, it would estop the individual stockholders who consented. And it is argued with a great deal of force that, since the corporation represents and acts for the stockholders, if all of them are estopped the corporation should likewise be estopped, unless the interest of the public or of creditors of the corporation are injuriously affected. The record is silent as to whether the Savannah Ice Company was in debt at the time it lent its credit to the Crescent Ice Company. It might well be said that one seeking to enforce an ultra vires act of a corporation carries the burden of showing that there were no creditors whose interests might be adversely affected, and also that the act was not in violation of any public policy. But we prefer to base our decision upon the broader ground that the consent of all the stockholders will not estop the corporation from challenging the legality of an act which is wholly beyond the scope of its charter powers. Nor does it occur to us that it would be necessary for the state to intervene where the act is in violation of some public policy, or that creditors should appear and directly challenge the legality of the act upon the ground that it injuriously affected their interests. It is the duty of a corporation to urge, in a suit upon an ultra vires contract, any defense which either the state or creditors might set up. Corporations are, and should be, held to a strict accountability for their acts. In return for the privileges conferred and the exemptions granted them by law, the shareholders should see that no act is performed in the name of the legal entity which is beyond the legitimate scope of the powers granted in the charter. The decided weight of authority in this country is that consent of the stockholders cannot validate an act wholly beyond the corporate powers. 1 Clark & Marshall, Private Corporations, § 182, and cases cited; Park Hotel Co. v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 86 Fed. 742, 30 C. C. A. 409; 4 Ency. U. S. Sup. Court Reports, 746, and cases cited.

The general rule is thus tersely stated by Judge Sanborn in Park Hotel Co. v. Fourth Nat. Bank, supra: "A contract which a corporation has no power to make it has no power to ratify and no power to estop itself from denying." A contrary view was taken by the Court of Appeals of New York in the case of Martin v. Niagara Falls Mfg. Co., 122 N. Y. 165, 25 N. E. 303, where it was held that, where an accommodation indorsement by a corporation was ratified by the stockholders and no other rights intervened, the corporation would be bound. See, also, Perkins v. Trinity Realty Co., 69 N. J. Eq. 723, 731, 61 Atl. 167; Murphy v. Arkansas Land Co. (C. C.) 97 Fed. 723. Using these decisions as authority, Cook, in his work on Corporations, states the law as follows: "The theory of a corporation is that it has no powers except those expressly given or necessarily implied. But this theory is no longer applied to private corporations. A private corporation may exercise many extraordinary powers, provided all of its stockholders assent and none of its creditors are injured. There is no one to complain except the state, and, the business being entirely private, the state does not interfere. Thus, 50 years ago the courts would summarily have declared it illegal for a business corporation to become an accommodation indorser of commercial paper. But to-day there is no rule of public policy which prohibits a private corporation having a capital stock from becoming the accommodation indorser of commercial paper, provided such indorsement is made with the knowledge and assent of all the directors and stockholders, and provided corporate creditors are paid." Cook on Corporations (6th Ed.), vol. 1, § 3.

In Augusta R. R. Co. v. City Council, 100 Ga. 701, 717, 28 S. E. 126, the foregoing extract from Cook was quoted, but without either approval or disapproval, and there is nothing in the facts of that case which called for a decision of the question now under consideration.

In Dublin Fertilizer Works v. Carter, 6 Ga. App. 835, 65 S. E. 1082, in a discussion of the subject of ultra vires acts of corporations, the court said: "None of the reasons upon which the doctrine of ultra vires is based apply to this contract. It is simply a contract made by a private trading corporation with an individual, opposed to no public policy, prohibited by no law of the state, and in which the public has no interest whatever; and, to strike down a contract of this character as being ultra vires, it seems to us would be to encourage dishonesty and a want of fair dealing as to private contracts, without subverting any public benefit. We think, as above stated, that the contract now under consideration was not an ultra vires contract; but, even if it was, under the facts of this case it would seem to be inequitable and unjust to permit such a defense." In that case it was held that the act in question was not ultra vires, and therefore the discussion as to the rule which would have prevailed had the act been beyond the corporate power was obiter.

It is to be observed that in the above-quoted extract from Cook the author says that 50 years ago the courts would summarily have declared it illegal for a business corporation to become an accommodation indorser on commercial paper, but that to-day, if all the stockholders assent and creditors are not injured, such an act is held to be legal. The law of Georgia on that subject has been the same for many years. The statute expressly commands that the corporation shall make no contracts, except such as are necessary in legitimately carrying into effect the objects and purposes of the organization, or for securing a debt due to the company. Any contract, therefore, which comes within this statutory prohibition is void, and no consent or ratification can make an act valid which is absolutely void ab initio. In our view of the matter, stockholders in a corporation cannot by consent set aside and render void a limitation placed by law upon the corporate action. If they could, it would serve no good purpose to limit the powers of a corporation. The shareholders could receive all the benefits of incorporation and not be subject to any of the restrictions imposed upon them by law. See Steiner v. Steiner Land Co., 120 Ala. 128, 26 South. 495, 497. If the view contended for by the defendant in error be sound, then a mercantile corporation, with the consent of all its stockholders, could embark in a manufacturing business or in other enterprises wholly foreign to the objects and purposes expressed in the charter. A corporation as an entity has no such power, and such power cannot be conferred upon it by its shareholders. If they themselves engage in an enterprise wholly foreign to the organization, they would be liable as individuals or as partners, but they cannot, by engaging in ultra vires acts, bind the corporation as a legal entity separate and distinct from the shareholders. We do not mean to say that a corporation can never be estopped, for there are instances where it is, such as where a bona fide purchaser acquires an obligation of a corporation which on its face appears to have been within the corporate power. But with this exception, and possibly one or two others, a corporation as such can never be estopped to plead the illegality of an act of its officers or agents wholly beyond the scope of the corporate business.

[12] The facts in the present case are practically undisputed, and the defendant was entitled to a judgment. The court properly overruled the demurrer to the defendant's plea, as it set forth a defense and was sufficient in form.

Judgment on main bill of exceptions reversed; on cross-bill affirmed.

SMITH v. STATE. (No. 4,787.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 16, 1913.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1160*)—REVIEW—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The jury would have been authorized to acquit the accused, if it had believed his witnesses and his statement; but since the evidence in behalf of the prosecution authorized the jury to return a verdict of guilty, and there is no complaint that any error of law was committed on the trial, this court is without jurisdiction to set aside the finding of the jury. The issue is one wholly of fact, and the verdict was approved by the trial judge.

2. DISORDERLY HOUSE (§ 17*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

To authorize conviction in a prosecution for the offense of keeping a lewd house, it is not enough to prove the general reputation of the house, or of its inmates, or both; for the gist of the offense is that the house was kept "for the practice of fornication or adultery," and the jury must be satisfied that acts of lewdness were practiced in the house in question, and that the house was maintained for the purpose of prostitution. Reputation for lewdness, however, may be a circumstance tending to show the character of the house, and may be considered by the jury in corroboration of such facts and circumstances as may reasonably satisfy them of the essential fact that fornication or adultery was actually committed therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Disorderly House, Cent. Dig. §§ 26-29; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

Error from Superior Court, Hall County; J. B. Jones, Judge.

H. H. Smith was convicted of keeping a disorderly house, and brings error. Affirmed.

B. P. Gaillard, Jr., of Gainesville, for plaintiff in error. Robt. McMillan, Sol. Gen., of Clarkesville, for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The defendant was convicted of the offense of keeping a lewd house, and excepts to the judgment refusing a new trial. The only point made is that the verdict is contrary to law, because it is unsupported by the evidence submitted on the trial. The plaintiff in error relies upon the ruling of this court in Coleman v. State, 5 Ga. App. 766, 64 S. E. 828, and rulings of the Supreme Court in Weems v. State, 84 Ga. 461, 11 S. E. 501, and Lightner v. State, 126 Ga. 563, 55 S. E. 471.

[1] It is insisted that the evidence fails to show beyond a reasonable doubt that the house was kept for the purpose of the practice of adultery and fornication, and that the evidence fails to show that such an act or acts were committed. A review of the record shows that the evidence in behalf of the defendant, if it had been believed by the jury in the exercise of their right of determining the credibility of witnesses, would have authorized the acquittal of the accused; but, on the other hand, it cannot be said that the evidence adduced by the prosecution was insufficient to authorize conviction. There is evidence that the plaintiff in error is a married man, whose family resided in the same town with himself. He did not live with his family, but lived in a room rented in an office building, though he provided for his children. One witness testified that this room was visited both day and night by women of bad character for lewdness. One woman of such reputation was shown to have been there more than once, under circumstances which authorized the inference that her presence was for the purpose of engaging in illicit intercourse with a man other than the defendant, whose name was not disclosed. On one occasion the police, after quite an effort, secured entrance to the defendant's room, and there found a man on the bed and a woman of alleged bad reputation in the room. At another time the policemen heard people talking in the defendant's room at night. They entered the room; the woman was not there, but on search they found her upon the roof, partially undressed; and other circumstances indicated that it was the accused who took this means of attempting to conceal her from the policemen. A witness testified that the defendant had tried to get him to go to this room to see a woman, and several witnesses testified that the reputation of the house and of the women who frequented the place was bad for lewdness. It was testified, and was admitted by the defendant in his statement, that he had paid off a claim for rent which was partly against the girl who was found in his room in company with a man by the name of Lowe. It is true that no witness saw the actual commission of any act of lewdness, but upon one occasion a witness saw a girl in the room with her dress up to her knees, and a man sitting on the bed who was very much excited and red in the face when the room was entered, and who did not want his name mentioned. Another witness saw the same woman in the room when the bed was in a torn-up condition, and a man lying on it. This witness testified that at another time he failed to find the woman in the room, but that the defendant admitted he had pushed her out of the window. We think the testimony as to the circumstances under which the woman was found more than once in the defendant's room with other men authorized the jury to infer that the offense of adultery and fornication, or adultery or fornication, was actually committed in the room in question, and is so corroborated by testimony as to the reputation of the place and the women, as well as by the testimony to the effect that the defendant solicited one of the witnesses to meet a woman in his room, as to authorize the jury to find the defendant guilty.

[2] 2. We held in Coleman v. State, 5 Ga. App. 766, 64 S. E. 828, that it was error to instruct the jury that "it is not necessary for the state to prove that there were acts of adultery or fornication committed at such house," and the judgment refusing a new trial was reversed, for the reason that the probative value of the reputation of the house, as a circumstance corroborative of testimony, either direct or circumstantial, to the effect that acts of lewdness were actually committed in the house in question, is solely for determination by the jury, and the mere fact that a house has a bad reputation is not of itself sufficient to establish the fact that it deserves that reputation, so as to convict an occupant of the house of the statutory offense. To authorize conviction of the offense of keeping a lewd house, it is not enough to prove the general reputation of the house, or of its inmates, or both; for the gist of the offense is that the house was kept "for the practice of fornication or adultery" (Penal Code, § 382), and the jury must be satisfied that acts of lewdness were practiced in the house in question, and that the house was maintained for the purpose of prostitution. Reputation for lewdness may be a circumstance tending to show the character of the house, and may be considered by the jury in corroboration of such facts and circumstances as may reasonably satisfy them of the essential fact that fornication or adultery was actually committed therein. In the Coleman Case the judge, in effect, told the jury that the accused might be convicted upon mere proof of the reputation of the house and its inmates. In the present case, however, there is no complaint that the court fell into a similar error, and there is testimony sufficient to authorize the jury to infer, to the exclusion of every reasonable doubt, that the room in question, with the permission of the defendant, was used for purposes of prostitution, and that acts of lewdness were actually committed therein.

We recognize the principle announced in the ruling of the Supreme Court in the Cases of Weems and Lightner, supra (as will be seen by reference to the opinion of this court in Conner v. State, 3 Ga. App. 475, 60 S. E. 111), that one cannot be found guilty of illicit intercourse upon circumstantial evidence, where the incriminatory circumstances are as compatible with the theory of his innocence as with the inference of guilt. In the Weems and Lightner Cases the evidence showed nothing more than that the accused in each case had the opportunity (provided the female was willing) to commit the offense. In no case would this alone be sufficient to authorize conviction of an act of illicit intercourse. As to the fact of intercourse, this case might be somewhat similar to the Weems Case, if the girl in question had only been seen once at the room of the accused; but, according to the testimony for the state, she was several times a visitor to the room of the defendant under circumstances which require explanation. The Weems Case is really very little in point, because in that case it was apparent that Weems did not have time to commit the adulterous act, which was prevented by the appearance of the prosecutor. As was said in Johnson v. State, 119 Ga. 446, 46 S. E. 634, the judgment of conviction in Weaver v. State, 74 Ga. 376, and in Weems v. State, supra, did not justify the inference, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the carnal act had been committed. The same principle is dealt with in Sutton v. State, 124 Ga. 820, 53 S. E. 381. In the Coleman Case, supra, this court very properly held that in a prosecution for keeping a lewd house the evidence must be sufficient to satisfy the jury that acts of lewdness were actually committed in the house in question. Proof of a single act would perhaps not be sufficient to authorize a conviction of keeping a lewd house; for this offense, in point of habitude, is similar to the offense of living in a state of adultery or fornication, in which a conviction would not be supported by proof of a single act of illicit intercourse. There is no intimation in the opinion in the Coleman Case that proof of the reputation of the alleged lewd house or of its inmates is not admissible in corroboration of other circumstances tending to show that the house in question is maintained for the purpose of prostitution. The decision upon this point is merely to the effect that mere proof of a reputation for lewdness is not sufficient to authorize conviction. The rule laid down in Clement v. Kimball, 98 Mass. 535, that "such testimony often becomes competent when there is other evidence in the case to show relations of an equivocal character," is clearly recognized.

If there was nothing more in this case than the proof of the reputation of the room and of the women who visited there, which was adduced by the state, or if the judge in the present case had instructed the jury that this testimony as to reputation would be sufficient to authorize conviction of the accused, the case at bar would be controlled by the ruling in the Coleman Case. Inasmuch, however, as there are circumstances which authorize the jury to infer that more than one act of lewdness was committed in the room rented by the defendant, the case differs from the Coleman Case. If the jury had been satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, by the circumstances which surrounded the female in question upon the occasions when she was seen with other men in the room of the accused, that an illicit act had actually been committed, the proof of reputation and the frequency of the female's visits to the room, when considered in corroboration of the circumstances indicating that sexual intercourse had taken place, would be sufficient to render the incriminatory circumstances far more consistent with guilt than with innocence.

The credibility of the witnesses as well as their prejudice or bias, if any existed, was exclusively for the jury, their finding is approved by the trial judge, and this court has no power to interfere.

Judgment affirmed.

SAVANNAH ELECTRIC CO. v. LACKENS. (No. 4,753.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 10, 1913.)

1. NEW TRIAL (§§ 11, 163*)—ORDERS—JUDGMENT—DISCRETION.

A judgment overruling a motion for a new trial will not be reversed merely because in the order the trial judge recites, "So two juries have found on the facts in favor of the plaintiff, and I would not be justified in granting this motion, unless there has been an error of law committed by the court against the defendant." The proper construction of such an order is that, in view of the fact that the verdict complained of was the second concurrent verdict upon conflicting evidence, and the discretion of the trial judge was not as broad as it would have been had the first verdict been under review, he did not feel that he ought to interfere with the jury's finding.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 14-16, 330-332; Dec. Dig. §§ 11, 163.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 348*)—INJURY TO PASSENGERS—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

The evidence was not such as to require an instruction that the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover if, by the exercise of ordinary care, she could have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence. The proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury was the sudden jerk of the car from which she was attempting to alight, and the consequences of this negligence could not have been avoided after it became existent and operative.

3. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—INSTRUCTIONS.

Construed in the light of the entire charge, there was not error in any of the instruction of which complaint is made in the motion for a new trial.

4. CARRIERS (§ 318*)—INJURY TO PASSENGER—EVIDENCE.

The evidence authorized the verdict.

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by Martha Lackens against the Savannah Electric Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Osborne & Lawrence, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error. Anderson, Cann & Cann, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. The plaintiff, who was a passenger on the defendant's railway, has twice recovered for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the defendant's negligence. The trial judge set aside the first verdict, and, upon the hearing of the second motion for a new trial, passed the following order: "This case has been twice tried; two verdicts, one for $5,000 and one for $6,192, being rendered for plaintiff. On the second trial, in addition to the witnesses testifying on the first trial, Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Schloss testified for defendant. So two juries have found on the facts in favor of plaintiff, and I would not be justified in granting this motion, unless there has been an error of law committed by the court against the defendant. I do not think there is any reversible error complained of against the defendant, and the motion is therefore overruled and a new trial denied."

The petition contained two counts. The first count charged negligence in not giving the plaintiff sufficient time to alight from the street railway car after it had been stopped for that purpose, and in starting the car while the plaintiff was in the act of alighting therefrom. The second count need not further be referred to, since it is not relied on for a recovery, and there was no evidence in support thereof. The defendant filed no special defense, but contented itself with a general denial of all material averments, including the allegation that the plaintiff was free from fault.

[1] 1. Where there have been two concurrent verdicts in favor of a party litigant, the second grant of a new trial "on account of alleged conflict between the evidence and the verdict will be closely examined to see that the discretion of the court below has been justly and wisely exercised, in view of the peculiar issues and facts of each case, and having due regard to the general consideration of the fitness of juries to ascertain the facts, and the necessity that there must be some end to litigation." Vassie v. Central of Ga. Ry. Co., 185 Ga. 8, 68 S. E. 782; Stewart v. Central of Georgia Ry. Co., 3 Ga. App. 397, 60 S. E. 1. In the case last cited a number of the decisions of the Supreme Court are also referred to, from which the rule seems to be deducible that, where evidence decidedly preponderates in favor of the verdict, a second new trial should not be granted. In the case then under consideration this court followed the rule announced by the Supreme Court in Taylor v. Central of Georgia Ry. Co., 79 Ga. 330, 5 S. E. 114, to the effect that the power of the courts to grant new trials is not limited as to the number of times it may be exercised, "but the presumption of the legality of such grant weakens upon each concurrent verdict." It must be admitted that the rule denying to the trial judge the right to grant a second new trial upon conflicting evidence, where the evidence decidedly preponderates in favor of the verdict, is not altogether satisfactory. The preponderance of the evidence is not always with the greater number of witnesses, and it is frequently doubtful where the legal preponderance lies. There may be one witness known to the jury and judge to be a man of absolute integrity and impartiality, and, in their opinion, the testimony of this witness might properly outweigh that of a dozen witnesses, whose testimony might not, on account of interest or bias, or friendship for one of the parties, or on account of the knowledge the judge or the jury might have of their character, be entitled to as much weight as that of the one witness upon whose testimony the verdict was based. These are some of the considerations which give sanctity to the jury's finding after it has met the approval of the trial judge. Frequently from the printed record the preponderance of the evidence seems to be against the verdict, and sometimes it is actually so; but the reviewing court is not in as good position to determine where the preponderance lies as is the judge who has presided during the trial, seen the witnesses, noted their manner of testifying, and has felt the force of that indefinable something which can only be derived from the atmosphere of the trial. Sometimes truth can be felt when it cannot be seen; and the trial judge is in a much better position than the appellate court to feel its influence and recognize its presence.

While under the law of this state, the line between the duty of the trial judge and that of the jury is clearly marked, and their functions are separate and distinct, the duty of the judge being confined to instructing the jury in the principles of law applicable to the case and in policing the trial to see that no element of unfairness enters into it, and that of the jury being to find the facts and apply the principles of law as given them in charge by the court, still the judge is given the power to veto the jury's finding of the facts, and such finding will not be approved by the reviewing court, unless it has received the express or implied sanction of the trial judge; and this would seem to apply without reference to the number of concurrent verdicts of the jury, although we are not called on now to decide whether or not the veto power of the judge might be lost after a number of concurrent verdicts have been returned in favor of the same party. But the sanction of the verdict by the trial judge need not be express; it is to be implied from his failure to disapprove, evidenced by the overruling of the motion to set aside the verdict. Whenever a motion for a new trial is overruled by the presiding judge, there is a presumption that the verdict has met with his approval, because it is his duty, when considering the motion, to pass upon the facts; and this court is bound to presume that he has performed this duty, unless the contrary affirmatively appears. Hence it follows that he who asserts that the trial judge has failed to exercise the discretion imposed upon him by law, and which the law imperatively requires him to exercise, must bring clear and unmistakable proof of that fact. If, in passing upon the motion for a new trial, the trial judge asserts in his order that he has no authority to interfere with the jury's finding upon the issues of fact, he has failed to exercise the discretion imposed upon him by law, and the case will be dealt with upon the assumption that the judge would have granted a new trial if he had thought he had the power to do so. See Merchants' & Miners' Transportation Co. v. Corcoran, 4 Ga. App. 654, 62 S. E. 130; Savannah Electric Co. v. Badenhop, 6 Ga. App. 371, 376, 65 S. E. 50; Walters v. State, 6 Ga. App. 563, 566, 65 S. E. 357; Livingston v. Taylor, 132 Ga. 9, 63 S. E. 694; Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Harden, 118 Ga. 453, 38 S. E. 949. If, however, the order of the trial judge is equivocal and susceptible of two constructions, that interpretation will be given it which is in consonance with the theory that the trial judge has performed his duty and exercised the discretion vested in him by law.

Some stress is laid by the defendant in error upon the fact that this is the second verdict, and that the judge has not as broad discretion as he would have had had the finding in the plaintiff's favor been the first one. It is true that the judge's discretion is somewhat weakened after the second verdict, but in passing upon the second verdict it is as much his duty to exercise whatever discretion he had as it is to exercise the broader discretion with which the law vests him in dealing with the first verdict. Evidently the purpose of the law is to require the trial judge to give more force and effect to each succeeding verdict. It makes no difference how greatly the evidence may preponderate in favor of the verdict, if there be a conflict, however slight, the discretion of the trial judge in setting the first verdict aside will never be controlled. In reviewing that verdict he may enter the jury box and become both judge and jury. In reviewing the second verdict he may and ought to resolve his doubts in favor of the jury's finding. And with each succeeding verdict the power of the jury increases, and that of the judge diminishes in a corresponding degree. If the judge is clear that the second verdict is wrong, he should set it aside; but if, in passing upon the second verdict, the trial judge entertains doubt in reference to the truth of the case, and in overruling the motion for a new trial says, in substance, "Had I been on the jury, I would probably not have found this verdict, but the question is doubtful, and I will resolve my doubts in favor of the jury's finding," he would be doing merely what the law says he ought to do, and an order to that effect would not be regarded as such a disapproval of the verdict as that the reviewing court would be bound to assume that the judge had failed to exercise the discretion imposed upon him by law. In the present case the trial judge said: "So two juries have found on the facts in favor of the plaintiff, and I would not be justified in granting this motion, unless there has been an error of law committed by the court against the defendant." In the light of the principles above discussed, and especially of the rule which requires us to assume, until the contrary appears, that the judge has performed his duty, what construction should be given this order? It means, we think, simply that the judge was of the opinion that, in view of the fact that this was a second verdict, he did not have as broad discretion as he would have had in dealing with a first verdict; and that for that reason he would not be justified, under the rules of law applicable to the case, in setting aside the verdict. In other words, that while he would not, perhaps, have made the finding had he been on the jury, he did not feel that, with the diminished discretion which the law gives him, it would be right to set the verdict aside. The trial judge who passed upon this motion is one of the fairest and ablest magistrates whose decisions are subject to review by this court. He is familiar with the rule of law which requires him, in passing upon a motion for a new trial, to exercise such discretion as the law imposes upon him. Properly construed, we do not think there is anything in the order which requires a finding that he has failed to perform this duty.

[2] 2. It remains to be determined whether any error of law has been committed of sufficient materiality to require a reversal of the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial. The judge charged the jury, in substance, that if the defendant failed to exercise extraordinary care in giving the plaintiff reasonable time in which to alight from the car, and negligently caused the car to move while she was in the act of alighting, and the injury was due to this failure to exercise such extraordinary care, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover. Error is assigned upon this instruction, upon the ground that the court failed, in the same connection, to charge the jury that the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover if, by the exercise of ordinary care, she could have avoided the injury. In another part of the charge the jury were distinctly instructed that the plaintiff could not recover if the injury was caused by her own negligence, or if she could have avoided the consequences to herself caused by the defendant's negligence. The duty imposed by law upon the plaintiff to exercise ordinary care to avoid the consequences of the defendant's negligence does not arise until that negligence is existing, and is either apparent, or the circumstances are such that an ordinarily prudent person would have reason to apprehend its existence. Western & Atlantic Railroad Co. v.

Ferguson, 113 Ga. 708, 39 S. E. 306, 54 L. R. A. 802. It has been several times held that, where the pleadings and the evidence require it, the judge, even in the absence of a written request, should charge the jury that a plaintiff cannot recover on account of negligence, the consequences of which he could have avoided by the exercise of ordinary care. And where there is a general denial of the allegation that the plaintiff was free from fault it is not essential that this rule of law should be pleaded as an affirmative defense. West End Ry. Co. v. Mozely, 79 Ga. 463, 4 S. E. 324; Atlanta Ry. Co. v. Gardner, 122 Ga. 82, 49 S. E. 818; Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Co. v. Canty, 12 Ga. App. 411, 77 S. E. 859. In cases of suits by employees before the passage of the act of 1909, it was held that, if the judge instructed the jury that before the plaintiff could recover he must be entirely free from fault or negligence, it was not erroneous to fail to charge that he could not recover if, by the exercise of ordinary care, he could have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence. Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Thompson, 113 Ga. 983, 39 S. E. 483; Georgia, Florida & Alabama Ry. Co. v. Sasser, 4 Ga. App. 278, 61 S. E. 505. These decisions doubtless proceed upon the theory that an employé could not be wholly free from fault if, by the exercise of ordinary care, he could have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence, and that for this reason a general instruction that he must have been entirely free from fault or negligence was sufficient, in the absence of a written request for a more specific charge. It is, of course, not erroneous to fail to charge the rule of law now under consideration, unless both the pleadings and the evidence require such an instruction.

In the present case, the plaintiff having alleged that she was wholly free from fault, and this allegation having been denied, the pleadings were sufficient, under the authority of the Mozely and Gardner Cases, above cited, to raise an issue as to whether she could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence. On principle it would seem that this rule of law constitutes an affirmative defense, and should be specially pleaded. Certainly, whether specially pleaded or not, it should not be given in charge, unless the jury would be authorized to find that the plaintiff could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence. According to the testimony for the plaintiff, the car had come to a full stop, and she was in the act of alighting, when the car gave a sudden jerk, and she was thrown to the pavement. According to the testimony of the conductor and motorman and some of the passengers, the car had stopped, and the plaintiff was standing on the step, when she suddenly tumbled over as if she had been pushed forward; there was no jerk, and the car was not in motion. One witness testified that the plaintiff fell after she had gotten off the car. One of the defendant's witnesses testified that the plaintiff was standing on the running board and stepped off while the car was moving, and the jerk of the car precipitated her to the ground. The jury evidently accepted the plaintiff's version of the transaction, and, if that be the truth of the case, the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury was the negligence of the motorman in suddenly starting the car forward before she had time to alight. Under this theory the rule of law invoked, requiring the plaintiff to exercise ordinary care to avoid the consequences of the defendant's negligence, was not applicable; for, as was said by this court in the case of the Georgia, Florida & Alabama Ry. Co. v. Sasser, supra, "the beginning and the end of the whole casualty were included in the same twinkling of an eye," and there was nothing which the plaintiff could have done to avoid the consequences of the defendant's negligence after it became existent and operative. If the testimony of most of the defendant's witnesses be accepted as the truth of the case, the plaintiff's injury was the result of pure accident, for which nobody was to blame, and there was no negligence, the consequences of which it was her duty to avoid. Under the testimony of the witness Mrs. Schloss the defendant was not negligent in failing to stop the car before it reached the street crossing where the plaintiff desired to alight. If the plaintiff attempted to step off the moving car before it reached her destination, without the knowledge of the motorman, the defendant was guilty of no negligence. If the defendant was negligent in failing to stop promptly at the street crossing, the sudden jerk, and not the failure to stop, was the proximate cause of the injury; for, according to the testimony of Mrs. Schloss, the plaintiff was precipitated to the ground in consequence of a jerk, which the plaintiff had no reason to anticipate, and the consequences of which she could not have avoided. So that under no view of the evidence was an instruction upon this theory demanded.

The plaintiff in error relies upon the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of West End Ry. Co. v. Mozely, 79 Ga. 463, 4 S. E. 324. In that case the following instruction was held to be erroneous, because the judge failed to qualify it by charging that the plaintiff must have used ordinary care to avoid the consequences of the defendant's negligence: "If the plaintiff signaled the driver to stop, and the driver did not stop so as to allow the plaintiff reasonable opportunity to alight with safety, but the driver only slackened his speed, and the plaintiff, to avoid being carried beyond his destination, and availing himself of what opportunity was afforded him to alight, endeavored to get off the car while in motion and was thrown by a sudden jerk of the car, the defendant would be liable, provided you believe from the evidence that the driver was negligent in not stopping the car altogether." The Supreme Court held that this charge should have been further qualified by saying, "If the jury further believed that the plaintiff used all reasonable and ordinary care and diligence to avoid the consequences of the defendant's negligence to himself." Under the instruction just quoted the negligence of the defendant consisted in failing to stop the car at the plaintiff's destination. This negligence was necessarily apparent to the plaintiff. It was therefore his duty to use ordinary care to avoid the consequences of the negligence of the defendant in taking him beyond his destination. The act of attempting to alight from the moving car at his destination was not necessarily, as a matter of law, such negligence as would completely defeat his right to recover; but if he was lacking in ordinary care, and by the exercise of such diligence could have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence, he was not entitled to recover. There is no theory of the evidence in the present case which would bring it within the rule announced in the Mozely Case, unless it be that contained in the testimony of the defendant's witness Mrs. Schloss. While this witness does testify that the plaintiff was in the act of alighting from the moving car, taking her testimony altogether, the car suddenly started while the plaintiff was in the act of alighting, and this negligent act in suddenly starting the car was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries. If the motorman knew that the plaintiff was endeavoring to alight, and suddenly accelerated the speed of the car, there was nothing that the plaintiff could have done to avoid the consequences of this act of negligence after it became apparent. On the other hand, if the motorman did not know, and by the exercise of due diligence could not ascertain, that the plaintiff was attempting to alight from the moving car, he was not guilty of negligence in moving it forward. Even assuming that the testimony of this witness is the truth of the transaction, the car was moving slowly when the plaintiff attempted to alight, and she doubtless would not have been injured at all if the speed of the car had not suddenly been increased. The sudden increase of speed, and not the failure to stop at the street crossing, was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's damage. So that, under any theory of the evidence, the jury were compelled to find that the plaintiff's injuries resulted from the negligence of the defendant in suddenly jerking the car forward, and this was done so quickly that no amount of diligence would have availed the plaintiff after this negligence became apparent to her.

[3] 3. Complaint is also made of a charge which instructed the jury negatively that the plaintiff would not have a right to recover if her injuries were not due to one or more acts enumerated in the charge, among others, to the failure to warn her of the intention to start the car. The trial judge added that, if the plaintiff's injuries were due to the defendant's failure of duty in the respect indicated, she would have a right to recover. Taken alone, this extract from the charge might be subject to the criticism that it assumed that certain acts on the part of the defendant would be negligence, whereas this was a question exclusively for determination by the jury; but when it is read in the light of the entire charge (which is manifestly fair to the defendant, and, taken as a whole, clearly states the rule of law applicable to the case, and also the rule that it is for the jury to say whether the defendant has been negligent in the several respects alleged in the petition), we do not think a new trial is demanded on account of this extract.

[4] 4. The evidence fully authorized the verdict. The plaintiff in error contends that the great preponderance of the evidence is with the defendant and urges this as a reason why the judgment should be reversed because the judge failed to unqualifiedly approve the verdict. As illustrating what we have said above about doubts in reference to where the preponderance of the evidence lies, the evidence makes a different impression upon our minds from that which it has made upon counsel for the defendant. It is true the defendant had the greater number of witnesses, but the theory presented by them that the plaintiff, without any reason apparently for so doing, stood for some time on the step of the car, which had already stopped at her destination, and suddenly tumbled off without fault on the part of the defendant, and without any proof that she had had a sudden accession of illness, is very much more unreasonable than her theory that she was in the act of alighting from the car, which had come to a stop, and the motorman suddenly moved the car forward, and she was thrown to the ground. The plaintiff was a woman 56 years of age, and in all probability could not alight from a car as rapidly as could a person younger and more vigorous. One of the defendant's witnesses was impeached by proof of contradictory statements. The verdict was not legally excessive, and the judge did not err in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

HYER v. C. E. HOLMES & CO. (No. 4,381.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 25, 1913.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PLEADING (§ 308*)—WRITTEN INSTRUMENT—ATTACHMENT.

The court did not err in overruling the demurrers to the defendant's answer after the answer had been amended.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 54, 935-941; Dec. Dig. § 308.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 237*)—APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1052*)—EVIDENCE (§ 443*)—AMENDMENT—CONFORMITY TO EVIDENCE—PAROL TESTIMONY—WRITTEN CONTRACT.

Either party to a cause may, by proper amendment, conform his pleadings to the evidence which has been introduced, and after such amendment the court may properly refuse to rule out testimony, though it would originally have been irrelevant or incompetent. Under the amendment allowed by the court in this case, without objection, the oral evidence touching the written contract originally alleged in the petition was relevant and competent, and the court did not err in overruling the motion to exclude this testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 603-619; Dec. Dig. § 237.* Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4171-4177; Dec. Dig. § 1052.* Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2048-2051; Dec. Dig. § 443.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 94*)—"BURDEN OF PROOF"—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

One who assumes the burden of proof is only required to carry the burden of evidence until his contention has been prima facie established. The position of the "burden of proof" is determined by the pleadings, and as to this the burden of proof is unchanging; once imposed it remains. But the burden of testimony may be shifted and alternate between the parties according to the contingencies and crises of the trial.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 904-907; vol. 8, p. 7593.]

4. TRIAL (§ 234*)—EVIDENCE (§ 75*)—PRESUMPTIONS—EVIDENCE WITHHELD.

A trial judge in declaring that the party having the burden of evidence with regard to a particular fact has so discharged it that the burden of evidence has been shifted to his opponent may properly consider the question as to which party has within his possession or control the more precise and conclusive knowledge as to the particular fact or facts in issue. Generally, facts that are peculiarly within the knowledge of a party must be proved by him, and a judge may more promptly discharge a litigant from his burden of evidence either when knowledge as to the proposition is peculiarly within the power of his opponent, or where the proposition is a negative one. Where the means of proving a negative are not within the power of one of the parties, but all the proof on the subject is within the control of the other, who, if the negative is not true, can disprove it at once, the truth of the negative averment can be presumed from the fact that the party who has within his power proof (if such exists) that the negative is not true still withholds or does not produce such proof. In other words, in such a case, the burden of proof is thrown upon the party having the power to produce such proof to prove the affirmative against the negative averment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 534-538, 566; Dec. Dig. § 234.* Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 95; Dec. Dig. § 75.*]

5. PLEADING (§ 237*)—AMENDMENT—SCOPE.

It is not error to allow an amendment to the pleadings, after the close of the evidence and the argument of counsel, provided the amendment is supported by evidence, and is not otherwise objectionable for such reason as the introduction of new parties or a new cause of action, and the like.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 603-619; Dec. Dig. § 237.*]

6. CONTINUANCE (§ 46*)—GROUNDS—SURPRISE—MOTION.

A motion for continuance based upon the ground of surprise is defective, unless the court is advised in the showing for continuance wherein and in what respect the movant is not prepared to proceed with the trial, and how or why he will be better prepared to meet the issue in the event the court should continue the case upon his motion.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

7. EVIDENCE (§ 90*)—"ONUS PROBANDI."

The meaning of the term "onus probandi" is that, if the party who has the burden of proof does not offer any evidence in the case, the issue must be found against him (citing 1 Words and Phrases 906).

Error from City Court of Moultrie; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Action by J. W. Hyer against C. E. Holmes & Co. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

E. L. Bryan, of Moultrie, for plaintiff in error. T. H. Parker and Shipp & Kline, all of Moultrie, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff in error brought suit against C. E. Holmes & Co. upon a note for $3,500 and interest and attorney's fees. The note was payable to the order of the People's Bank of Pensacola, Fla., and in the course of the trial the petition was amended to show that it had been duly transferred and assigned to the plaintiff. The firm of C. E. Holmes & Co. was composed of several persons, and both the partnership and the individuals composing it were sued, but C. E. Holmes was the only partner served. Several amendments to his original answer, which were presented to and allowed by the court, are made the subject-matter of exception. As set out in his answer, as finally amended, his defense rested upon the proposition that he had sold to Hyer, the plaintiff, his fourth interest in the firm of C. E. Holmes & Co., upon Hyer's agreement to pay him $10,000 for his interest, and also to pay the debts of the firm, provided they did not exceed $35,000; that of these partnership debts the sum of $6,000 was due to Holmes himself, as was also the note in suit; and that he not only did not owe the note for $3,500, but the plaintiff owed him $10,000, according to the terms of the contract of sale. The jury sustained his plea, and returned a verdict in his favor and against the plaintiff for $10,000 principal.

$3,500 interest to date, and costs of the suit. This writ of error presents for review certain rulings to which exceptions were taken pendent lite, and also the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial. There can be no question that the evidence authorized the finding of the jury, and, in fact, this is unquestioned in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error. It is insisted, however, that the verdict is wholly unwarranted because it depends upon and was induced by errors of the court in allowing amendments to the defendant's answer, and in admitting and refusing to exclude evidence which the plaintiff in error contends was illegal. Error is also assigned upon the refusal of the court to continue the case on the ground of surprise, and upon the allowance of an amendment to the answer after the evidence had been closed and the argument in the case concluded. Furthermore, it is strongly insisted that, since the defendant assumed the burden of proof, the court erred in holding, under the circumstances of the case, that it was not incumbent upon the defendant to prove that Hyer had not paid any more than $35,000 of the debts of the partnership, as he had contracted to do. We will first consider the assignments of error relating to the amendments to the answer.

[1] 1. On February 15, 1912, the court permitted the defendant C. E. Holmes to amend his answer by setting up that at the time he delivered the property which consisted of his fourth interest in the firm of C. E. Holmes & Co. to Hyer and Gonzales he delivered to them all of his books of account, and other evidences of indebtedness by Holmes & Co., and that since then he had no access to those books, and was unable to furnish a list of the creditors of Holmes & Co. The amendment alleged also that the contract by which Hyer and Gonzales assumed to pay all the debts of Holmes & Co., including the note sued on, was in writing and executed in duplicate, but that the defendant had lost his copy of the contract, and it was impossible for him to attach a copy of the contract to the answer, but that at the time of the sale the principal creditor of Holmes & Co. was the firm of J. P. Williams & Co., which firm held a security deed to all of the real estate of Holmes & Co., and that the defendant delivered to Hyer and Gonzales a written order directing J. P. Williams & Co. to execute and deliver to Hyer and Gonzales title thereto, and that upon this instrument they secured and received from Williams & Co. the defendant's fourth interest in the partnership property. In the amendment the note which was the basis of the suit was stated to be one of the debts of the firm of Holmes & Co. which Hyer and Gonzales agreed to pay; and it was also alleged that the plaintiff had not paid the defendant a debt of $6,000, included in the indebtedness of Holmes & Co., which the purchasers of his interest assumed. By further amendment the defendant struck that portion of his original plea in which he prayed recoupment and judgment against the plaintiff for $6,000 as evidenced by six notes of $1,000 each alleged to be owned by the Citizens' Bank of Moultrie.

In the demurrer to this amendment it was insisted that, inasmuch as the defendant had assumed the burden of proof, he should be required to attach a list of the items of indebtedness, and also to attach a copy of the deed alleged by the defendant to have been executed by himself to the plaintiff and C. P. Gonzales, together with a copy of the alleged agreement to assume and pay certain indebtedness of C. E. Holmes & Co. We think the court was right in overruling this demurrer. A demurrer to the answer before amendment based upon several grounds had been overruled, but no exceptions to this ruling had been preserved. The only question then presented to the court was whether the court should require the defendant (who, according to the allegations of the original answer, had in his possession none of the documentary evidence which the plaintiff asked to be set out) to attach copies thereof upon pain of being dismissed if he failed to do so (and that, too, when it affirmatively appeared that this evidence was peculiarly within the knowledge and power of the plaintiff), merely because in his original answer the defendant had assumed the burden of proof. Even if the question can be raised by demurrer, the court, under the allegations in the original answer, did not err in allowing these amendments because no exceptions were filed to the order overruling the demurrer to the original answer, and that ruling was res judicata. Consequently, if the amendment merely amplified the statement of the cause of action set up in the original answer, without introducing a new cause of action or any additional party, it would be germane and allowable.

The propriety of the court's ruling upon the burden of proof cannot be tested by demurrer, but, even if it could, there is no merit in the demurrer, so far as it relates to this point, for the reason that in the original answer it is alleged that the plaintiff was in any event to pay as much as $35,000 of the debts of C. E. Holmes & Co., and a list of the creditors, even if it were admitted to be correct, would not supply proof that any of the obligations due these creditors, or as much of them as might amount to $35,000, had in fact been paid, or were not paid, by the plaintiff.

As to the contention that a copy of the documents referred to should be attached to the answer, it is only necessary to say that it is alleged in the answer that his copies had been lost, precluding the possibility of the defendant's doing more than setting out the substance of the contract, and it was alleged that a duplicate copy of the contract was alleged to be in the possession of the opposite party and beyond the jurisdiction of this state; that is, in the state of Florida.

[2] 2. As to the other amendment, it will also be necessary to deal somewhat with the evidence, because some of the amendments were allowed after the introduction of testimony, and their propriety depends upon the pertinency of the testimony to the issue. As originally pleaded, the defendant's defense of recoupment was based upon the contract alleged to have been made with Hyer, and in writing. As amended, the contract was an oral contract made with Hyer contemporaneously with and as an inducement to a written contract by which the property in question was nominally sold to one C. P. Gonzales. But there was no real change in the statement of the cause of action, and no new party was introduced. Though the original petition set forth that the contract was between Hyer and the defendant Holmes, and the contract, when introduced, showed that the parties really mentioned in the writing were Holmes and Gonzales (instead of Hyer), still parol evidence to the effect that the contract was in fact made between Hyer and Holmes, and that at Hyer's instance, for reasons sufficient to himself, Gonzales' name was used instead of his own, was admissible. Of course, the rule is well settled that parol evidence is generally inadmissible to vary the terms of a contract, but it was for the jury to say whether or not the substitution of Gonzales' name for that of Hyer's, in the contract, and at Hyer's request, was fraudulent, and the suggested substitution made with the view of enabling Hyer to evade his obligation and avoid paying for the property he had purchased from Holmes. There were introduced in evidence five notes for $1,000 each, signed by J. W. Hyer as trustee, which it was testified were a part of the consideration of the contract of purchase, and the contract of sale signed by Holmes was transferred by Gonzales to Hyer within a few days after its execution, and, in pursuance of the contract, J. P. Williams & Co. conveyed, not to Gonzales, but to Hyer, Holmes' fourth interest in 16,912 acres of land in Santa Rosa county, Fla., with sawmills, eight miles of railroad, and the appurtenant engine and rolling stock. It is undisputed in the evidence that Hyer got Holmes' fourth interest in the partnership assets of C. E. Holmes & Co. It is undisputed that he, and not Gonzales, carried on all the negotiations leading up to the purchase and its consummation. According to the defendant's contention, the larger portion of the purchase price had not been paid to him, and the note upon which Hyer was suing him should have been paid by Hyer and the indebtedness discharged, instead of being transferred to Hyer as the purchaser thereof. It was not denied, even by Hyer himself, that he was to pay as much as $35,000 of the debts of Holmes & Co. as part of the consideration of his purchase from Holmes, and it appeared from the testimony that immediately after Hyer's purchase all of the books of the firm of C. E. Holmes & Co. were turned over to Hyer, and that they were not afterwards seen by Holmes. It seems to us that this testimony was relevant, and was properly admitted, in order that the jury might be able to do justice in the case, and that it is immaterial whether the amendments or the evidence came first. If the court, upon the statement of counsel as to what he expected to prove, allowed the amendments setting up the facts substantially as above, then the court did not err in admitting the evidence in support of the amendments, or in refusing to exclude it upon motion of the plaintiff. If the evidence was first admitted, then the amendments were proper, because they conformed to the evidence, and yet did not introduce a new cause of action.

[3] 3. One of the main contentions of the plaintiff is that, even conceding that there was a contract such as was alleged by the defendant, and that by its provisions the plaintiff was bound to pay the indebtedness of Holmes & Co. to the extent of $35,000, nevertheless, since the defendant had assumed the burden of proof, it devolved upon the defendant to prove that the plaintiff had not in fact paid that amount. In other words, the insistence of the plaintiff is that the defendant, having assumed the burden of proof, failed to carry that burden unless he established a negative, even though the proof upon the subject was alleged and shown to be peculiarly within the power of the plaintiff and beyond the control of the defendant. The point was raised first by demurrer, and then by motion to exclude the testimony in behalf of the defendant, and lastly it was presented in the motion for new trial. Nothing is better settled than that, where one who is sued upon a promissory note assumes the burden of proof (and thus admits that the plaintiff is entitled to recover unless he establishes the defense upon which he relies), he must establish his affirmative defense by a preponderance of evidence, just as the plaintiff is required to do in a case in which no admissions are made. But the terms "burden of proof" and "burden of evidence" are not synonymous. The burden of evidence may shift, but the burden of proof, either when imposed by law or when voluntarily assumed, is unchanging. Martin v. Munroe, 130 Ga. 79, 60 S. E. 253. The legal obligation of carrying the burden can only be fulfilled by producing such preponderance of evidence as to satisfy the minds of the jury when the evidence has finally been concluded. However, just as the defendant may admit a prima facie case in behalf of the plaintiff upon whom the law originally places the burden of making out his case, so the defendant may make out a prima facie case in rebuttal of the plaintiff's prima facie case, equally as strong; and since the plaintiff cannot recover although he may have established a prima facie case, either by evidence or admission, unless the evidence in his favor preponderates, when the defendant has made out a prima facie case as strong in his behalf as that admitted in behalf of the plaintiff, it would seem that the burden of evidence would be shifted, and the plaintiff would be required to produce such additional evidence in support of his prima facie case as would overbalance the prima facie defense of the defendant before the plaintiff would be entitled to recover.

[4] 4. "The term 'burden of proof' means that the burden is coextensive with the legal proposition sought to be proved, and it applies to every fact which is essential to or necessarily involved in a proposition. It does not apply to facts relied on in defense to establish an independent proposition, however inconsistent such proposition may be with that on which the plaintiff's cause depends. If the defendant furnish proof of an independent proposition which is inconsistent with that on which the plaintiff's case rests, the burden is on the plaintiff, not to disprove those particular facts, nor the proposition which they tend to establish, but to maintain the proposition on which his own case rests, notwithstanding the adverse testimony and the whole evidence in the case." Wilder v. Coles, 100 Mass. 487, 490. "There is a manifest distinction between the 'burden of evidence' and the 'burden of proof.' How far the burden of evidence may bear upon a party to litigation is usually more for the jury to determine as a matter of fact than for the ruling of the court as a matter of law. Generally, the burden of proof upon any affirmative proposition necessary to be established as the foundation of a suit does not shift from plaintiff to defendant, while the burden of evidence, or of the weight or preponderance of evidence, or the burden of explanation, may shift from one side to the other, according to the testimony." Buswell v. Fuller, 89 Me. 600, 36 Atl. 1059. So also in the case of Feurt v. Ambrose, 34 Mo. App. 360, 368, it was held that: "The 'burden of proof' which means the burden of establishing a case," and the well-settled law is that such burden "remains unchangeably throughout the entire case exactly where the pleadings originally placed it. The burden of proof in the sense of the 'burden of the evidence,' * * * may shift constantly as the evidence is introduced by one side or the other, as one scale preponderates over its fellow; but, when all the evidence is in, it is legally necessary to action by the tribunal that the final balance be one way. This necessity does not at any time shift, but remains constantly throughout the trial on one of the parties alone, to wit, on him who had the affirmative. This is the burden of establishing the burden of proof."

The burden of proof is a rule of law, the burden or weight of the evidence is one of fact—the former belongs to the court, the other to the jury. "Whether the 'burden of proof' as to a certain fact is on the plaintiff or defendant the court will determine upon the settled rules of judicial evidence, one of which is that the burden of maintaining any issue of fact rests upon him who from the nature and character of the fact has or might have peculiar evidence thereon." Little Pittsburg Co. v. Little Chief Co., 11 Colo. 223, 17 Pac. 760, 7 Am. St. Rep. 226. We will consider the facts in the light of this rule.

The defendant Holmes began the case with both the burden of proof and the burden of evidence resting upon him. It devolved upon him to prove the execution of the contract and the delivery of the property as alleged in the plea. One of the stipulations of the contract was that the plaintiff should pay debts of the firm to the extent of $35,000. At this point the question arises as to whether the defendant was compelled to prove, not only that the plaintiff contracted to pay the $35,000 of debts, including the note upon which the plaintiff sued, but also whether the plaintiff had complied with his contract by paying the indebtedness, or had failed to comply therewith, a fact which must rest peculiarly within the knowledge of the plaintiff, and not the defendant. It was certainly not necessary for Holmes to show what amount was due by the firm at the date of the sale, for the reason (if there were no other) that it affirmatively appeared that all the records of this indebtedness were in the possession of the plaintiff and in the state of Florida beyond the jurisdiction of the court. And we do not think that the trial judge erred, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, in holding that the defendant's prima facie case was sufficient, without putting the defendant to the necessity of attempting to prove a negative as to the payment, the proof of which necessarily rested peculiarly within the knowledge of his opponent.

[7] The strict meaning of the term "onus probandi" is that, if the party who has the burden of proof does not offer any evidence in the cause, the issue must be found against him. 1 Words & Phrases, 905. When Holmes showed that he had fully complied with the contract to which he testified, the burden of evidence shifted, and it devolved upon Hyer to submit testimony showing that he had complied with the cross-obligations of the contract. As pointed out in the case of Little Pittsburg Co. v. Little Chief Co., supra, this was a subsidiary fact, the establishment of which rested upon him, because, from the very nature and character of the fact, he should have had peculiar evidence upon the subject. C. E. Holmes & Company might have owed more than $35,000, and yet Hyer might not have paid a cent of it, though bound, according to the testimony of the defendant, to pay the debts of C. E. Holmes & Co. up to at least $35,000 and more, before he could be relieved from the payment of $4,000 retained by him to meet Holmes' share of any indebtedness in excess of $35,000, and the $6,000 due C. E. Holmes on the books of the company. The defendant showed that Hyer had not paid all the indebtedness by testifying that Hyer had never paid him the $6,000 which C. E. Holmes & Co. were indebted to him (Holmes), nor the note of $3,500 which was the subject-matter of the suit, and which, according to the defendant's testimony, should have been extinguished by Hyer's payment to the People's Bank.

In section 969 of 2 Chamberlayne's Modern Evidence the rule is announced as follows: "The incidence of the burden of evidence at the beginning of the trial is upon the party having the burden of proof—i. e., upon the actor—until he shall have established a prima facie case in his favor as to the truth of every material allegation embraced in his affirmative case. In discharging this burden of evidence it is not absolutely necessary that all essential facts should be established directly by the testimony of witnesses, the statement of documents, or the perception of the tribunal. The party having the burden of evidence may establish his prima facie case entirely by adducing evidence. As soon as the party having the burden of proof shows these facts, the burden of evidence, so far as he is concerned, is discharged and is transferred to his adversary, and remains with him so long as the actor's original case continues to retain its prima facie quality. The position of the burden of proof in the meantime stands in no way affected." Likewise, in section 971 of the same work, the author says: "The burden of evidence may, and frequently does, vibrate between the parties, and is a necessary and usual incident of any contest to be determined by the use of the facts, as the establishment of a prima facie case presents to a party the alternative of producing evidence to meet it or of being defeated in the action."

Under the contract established by the testimony of the defendant, if it was credible, Hyer was bound to prove that he had paid the $35,000 indebtedness stipulated in the contract, and $16,000 in addition, in order to defeat Holmes' right to recover. As already stated, no matter what the debts of Holmes & Co. amounted to, Hyer may not have paid any of them, and the facts regarding any payments made rested peculiarly within his (Hyer's) knowledge. Having proved the contract and the obligation of Hyer to pay the debts of Holmes & Co., the court properly held that it was necessary for Hyer to prove that he had made the payments in compliance with his obligation so to do, or that otherwise he would have failed to carry the burden by law devolving upon him as a plaintiff, in spite of the admission of the defendant that prima facie he was entitled to recover. Furthermore, the only debts which could fall within the provisions of the contract, and which were shown to have been in existence, were both of them unpaid, according to the testimony of the defendant. If there is any presumption, either way, as to the existence of any other debts, it was to be presumed that there were no others, because the books of account which contained the statement of the indebtedness due by C. E. Holmes & Co. had been delivered to Hyer before the consummation of the contract. Hyer had ample opportunity to ascertain the amount of the indebtedness due by C. E. Holmes & Co., because these books showed all the accounts of all the creditors, including that of C. E. Holmes (who had a credit of $6,000). Hyer was served with notice to produce these books, and, according to the testimony, they were in the state of Florida, beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and their production could not be compelled. In Chamberlayne's Modern Evidence (section 978 et seq.) the author well says: "In considering the amount of evidence necessary to shift the burden of proof, the court looks to the opportunities of knowledge with respect to the fact to be proved which may be possessed by the parties respectively. It is often said that facts that are especially within the knowledge of a party must be proven by him. This rule is especially applied where the facts particularly well known to the other side presents the further difficulty in the way of adequate proof that it is negative. Under the circumstances, it occurs with special frequency that the other party is called upon to prove it. It being within the administrative power of the court to decide at what point a prima facie case has been established—i. e., when the burden of evidence has been discharged—the presiding judge may well bear constantly in mind the relative ability of the parties to make proof upon a given point." If it is within the administrative power of the court to decide at what point a defendant who is endeavoring to set up a cross-action has established a prima facie case, then it cannot be said the judge in the present case erred in holding that the defendant was not required to prove that the plaintiff had not paid as much as $35,000 of the debts of C. E. Holmes & Co., for "the burden of proof may be shifted when sufficient facts are established to raise a strong presumption in favor of the truth of the negative." De Lachaise v. Maginnis, 44 La. Ann. 1043, 11 South. 715. It is often impossible to prove a negative, and for this reason the degree of proof required to support a negative proposition and to shift the burden must vary according to the circumstances of the case. Often slight evidence will be sufficient to shift the burden to the party having the greatest opportunity of knowledge concerning the facts in question. The defendant in his answer claimed that the plaintiff had not paid the $35,000 of debts; he supported this by his testimony that two of the debts, amounting to nearly $10,000, had not been paid. He showed that proof which would rebut his claim lay peculiarly within the knowledge and power of the plaintiff. The court did not err in adjudging that at that point the defendant had established a prima facie case. After all, the necessity of the plaintiff's producing the proof is settled by our own Code, for "where a party has evidence in his power and within his reach, by which he may repel a claim or charge against him, and omits to produce it, or, having more certain or more satisfactory evidence in his power, relies on that which is of a weaker and inferior nature, a presumption arises that the charge or claim is well founded." Civil Code, § 5749.

[§] 5. One of the amendments to the allowance of which exception is taken, was presented after the conclusion of the evidence and the argument. The amendment appears to be pertinent to the evidence and germane to the issue. It is well settled that an amendment which meets these requirements is permissible at any stage of the case prior to the rendition of the verdict.

[§] 6. In the tenth ground of the amended motion for a new trial error is assigned upon the refusal of the court to continue the case, based upon the ground of surprise. The exact exception is as follows: "Because after the allowance of the amendment set forth in the ninth ground of this amended motion [movant] pleaded surprise and moved the court to continue the case, which plea and motion the court then and there overruled, which ruling of the court movant contends was improper and illegal." If, as a matter of fact, the motion to continue, based upon the ground of surprise, was properly made, then the assignment of error is not sufficiently full to present anything for our consideration. On the other hand, if the ground of the motion contains a true recital of what occurred, the court very properly overruled the motion to continue, because a motion for continuance, based upon the ground of surprise, must state how the party who asks a continuance is surprised. In other words, it must be made to appear to the court that there is some reason on account of which the party is less prepared to proceed with the trial than he would probably be if the motion to continue the case were granted.

The evidence fully authorized the finding in favor of the defendant below, and the trial judge did not err, either in the allowance of the amendments, the admission of the evidence, the refusal to continue the case, or in refusing a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

MORROW v. STATE. (No. 4,880).

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 15, 1913.)

1. RAPE (§ 53*)—ASSAULT—CONSENT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Assuming that the female in this case was mentally capable of giving an intelligent consent to the act of sexual intercourse, the offense proved was no greater than an attempt to commit fornication, without an element of assault with intent to rape.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 71-74, 76; Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

2. RAPE (§§ 12, 43*)—CAPACITY TO CONSENT—EVIDENCE.

Under the law of this state, sexual intercourse with an infant under 10 years of age is rape, as under that age the female is conclusively presumed to be incapable of giving consent, and the man is conclusively presumed to have used force. Between the ages of 10 and 14 years the law raises a presumption that the female is incapable of giving intelligent assent or dissent to the sexual act, and casts upon the man the burden of overcoming this presumption. After the age of 14 years the legal presumption arises that the female is mentally capable of giving consent, and the burden is on the prosecution, when consent is shown, to overcome this presumption. After the age of 14 years the question of physical development is relevant only for the purpose of illustrating the question of mental capacity. The test after this age is mental capacity to understand the sexual act and to give intelligent assent to its commission.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, pp. 5919-5925; vol. 8, p. 7778.]

3. RAPE (§ 53*)—ASSAULT—CAPACITY TO CONSENT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

On the trial of an indictment for rape, where the female was over 14 years of age, and the evidence showed that she was neither "a lunatic, idiot, imbecile, or affected by insanity," and that, although weak in mental development, she was nevertheless mentally capable of comprehending and consenting to the sexual act, and did consent to the act, only expressing dissent to its consummation when she saw that she and the accused were discovered in flagrante delicto; that she neither then nor subsequently made any complaint, but afterwards on the same day saw the accused, and agreed to meet him on the next day for the purpose of renewing the illicit relations that had been interrupted—the conviction of the accused of the crime of assault with intent to rape was unauthorized by the evidence, and therefore was contrary to law.

4. SEXUAL INTERCOURSE—INCAPACITY TO CONSENT.

There was ample evidence to authorize the jury to find that Lillie Jones was mentally incapable of expressing any intelligent assent or dissent, or of exercising any judgment, in the matter of the sexual intercourse proposed by the defendant. In my opinion the case is fully controlled by the ruling of the Supreme Court in Gore v. State, 119 Ga. 418, 423, 46 S. E. 671, 100 Am. St. Rep. 182, and the judgment refusing a new trial should be affirmed. (Per Russell, J., dissenting.)

Error from Superior Court, Haralson County; Price Edwards, Judge.

B. R. Morrow was convicted of assault with intent to commit rape, and brings error. Reversed.

Morrow was indicted for rape, and was convicted of the offense of assault with intent to commit rape. He made a motion for a new trial upon the general grounds and upon numerous special assignments of error. The motion being overruled, the case is here for review.

The evidence, substantially stated, is as follows: The accused was 63 years of age. The female alleged to have been assaulted was in her fifteenth year. The girl gives the following account of the occurrence: "I saw Mr. B. R. Morrow, the defendant in this case, along about January 11, 1913, this year. He came down to the mill that week, and told me to be sure to come to town, and he would give me a present. I worked at the mill. He told me to come to town Saturday afternoon. The mill closes down on Saturday sometimes half past 10 and sometimes 11. I went to town that afternoon to get some candy and stuff, and he seen me. No one was with me when I went to town. I met up with Mr. Morrow after I got to town. He told me to come down Head avenue; he had a nice present for me down there. He kept on, and said it was just a little piece; said right down there, the last house. I went down Head avenue; Mr. Morrow went ahead; I don't know how far ahead; just a little piece; I don't know how many feet. When we got down there to the old bridge, he went on up in the woods, and I started to turn around, and he made me go on. He took me by the hand and made me go. I didn't do anything; I was scared of him. He didn't do anything, only hold me by the hand and made me go. He didn't do anything until we got down there; then he laid me down. He started to stick his finger up me. I don't know what I mean by 'up me,' right there [indicating]. Then he didn't do anything until them men come on [the three men who surprised the parties], and I commenced screaming and tried to get away from him. I was lying down. He made me lie down. When he made me lie down I didn't do anything. What I done to keep him from making me lie down, I commenced pushing him, and hollered and cried, and told him I wanted loose. Then he wouldn't let me. He told me just to stay behind; they wouldn't see me; they would go on. Then he didn't do anything, only hold me; I got away from him. He was lying down on the ground. He was on his face, his side. I was right against him, under him. I saw him do something with his clothes. He commenced unbuttoning his pants. Then he commenced pulling that thing out. He didn't do anything with it. I got away from him when them men come. He never stuck anything else in me. When I went down there I didn't know what he wanted to do. I thought he had a present down there. When I got up I went up to Mr. Wheeler's uptown. I then went into the drug store and got some ice cream. I don't know what Mr. Morrow tried to do at the bridge."

On cross-examination she further stated: "I went up there with him expecting to get a present. I don't know whether I resisted or not. The first thing when I got up there he made me sit down. He pulled me down. I was standing up. He was sitting on the ground when he pulled me down. He was holding me before he pulled me down, was hold of me all the time. He had a hold on my hand. There was a house on the hill right above us. I just sat down there by him. Then the next thing I saw those men were coming. When I saw them coming he had started to do something; had started to do that other thing; had started to put his hand under my dress. I don't know how far away those men were when I first saw them. I said: 'There are those men; they are following me from town.' Then I commenced trying to get up. I didn't try to get up before that. I had already lay down; he was right in front of me; he was trying to hide me. Mr. Morrow told me they wouldn't see me. Then I got loose and went on. I went a little piece and cut across through the woods, and went in that other way; went in that road. I didn't go back the same way I came. I was not hurt in any way. My clothing was not torn in any way. My clothing was not unbuttoned, disarranged, or anything of that sort. I don't know whether Mr. Morrow and me was good friends or not. I lived in his house. After this took place down there this time, I went on back to town, and I saw him again, and had another talk with him there, in Hattie Wheeler's presence. I agreed to meet him again the next day. I was going to meet him over there about the bridge, near our house, the next day, down below. I had met him frequently. I didn't tell Hattie anything that had taken place. I went on home that evening. I never told my folks anything about it. The first time I told it was to mama Sunday. I never did tell it until Mr. Pope, the marshal, went down to our house. When he went down there they asked me to tell it before he told it."

Two men who saw the accused and the girl talking together in town testified substantially as follows: They saw the girl and the accused talking together in town, and thought they were fixing to do something, and decided to watch them and to follow them. The accused went on down Head avenue in front of the girl, the girl following on behind; and when they got to the place where they finally stopped, the girl was about 100 yards behind him. The witnesses were about 40 yards distant, and saw that the accused was lying on top of the girl in the attitude of having sexual intercourse. He was making no motion, and neither was

she. Neither one said anything. "The girl first discovered us, and she apparently told the accused of our presence. She made no outcry or anything of that kind, and we heard no cry from any one. On seeing us the girl got up and walked off as quick as she got up. Then the accused went on over the hill. Nothing was said by either one of them. The accused did not have hold of the girl at all on the way down there, but went on in front of her. He did not have hold of her when they turned into the woods. The girl made no outcry, nor did she struggle to get away. We were where we could get a good view. After the occurrence that afternoon we saw the accused and the girl go off to themselves, talking, but we did not hear what they said."

In addition to the evidence relating to the actual occurrence, the state claimed that the girl alleged to have been assaulted was mentally incapable of consenting to sexual intercourse; that this mental incapacity was known to the accused, and for these reasons the accused was guilty, although no actual force was used by him in the endeavor to accomplish his purpose, and no resistance was made by the female. On the subject of the mental capacity of the girl, the following evidence, in substance, was introduced: The girl's mother testified that she was in her fifteenth year; that she had been to school in Carroll county about five months; that she started to school when she was eight or nine years old; that she learned to read by the pictures in the book; that she was not bright, and acted around the house like a child eight or nine years old; that she had never had her menstrual periods; that she was forgetful, and did not attend to her work unless her mother got behind her and made her do it; that she would work well when called on to do so; that she could write her name; that she helped the children in Carrollton. The father testified that the girl was forgetful, had learned to read and write by heart, had difficulty in learning to tell the time of day. She was permitted to collect her wages from the mill. She had worked for several years in the cotton mill, and the mill boss testified that she "did not make the best hand in the world," was negligent with her work; that the work she did was spinning; that she ran four sides; that the ordinary hand can run four to six sides, some run two or three; that she was not bright, and was forgetful. There are 128 threads on a side. There is 1 thread to every spindle. She looked after four sides, and there were at least 100 spindles on a side; that she looked after 400 spindles, which would be 800 strands that she kept constantly on her mind; that she got 56 cents a day, and sometimes she ran five sides and got more; that her work was never rejected, nor was she turned off for failure to do the work. A doctor, who was introduced, testified that he had made no examination of the girl to determine as to her physical development, but that he had talked to her and to her parents, and that his opinion was that she was not a normal child of that age, was not able to grasp ideas like other people on various subjects; that she could speak vowels better than consonants; that on some things she was right bright, and of others she knew nothing at all; he could not state whether any sexual passion had been developed in her; sometimes girls while not developed mentally had developed strong sexual passions. This is, in substance, all the evidence in the case.

The accused in his statement to the jury, denied his guilt, saying that he had never in his life had sexual intercourse without the consent of the other party; that when he and the girl left the town Saturday afternoon it was in pursuance of a mutual understanding, for a purpose which she understood as well as he did; that he never pulled her down or used any force whatever, and never consummated the act of sexual intercourse with her that evening; that he had lived in the house with the girl and her parents for a while, and thought that she had as good sense as any girl that he ever saw.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above.) [1] 1. We will first consider the case on the assumption that the girl alleged to have been assaulted was of sound memory and discretion in a legal sense, mentally capable of understanding and consenting to the sexual act, for the purpose of determining if the facts show the commission of the crime for which the accused was convicted. Rape is defined by the Penal Code, § 93, as "the carnal knowledge of a female forcibly and against her will." This definition is taken from the common law, and is substantially the same in every country where the act is made a crime; and both the criminal act itself and the attempt to commit the criminal act have been visited from the earliest times with the heaviest penalties. To constitute this crime two things must concur: The man must use force to accomplish his purpose, and the act must be without the consent and against the will of the female. Though the man may use force, if eventually the woman consent there is no rape; and, if the woman does not actually consent, yet if the evidence discloses that the act is not against her will, there is no rape. In what is here said we are confining the discussion to the question of force which is used to overcome the woman, leaving out of consideration the question of fraud or any other unlawful means, such as threats, putting in fear, or intimidation of any character, confining ourselves to this phase of the question, we hold that the act, to constitute rape, must have been done by force and against the will or resistance of the female. Her resistance must not be a mere pretext, the result of womanly reluctance to consent to the intercourse, but the resistance must be up to the point where it is overpowered by actual force; and any fact tending to the inference that there was not the utmost reluctance and the utmost resistance should be always received by the jury as illustrating the question of force. If a female be apprehensive of the purpose of a man to have carnal knowledge of her person, and, remaining conscious, does not use all her own powers of resistance and defense, and all her powers of calling others to her aid, and does yield before being overcome by greater force, or by fear, or being surrounded by hostile numbers, a jury may infer that, at some time in the course of the act, it was not against her will. The phrase "the utmost resistance" is a relative one; the resistance may be more violent and prolonged by one woman than another, or in one set of attending physical circumstances than in another. In one case a woman may be surprised at the onset, and her mouth stopped so that she cannot cry out, or her arms pinioned so that she cannot use them, or her body so pressed about that she cannot struggle. But whatever the circumstances may be, there must be the greatest effort of which she is capable to foil the pursuer and preserve the sanctity of her person. This is the extent of her ability. Smith v. State, 77 Ga. 705; Vanderford v. State, 126 Ga. 753, 759, 55 S. E. 1025.

Bearing these general principles in mind, let us apply them to the undisputed facts, for the purpose of determining if the crime of rape was contemplated or attempted by the accused. The man goes to where the girl is at work, and invites her to come to town the following Saturday, so he can give her a present. She accepts the invitation, and on the next Saturday we find her in town, talking to the man, under such circumstances as led three bystanders to observe their conduct and suspect their purpose. This fact alone is significant of a mutual unlawful design. The man does not then give her the present, but tells her he will give it to her in a certain place out of the town, and asks her to go with him there. They do not go off together. If their purpose had been proper, if she had really thought she was going with the man for the purpose of getting a present which he desired to give her, they would have gone away together. Instead of this they separate; he goes and she follows some distance behind. This separation is strongly indicative of conscious guilt. When they reached the woods near to the point of destination, the man took her by the hand and made her go. She does not state that she refused to go, or evinced any reluctance in going, or made any resistance to his efforts to make her go, nor does she suggest that he used any force when taking her by the hand in compelling her to go with him. On the contrary, she declares that she "did not do anything," but that she was "scared of him." He did nothing to arouse her fears or to enforce her obedience. There were three men following her, and a house stood close by, yet she made no resistance and uttered no cry for help. She further states that when they got down by the "old bridge" "he laid me down," and then took a most indecent liberty with her person. Certainly she was then apprised of the fact that his purpose was not to make her a present, but that his intention was to commit some offense against her person. Nevertheless, she made no outcry or resistance to this indecent act of physical contact with her person. Her language shows that she fully understood what the act meant, yet her maidenly modesty made no protest, and she silently and unresistingly permitted other suggestive advances towards the consummation of a mutual intent. While she was lying down, according to her statement, he unbuttoned his pants and commenced pulling out his private, and lay down upon her person, but before the act was consummated she discovered the near presence of the three men. She says (and it is very significant) that just at this particular stage of the proceedings, observing the presence of the three men, she called the attention of the accused to them, declaring that they had followed her "from town."

Was not the fact that she suspected that these men were following her most significant of conscious guilt? When she saw them watching, then, and not until then, according to her testimony, did she cry out and endeavor to get away. But she did not cry out when she got loose, but ran away from those who would have responded to a call for assistance. She makes it very clear that the presence of the three men interrupted further proceedings between her and the accused, and testifies that the accused endeavored to shield her from discovery, and attempted to quiet her fears of discovery, telling her that they had not been seen. Is it not perfectly clear that her perturbation of mind was caused by the presence of the three men, and not by any conduct on the part of the accused? Can there be any rational doubt that it was the presence of the three men that prevented the consummation of the act of sexual intercourse, and not any resistance on the part of the girl? If she had doubted the purpose of the accused up to the time when they reached the place down by the "old bridge," she then became perfectly aware of it. If she had been a virtuous girl, her virtue would then have taken alarm.

She would have resisted to the extent of her physical power; she would have made an outcry; she would have called upon the three men who were watching for assistance; she would have gone to them for assistance, and not have gone rapidly away in an opposite direction, so as to avoid recognition. She then goes back to the town, joins a girl friend, makes no statement to the girl friend of the conduct of the accused, and in a short time thereafter she is seen again talking with the accused, and promises to meet him again, "over there about the bridge." Would she have made the promise, would she have acted in this way, if she had been a virtuous woman, outraged by the conduct of this man? Can there be any other rational interpretation placed upon her conduct in the light of all these facts but than this case was not one of assault with intent to rape, but a mutual attempt at fornication, the woman understanding and consenting to the act, and its mutually desired consummation only being prevented by the untimely appearance of the three spying persons. Is it not an absurdity to say, under these facts, that this girl was decoyed to this lonely place by the promise of a present, and there assaulted by the accused, with felonious intent?

We are not unmindful of the fact that she testified that she did make an outcry and did endeavor to get away from the accused, but these statements, as we have endeavored to show, are so at variance with all the facts of the case that they cannot be accepted as the truth of the transaction, but must be rejected as a mere pretense and excuse by the girl when she had become aware of the fact that her conduct with the accused had become known. She did not even make complaint to her mother or father when she went home. Her complaint followed the knowledge that the conduct of the accused and herself had been discovered. But why should she have made complaint when she had agreed to give her aged assailant another opportunity of assaulting her? Further, her statement that she made an outcry, and endeavored to get away from her lustful assailant, cannot be believed for another reason. The three men stood within 40 yards of the couple. Two of them, testifying for the state, said that the woman made no effort of resistance; that she made no outcry whatever. If she had made any outcry, and had made the resistance that she said she did, is it conceivable that these three men would have stood there silently by and made no effort to rescue her from the clutches of her assailant? Would they not have rushed to her assistance if they had seen the slightest evidence of any felonious assault upon her person? They regarded the act, as all the facts demonstrate, as being simply the act of a man and a girl indulging in unlawful sexual intercourse, or attempting to do so.

It may be said that this question was for the jury. Indeed, it was so said by learned counsel for the state, and so it was; but this court cannot assume, under the facts of this case, that the jury, believing the girl to be of sound mind and fully capable of giving consent, made such resistance as indicated that the act intended or attempted by the accused was against her will. The jury must have based their verdict in this case upon the theory that the girl was non compos mentis, and that the accused knew of this fact and took advantage of it, and that it was only necessary to prove that he attempted to have carnal knowledge of her person; that she did not resist because she did not understand the nature and character of the act attempted, and that if she gave any consent it was due to her mental incapacity to understand the act, and that the attempt to have intercourse with a woman of her mental incapacity, even though no resistance was offered, was equivalent to the use of force.

[2, 3] 2, 8. It is well settled that the act of sexual intercourse with a woman who is so destitute of mind as to be incapable of giving consent is rape, though she does not resist. A learned writer on this subject lays down the following as a test of mental capacity in such cases: "The test of mental capacity under this rule is whether she was capable or incapable of giving consent, or of exercising any judgment in the matter." Clevenger on Medical Jurisprudence of Insanity, vol. 1, 202, and citations. The learned author, in a further discussion, uses the following language: "And very slight proof of force is necessary where the woman lacks the intelligence to comprehend the nature and consequences of the act, and to distinguish morally and legally between right and wrong; and, when the man does not suppose that he has her consent, the force required and which is involved in the carnal act is sufficient. But where the will is active, though perverted, the act is not rape, when all idea of force or unwillingness is distinctly disproved. And the mere fact that a woman is weak-minded does not disable or debar her from giving consent to the act, and intercourse with her when she was capable of exercising her will sufficiently to control her personal actions is not rape; and, if there is reasonable doubt whether force was used, the jury should acquit, though the woman was of weak mind. * * * The burden of proof of insanity at the time of the act, and that the carnal knowledge was obtained by force and without consent, rests with the prosecution. There must be some evidence that she was incapable from imbecility of expressing assent or dissent, and when consent is given from mere animal passion or instinct, it is not rape, and a conviction cannot be sustained, in the absence of evidence as to her general character for chastity and decency, or anything else, to raise a presumption that she did not consent.

Evidence of the connection and the imbecility alone is insufficient." The Supreme Court, in the case of Gore v. State, 119 Ga. 418, 46 S. E. 671, 100 Am. St. Rep. 182, quotes with approval this authority and declares that the test of mental capacity is as follows: "A man who has sexual intercourse with an imbecile female, who is mentally incapable of expressing any intelligent assent or dissent, or of exercising any judgment in the matter, is guilty of rape, though no more force be used than is necessary to accomplish the carnal act, and though the woman offer no resistance." It has been decided by courts both in this country and in England that in females of diseased mentality, not reaching complete idlcy, if consent is given and no force employed, the crime is not rape, but where a state of idlcy from dementia or imbecility places the woman at the mercy of the ravisher, carnal intercourse is regarded as rape. See cases cited in Witthaus & Becker's Medical Jurisprudence, Forensic Medicine and Toxicology, vol. 2, p. 696. The jury should take into consideration the mental condition of the woman—whether this mental condition amounts to complete idlcy, or imbecility, or was short of this complete condition—in determining the question of the guilt of the accused.

Applying the test here laid down by the Supreme Court to the evidence relating to the mental capacity of the woman in this case, does it show that she was mentally incapable of giving consent to the act of sexual intercourse? Before making the concrete application of this test to the facts of the case, we will briefly discuss the age of consent under the laws of this state. The Penal Code (1910) § 84, provides that an infant under 10 years of age cannot be found guilty of any crime; and as the act of sexual intercourse implies the commission of a criminal act, an infant under 10 years of age could not be guilty of this offense. In passing, the writer takes occasion to say that in his opinion this age of consent is so low as to be an impeachment of the humanity and civilization of this state. It is a remarkable fact that while in the southern states a crime against the sanctity of the female person is more severely punished than in any other section of this Union, yet the age of consent in most of the Southern states is much lower than in the other states of the country, except in the state of Delaware, where the astounding and shocking age of consent is seven years, although in that state the age at which a female can be seduced is that of 16 years. In Georgia, between the ages of 10 and 14 years there is a legal presumption of incapacity to commit a crime, and the burden is upon the state, between these ages, to overcome by clear proof this presumption. Penal Code (1910) § 83. Under the statutes of this state an infant under 10 years cannot consent to sexual intercourse, and the fact that such is her age is conclusive that the act is done forcibly and against her will. Stephen v. State, 11 Ga. 225; Gosha v. State, 56 Ga. 36. Where the infant is between the ages of 10 and 14 the legal presumption is that she cannot consent to sexual intercourse, and between these ages, in determining her capability to consent to carnal knowledge of her person, the jury may consider her physical and mental development. Jones v. State, 106 Ga. 365, 34 S. E. 174. After a female arrives at the age of 14, so far as the law is concerned on the question of mental capacity, she is a normal woman, in full possession of her mental and physical powers. In other words, after that time the question of age cuts no figure whatever in determining the question of consent, for even after that age, if the woman is mentally incapable of expressing any intelligent assent or dissent, or of exercising any judgment in the matter, sexual intercourse with her is rape, although it may be accomplished without the use of any force except that which is necessary to accomplish the carnal act, and although the woman may interpose no resistance. If a woman consents to sexual intercourse after she reaches the age of 14 years, and the man is charged with the offense of rape, the burden is upon the state, in the absence of any fraud or other unlawful means to procure the consent of the female to the act, to prove the woman's mental incapacity. Legally she is presumed to be capable of giving consent after she reaches that age. It is not then a question of physical incapacity or lack of sexual desire on the part of the woman, but the sole question is one of mental incapacity, and this mental incapacity must reach the point where the woman is incapable of expressing any intelligent assent or dissent to the sexual intercourse.

Let us now briefly make an application of the evidence to the rule of law above indicated, and see if, under the test there laid down, the girl in this case was mentally incapable of expressing intelligent assent or dissent to the act of sexual intercourse. In the first part of this opinion, assuming that she was mentally capable, we have endeavored to show that the only rational conclusion is that she did consent to the act of sexual intercourse, which was only prevented by the proximity of the three men and her discovery of their presence. If we take her own testimony as the truth of the transaction, while it falls far short of showing such resistance to the act of sexual intercourse as would make a case of rape, or of attempt to rape, yet it does show that she fully realized the character of the act contemplated. Was it an intelligent assent? In other words, was she conscious mentally of the character of the act contemplated? Did she realize that it was wrong? The res gestæ throw a flood of light on this question, and in this light no doubt can be entertained that she was fully conscious of what the accused intended to do, and as fully conscious of the character of the act. In the language of the Supreme Court in the case of Gore v. State, supra, the sole question to be determined is whether the facts of the present case bring it within the rule which declares the act to be rape "where the woman is so idiotic as to be incapable of expressing any judgment in the matter," or whether the girl belongs to "that class of unfortunate females who, while weak-minded, yet possess sufficient mental capacity to comprehend the nature and consequences of the act, and are able to bring to bear that judgment which a man with that knowledge would exercise." As before stated, the mere fact that a woman is weak-minded does not disable or debar her from giving consent to the sexual act. There must be some evidence that she was incapable, from imbecility, of expressing intelligent assent or dissent.

In our opinion the evidence on this subject, construing it most strongly in support of the verdict, falls far short of proving the girl in this case was an idiot, or an imbecile, or was afflicted with insanity. Indeed it is not insisted that she is idiotic, or that she is an imbecile, or that she is insane. The utmost extent to which the evidence goes is that she was not a girl of strong mind, or of normal intelligence. The evidence shows that she unfortunately had had little opportunity of developing her mind. She belonged to that unfortunate class of children whose parents, either from a lack of means, or from cupidity, or from incapability of appreciating its importance, refuse to give their offspring the opportunity of developing the intellect. The evidence of her parents is that her educational opportunities had been exceedingly limited; that she had been to school only a short time. Nevertheless, she was able to read, to memorize what she had read, and to write her name. Her mother states that she acted like a child of eight or nine years of age, and that her menstrual period had never come. We attach little importance to the evidence that she had not physically developed. We do not think that the fact of physical development after 14 years of age is to be considered, except as it may illustrate mental development. The opinion that she acted like a child of eight or nine years of age has no probative value. The work she did furnishes the most practical and satisfactory proof of capacity. The evidence shows that this girl had been working for three years in a cotton factory; that she had been earning 56 cents a day, sometimes more. The child was supporting her father's family by her labor. the boss of the mill testified that while not a bright hand, yet she did her work in a satisfactory manner. This witness further stated that her work at the cotton mill was spinning; that she ran four sides; that the ordinary hand ran from four to six sides; some only ran two or three; that he had not observed her ways and conduct at the mill, to amount to anything; that at first it seemed she was not bright, and was forgetful. It is true that this witness said also that she was not attentive and neglected her work, and that she seemed to be not "real bright" that she neglected her work, but the work which she did in the mill speaks most strongly of her mental capacity, and has far more value than mere opinion. As before stated, the evidence shows that she ran four sides, 128 threads on a side, 1 thread to every spindle. Two ropes come down through the spools, called bobbins, and they are spun together; two strands of rope are put together and spun into one thread and put on the bobbin underneath. She looked after four sides, with at least 100 spindles on a side, 400 spindles, which would be 800 strands of this roping to be kept in mind. This work kept her constantly engaged. She could not have done the work satisfactorily unless she had the power of close attention, and close attention is one of the best tests of mental capacity. This witness further testified that she not only did this work for which she was paid 56 cents a day, but that some times she ran five sides, and that her work was never rejected, nor was she turned off for failure to do the work; that the majority of hands run from four to seven sides.

Testing this girl's mental capacity by her work, we find that she did the work with the same skill and ability as was done by a majority of those similarly engaged. Summing up the evidence as to this point, the utmost that can be said as to the mental incapacity of the girl is that she was weak-minded or dull, but it cannot be said that she was insane or non compos mentis. No material instance is given in the evidence of any exhibition of mental deficiency, but the testimony shows that she performed the difficult tasks assigned to her at the mill—tasks that required both responsibility and mentality—in the same manner as others performed them, and that she was paid for her work substantial wages. Her mental development was prevented by the poverty of her parents and by the lowliness of her condition. She was placed at manual labor when she should have been given an opportunity for mental development. Under the facts in this case this girl is very far from the standard laid down by our Supreme Court in the case of Gore v. State, supra, as being "so idiotic as to be incapable of expressing an intelligent assent or dissent, or exercising any judgment in the matter." Without discussing this phase of the case further, we conclude that while the accused was guilty of a most shameful act, he was not guilty of the crime of assault with intent to commit rape. We are satisfied that the shameful character of the act, considering the great disparity between the accused and the girl in age and experience aroused in the minds of the jurors a natural and altogether laudable sense of indignation, which prevented a calm consideration of the evidence in the light of the well-settled principles of law announced in this opinion.

There are numerous assignments of error as to excerpts from the charge of the court. While the instructions as to mental capacity of the girl were not fully authorized by the evidence, in that they presented to the jury the issue of the girl's imbecility, idiocy, or insanity, without any evidence to authorize such presentation, yet the charge as a whole is a very able presentation of the issues in the case; but, in the view that we entertain of the evidence, as fully discussed in the opinion, we have concluded that the verdict is contrary to law, because wholly unauthorized by the evidence; and, therefore, whether there were any errors in the charge need not be decided.

Judgment reversed.

RUSSELL, J. (dissenting). [4] Times without number this court has held that it is without jurisdiction to set aside a verdict approved by the trial judge, if there was some evidence in support of the verdict, and if no material error of law was committed. Adhering to this well-settled rule, I cannot consent to reverse the judgment of the trial judge in refusing a new trial upon the record now before us. In my opinion there was ample evidence to authorize the jury to find that the injured female was an imbecile, incapable of exercising any will in regard to the attempted intercourse. If she was mentally incapable of consent to sexual intercourse, such intercourse with her would have been rape, and an attempt to have intercourse would be assault with intent to rape. According to the evidence which the jury had before it, this girl, a little more than 14 years of age, had never tried to count 50; her father had tried to teach her to tell the time of the day upon a clock, but she had never been able to acquire even this simple attainment. A physician, testifying as an expert, said she was no more developed than a child of eight years of age. The father and mother of the child both testified to circumstances which, in my opinion, fully authorized the jury to conclude that she was an imbecile. Who better than they (if they are credible witnesses) could state the facts? It is true, in stating the conclusion they reached from the circumstances which they detailed, they used no stronger expression than "weak-minded," but the use of this expression is illustrated both by the usual significance of that word in common parlance, as well as by that feeling of commiseration inspired by parental tenderness and a natural disinclination to disclose the affliction of their offspring. I think the jury were fully authorized to find that this child, who had been sent to school three separate times, covering in all a period of more than 18 months, and yet had not been able to learn all of her letters; this child who could not tell the time upon a clock, although her brothers, much younger than herself, could do so; this child who read her books upside down, and whom her parents (dissuaded by affection from using a harsher term) described as "weak-minded"—was, in fact and in law, an imbecile. Above all this, the jury saw the girl as a witness; they heard her answers to the questions upon direct and cross examination. The jury had the opportunity of looking into the face, the eyes, and the very soul of the person whose imbecility is at issue in this case, while we can only view it in the cold lines of the transcript of the record.

The defendant had boarded in the house of this child's father. No man knew better than he her weakness. He inveigled her into the disgraceful position in which she was seen by the three young men (if it be assumed that she assented, or attempted to assent, to illicit intercourse) by the promise of giving her a nice present. This is one version of the case. But what rule of law is there under which it can be held that the jury did not have the right to believe the testimony of the girl upon this point, and find that she was induced by the promise of a present to go into the woods with the defendant, but that when the crucial moment arrived when the chastity of her person was to be violated, she resisted to the extent of her limited ability. There is a period of at least five minutes which is covered only by the testimony of the alleged injured female and the statement of the defendant. Why should not the jury have believed her version of what happened during this five minutes in preference to the defendant—a man of years and experience, whose own admission places him in the disgraceful position of trifling with a child, at best weak and unfortunate, and a member of a family in whose home he had been domiciled. However, without regard to conflicting testimony as to the details of the offense charged in the indictment, I rest my dissent upon the proposition that the testimony shows that the girl alleged to have been assaulted is in law incapable of consenting to sexual intercourse. It is uncontradicted (unless her appearance before the jury contradicted it) that this girl is no better developed, mentally or physically, than a child of eight years. It is well said in the opinion of the majority that the age of consent in this state is so low as to be an impeachment of our civilization. Unquestionably the age of consent in this state should be raised. But what practical protection would be afforded by raising the age of consent if the law did not, in its humanity, protect those who, regardless of their age, are, through imbecility, unable to consent? This protection—a defense against their own weakness—our law has ever undertaken to give to that unfortunate class who are of themselves incapable of exercising a rational choice. Even mature women of as little mentality as this girl are protected by law, not only against the animal lusts of members of the opposite sex, but against themselves as well; and men who, knowing of their imbecility, take advantage of their helpless condition to gratify their lustful propensities are guilty of rape, even if no more force is used than is required to perform the carnal act, and no resistance be offered by the female. To quote the language of the illustrious Chief Justice Campbell, in Regina v. Fletcher, 8 Cox C. C. 248 (L. R. L. C. C. 39): "It would be monstrous to say that these poor females are to be subjected to such violence without the parties inflicting it being liable to be indicted. If so, every drunken woman, returning from market, and happening to fall down on the roadside, may be ravished at the will of the passers-by."

One of the most important elements entering into the determination of the girl's imbecility naturally must have been her appearance and demeanor upon the stand. The judge and the jury saw her upon the stand, and we cannot put ourselves in the place of the judge and the jury. It is well settled that one may be convicted of rape of a mature woman who fails to resist because of imbecility. The female here involved was but little more than 14 years of age, and there was evidence that she was weak in mind. As was said by the Supreme Court in Gore v. State, 119 Ga. 423, 46 S. E. 673, 100 Am. St. Rep. 182, "The jury are constituted by law the judges of all these matters. They have by their verdict solemnly affirmed that the girl's intellect was so weak that she was incapable of consenting to the act of sexual intercourse, and we do not feel disposed to usurp their functions, and at this distance, upon a printed record, without ever having seen the girl, declare that we are better judges of the girl's mental condition than the members of the jury were. The trial judge also saw the girl and heard her testimony, and he is satisfied with the verdict."

I am fixed in the opinion that there was ample evidence to authorize the jury to find that Lillie Jones was mentally incapable of expressing any intelligent assent or dissent, or of exercising any judgment in the matter of the sexual intercourse proposed by the defendant, that the case is fully controlled by the ruling of the Supreme Court in Gore v. State, supra, and that the judgment refusing a new trial should be affirmed.

SNELL v. STATE. (No. 4,980.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 11, 1918.)

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 84*)—ACCESSORY BEFORE THE FACT.

In the indictment of an accessory before the fact it is not necessary to state the manner of committing the offense. It is sufficient to charge generally that he feloniously, willfully, and unlawfully did procure, counsel, and command the principal to commit it. The indictment in the present case was good as against both the general and special grounds of the demurrer.

2. HOMICIDE (§ 100*)—ACCESSORY BEFORE THE FACT.

The verdict is without evidence to support it, and therefore is contrary to law.

3. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 110*)—LANGUAGE OF STATUTE—ATTEMPT TO PRODUCE ABORTION.

Under the express provisions of Pen. Code 1910, § 954, an indictment charging an assault with intent to murder, under section 81, making it such offense to cause death by an attempted abortion, is sufficient as against a general demurrer when the allegations are clear and distinct and in the language of the statute, though it does not allege the character of the instruments, and how and upon what part of the person of the female they were used.

4. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 84*)—ACCESSORY BEFORE THE FACT.

An indictment stating that accused "did then and there unlawfully, feloniously and willfully procure, counsel, and command" the principal to commit an assault with intent to murder, in violation of Pen. Code 1910, § 81, was sufficient to charge defendant as an accessory before the fact, though it did not specifically state the evidentiary facts as to how he procured, counseled, or commanded the principal to commit the crime.

5. HOMICIDE (§ 142*)—VARIANCE—PRINCIPAL AND ACCESSORY.

A person indicted as an accessory before the fact to an assault with intent to murder, in violation of Pen. Code 1910, § 81, cannot be convicted, upon evidence which shows him to be a principal, either in the first or the second degree.

Hill, C. J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; S. P. Gilbert, Judge.

Wm. Snell, alias Bill Jenkins, was convicted as an accessory before the fact to an assault with intent to murder, and brings error. Reversed.

The plaintiff in error was indicted and convicted as an accessory before the fact to an assault with intent to murder, under section 81 of the Penal Code, which reads as follows: "Any person who shall administer to any woman, pregnant with a child, any medicine, drug, or substance whatever, or shall use or employ any instrument or other means, with intent thereby to destroy such child, unless the same shall have been necessary to preserve the life of such mother, or shall have been advised by two physicians to be necessary for such purpose, shall, in case the death of child or mother be thereby produced, be guilty of an assault with intent to murder." The indictment (omitting mere formal parts) is in the following language: "Charge and accuse W. F. Whitehead, of the county and state aforesaid, with the offense of assault with intent to murder, and Claud B. Gullatt, Tom Pace, and William Snell, alias 'Bill Jenkins,' with the offense of accessory before the fact to said assault with intent to murder; for that the said W. F. Whitehead, on the 20th day of July in the year 1912, in the county aforesaid, did then and there, unlawfully and with force and arms, use and employ a certain instrument and instruments to the grand jurors unknown, and by pressing upon the person of Ruby Osborn, she being then and there a woman pregnant with a child, said child being so far developed in its mother's womb as to be ordinarily called 'quick,' and said instrument and instruments and said pressure being then and there used and applied with intent thereby to destroy such child, and by the use of such instrument and instruments and by such pressure the death of such child was thereby produced, the use of said instrument and instruments and said pressure not being then and there necessary to preserve the life of said mother, nor having been then and there advised by two physicians to be necessary for such purpose; and for that the said Claud B. Gullatt, Tom Pace, and William Snell, alias 'Bill Jenkins,' being absent at the time of the commission of the crime aforesaid, by the said W. F. Whitehead, did yet then and there unlawfully, feloniously, and willfully procure, counsel, and command the said W. F. Whitehead to commit the crime of assault with intent to murder aforesaid. And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do say that the said W. F. Whitehead, in manner and form aforesaid, unlawfully and with force and arms did commit the crime of assault with intent to murder, and that the said Claud B. Gullatt, Tom Pace, and William Snell, alias 'Bill Jenkins,' being absent at the time of the commission of said crime of assault with intent to murder, did then and there unlawfully, feloniously, and willfully procure, counsel, and command the said W. F. Whitehead to commit the said crime in manner and form aforesaid, contrary to the laws of said state," etc. On this indictment the principal defendant, W. F. Whitehead, was tried and convicted; and when the plaintiff in error, William Snell, alias "Bill Jenkins," was arraigned he entered a demurrer to the indictment on the following grounds: "(1) Because said indictment sets forth no crime and charges no offense under the laws of said state against this defendant. (2) Because the charges and allegations constitute no crime under the laws of said state. (3) Because the charges and allegations in said indictment are too vague and indefinite, and fail to put defendant on notice as to what specific conduct he has been guilty of, constituting said offense of accessory before the fact in said charge, and fails to put him on notice as to how and in what manner he has conspired and co-operated with the principal and with the other accessories named in said indictment in the commission of said crime. (4) Because the charges and allegations in said indictment fail to put this defendant on sufficient notice to enable him to prepare his defense, in that they are too vague and indefinite and fail to state where, when, and how this defendant 'procured' said W. F. Whitehead to commit this crime; whether by hiring with money or other things of value, by inducement, persuasion, or otherwise. (5) Because the charges and allegations in said indictment fail to put this defendant on notice sufficient to enable him to prepare his defense, in that they are too vague and indefinite and fail to state where, when, and how this defendant did 'counsel' said Whitehead to commit said crime, and what means were used to counsel said Whitehead in the commission of said crime. (6) Because the charge that this defendant did 'command' the said Whitehead to commit said crime fails to set forth where and how this defendant commanded the commission of said offense. (7) Defendant specially demurs to the following language in said indictment, to wit: 'Did then and there, unlawfully and with force and arms, use and employ a certain instrument and instruments to the grand jurors unknown, and by pressing upon the person of Ruby Osborn, she being then and there a woman pregnant with a child, said child being so far developed in its mother's womb as to be ordinarily called "quick," and said instrument and instruments and said pressure being then and there used and applied with intent thereby to destroy said child, and by the use of said instrument and instruments and by such pressure the death of said child was thereby produced;' because said language and charges do not set forth with sufficient particularity and definiteness to put this defendant on notice as to what kind or character of instrument and instruments were used, and does not set forth how said instruments were used, and does not set forth where said instrument and instruments were used, and does not set forth on what part of the person they were used by the said W. F. Whitehead; because said language and charges fail to set forth with sufficient particularity and definiteness as to what kind of pressure was used, nor how said pressure was used, nor upon what part of the person of Ruby Osborn said pressure was applied, nor with what means or instrument said pressure was applied and used." The trial judge overruled the demurrer, and exceptions pendente lite were duly filed. The accused was thereafter convicted, his motion for a new trial was overruled, and he brings error. The view entertained by the majority of the court as to the evidence makes unnecessary a consideration of the special grounds of the motion for a new trial.

A. W. Cozart, of Columbus, for plaintiff in error. Geo. C. Palmer, Sol. Gen., of Columbus, for the State.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [3] The indictment was in the language of the statute, and it is declared in Penal Code 1910, § 954, that "every indictment or accusation of the grand jury shall be deemed sufficiently technical and correct, which states the offense in the terms and language of this Code, or so plainly that the nature of the offense charged may be easily understood by the jury." While this section was intended to simplify criminal pleading, and in fact greatly does so, yet it was not intended by this section that it should not be necessary to set forth the offense and the time and place of committing the same, with sufficient certainty and description to put the accused on notice of the crime with which he is charged and to enable him to make his defense. Burkes v. State, 7 Ga. App. 39, 65 S. E. 1091; Johnson v. State, 90 Ga. 441, 444, 16 S. E. 92. In other words the section in question was not intended to dispense with the substance of good pleading, but was intended simply to do away with mere technicalities, allegations, and useless repetition. We think, therefore, that the indictment was certainly good as against a general demurrer. The allegations are full, clear, and distinct as to the principal perpetrator of the crime. The objection that it is too indefinite and vague, in that it fails "to set forth with sufficient particularity and definiteness to put the defendant on notice as to what kind or character of instrument or instruments were used, and does not set forth how said instruments were used, and does not set forth on what parts of the person they were used" by the principal perpetrator of the crime, is without merit. Even as to the principal perpetrator it was entirely sufficient to allege that in the act he used some instrument or instruments which were to the jurors unknown. Even if the instrument or instruments were known, it was not necessary to describe them or set them forth with particularity, or to allege anything further in regard to them than that the crime was committed by the use of an instrument or instruments by the principal offender. It was wholly immaterial to allege upon what part of the person of the female the instruments were pressed. If the pressure of the instruments upon any part of the person produced a criminal abortion, that would be sufficient, and it is not too much to expect of the intelligence of an ordinary jury that they would fully understand that the use of the instruments and the pressure of the instruments was made upon that part of the body of the female upon which such use and pressure would accomplish the crime perpetrated. It was certainly not essential to tell in the indictment how the principal accused used the instruments; any use of the instruments upon the person of the female which produced the criminal result would support this allegation of the indictment. The means or manner of effecting the criminal intent or the circumstances evincive of the design with which the act, illegal in itself, was done are generally considered to be matters of evidence to the jury to demonstrate the intent, and not necessary to be incorporated in the indictment. Travis v. State, 83 Ga. 372, 9 S. E. 1063; Joyce on Indictments, § 298. And it is an elementary principle of pleading that it is never necessary to allege in an indictment mere matter of evidence, unless it alters the offense. Clark's Crim. Proc. 166; Joyce on Indictments, § 295; Minter v. State, 104 Ga. 743, 748, 30 S. E. 989; Brown v. State, 116 Ga. 559, 562, 42 S. E. 795.

In the case of Hall v. State, 133 Ga. 177, 178, 65 S. E. 400, 401, the indictment alleged that the defendant committed the offense (assault with intent to murder) "by stabbing the said Henry Howell with a certain knife and with other sharp instruments to the grand jury unknown." The defendant demurred to the allegation that the stabbing was done "with other sharp instruments to the grand jury unknown," because it was too general to put the accused upon proper notice as to what instrument was alleged to have been used by him; also, because it was too indefinite in that the weapon alleged to have been used was not particularly set forth. It was held that there was no merit in the demurrer. See, also, Hicks v. State, 105 Ga. 627, 31 S. E. 579. In Malone v. State, 77 Ga. 767, Chief Justice Jackson, speaking for the court in passing upon the sufficiency of the indictment in that case, said: "The indictment is good. It is charged that with the knife, a weapon likely to produce death, the stabbing was done with intent to kill and murder." In other words, that the language was sufficiently specific to show that the knife was used to stab the decedent. It was immaterial in what part of his person the wound was inflicted. The allegations in the indictment in the present case are almost identical with those in the case of Commonwealth v. Snow, 116 Mass. 47, where the defendant was convicted of producing a criminal abortion. The following part of the indictment was held to be good: "A certain instrument, the name of which is to the jurors unknown." "In an indictment for assault with intent to murder, at common law, or under a statute which does not specify the instrument, it has been held unnecessary to state the instrument or the means made use of by the assailant to effectuate the murderous intent." 1 Wharton, Crim. Law (10th Ed.) § 644; Wharton, Crim. Pl. & Pr. § 159; State v. Williams, 52 N. C. 446, 78 Am. Dec. 248. Mr. Bishop, in his New Criminal Procedure, says: "But in the absence of anything in the statute, the manner of the assault or of the beating, or the kind of weapon, need not be stated." 3 Greenleaf, Ev. (16th Ed.) § 49; 3 Bishop, New Crim. Proc. (2d Ed.) § 77 (3). "In a prosecution for administering a drug or medicine to a pregnant woman for the purpose of producing an abortion, it is not necessary to allege what drug or medicine was administered. An averment that it was a drug * * * calculated to produce an abortion is sufficient." Watson v. State, 9 Tex. App. 237. The indictment "need not describe instrument used or manner of use, provided it alleges the kind or character of the instrument, or that the manner of use is unknown." State v. Longstreth, 19 N. D. 268, 121 N. W. 1114, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1317. The allegation of the indictment in the present case is entirely sufficient under the statute, for the statute says that "any person who shall administer to any woman, pregnant with a child, any medicine, drug, or substance whatever, or shall use or employ any instrument or other means, with intent thereby to destroy such child," with criminal intent, is guilty of assault with intent to murder. It is wholly unnecessary to describe in the indictment the manner in which the instruments were used. "It will be presumed that they were used upon her body." People v. Wah Hing, 15 Cal. App. 195, 114 Pac. 416; 2 Wharton, Crim. Law (11th Ed.) § 786. We therefore conclude that it is abundantly established by authority that the indictment in the present case is not subject to the objection urged against it, either as to the character of the instruments that were used, how they were used, or upon what part of the person of the woman they were used.

[1, 4] Now, as to the accessory before the fact. It is distinctly alleged in the language of the statute that, being absent at the time of the commission of the crime of assault with intent to murder, the accused "did then and there unlawfully, feloniously, and willfully procure, counsel, and command" the principal perpetrator to commit the crime as set out in the indictment. The objection to this language is that it does not specifically state where, when, and how the accessory before the fact named procured, counseled, or commanded the principal to commit the crime. These words must be taken in their popular sense; and their use sufficiently informs the accessory before the fact of the crime charged against him, to wit, that he did either counsel, command, or procure the commission of the crime by the principal accused. How it was done was a matter to be shown by the evidence. The demurrer on this point, we think, is fully controlled by the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Rawlins v. State, 124 Ga. 31, 41, 52 S. E. 1, 5, as follows: "The indictment charges that the four alleged principals committed the offense of murder upon named persons, and then proceeds to charge that J. G. Rawlins and Frank Turner, being absent at the time of the commission of the crime, did 'unlawfully, feloniously, willfully, and of their malice aforethought procure, counsel, and command' the alleged principals to commit the crime. Complaint is made that there is nothing in this language which charges the alleged accessories before the fact with any act which would make them accessories. That which makes one an accessory before the fact is the procuring, counseling, and commanding another to commit a crime, and this is the only act necessary to constitute the offense; and when it is charged in the language of the statute that the accused did procure, counsel, and command the alleged principal to commit the crime, he is charged in terms with that which constitutes the offense, and it is hard to conceive how the charge could be made more clear and more specific." 3 Bishop, New Crim. Proc. (2d Ed.) § 8; Fulford v. State, 50 Ga. 591. We conclude that the trial judge properly overruled the demurrer on all the grounds therein stated, both general and special.

[2, 5] On the evidence the opinion of the majority of the court, prepared by Judge Pottle, is as follows:

"Section 45 of the Penal Code contains, substantially, the common-law definition of an accessory before the fact. The accused was indicted as an accessory before the fact, and it is well settled that one so indicted cannot be convicted, upon evidence which shows him to have been a principal, either in the first or the second degree. The question, therefore, upon the merits is whether the accused procured, counseled, or commanded Dr. Whitehead to commit the abortion upon the female named in the indictment. It may be conceded that if he had advised another to procure Dr. Whitehead to commit the crime, he would have been as guilty as if he had directed, incited, or counseled the perpetrator of the crime to commit it; but in the opinion of the majority of the court the evidence does not show that the accused procured the commission of the crime within the meaning of section 45 of the Penal Code. There is no suggestion in the evidence that the accused had any conversation upon the subject with either Gullatt or Dr. Whitehead, or that he, either directly or indirectly, counseled or advised either of those persons to commit this crime. If the conviction can be supported at all, it must rest solely upon the fact that the accused furnished the room in which the crime was committed, with knowledge, at the time it was furnished, that a criminal abortion was to be performed. This was his sole connection with the offense. He did not advise it, nor even in a remote way suggest to any person connected with the criminal transaction that an abortion should be performed. We do not think that mere knowledge that a crime is contemplated and the mere furnishing of a room in which that crime is to be committed will render the owner of the room an accessory before the fact to the crime. 'Any degree of incitement with the actual intent to procure the commission of the crime is sufficient;' but the authorities are all to the effect that there must be 'some degree of direct incitement.' See 1 Russell, Law of Crimes (7th Eng. Ed.) § 117, with references to numerous English authorities. For example, the author refers to the case of R. v. Fretwell, L. & C. 161. In that case the prisoner was requested by a pregnant woman, who sought to procure an abortion, to obtain, and he did obtain, for her corrosive sublimate; being influenced by a threat that she would destroy herself if she did not get it. He knew the purpose for which she wanted it; but, though he gave it to her for that purpose, he was unwilling that she should use it, and did not administer it to her nor cause her to take it. She did take it, however, and died in consequence. It was held that the prisoner could not be convicted as accessory before the fact. In another case the prisoner held stakes at a prize fight, which resulted in the death of one of the combatants. Cockburn, C. J., said: 'To support an indictment of being accessory before the fact of manslaughter there must be an active proceeding on the part of the prisoner; he is perfectly passive here; all he does is to accept the stakes.' R. v. Taylor, L. R. 2 C. C. 148. In Hately v. State, 15 Ga. 346, it is ruled substantially that the prisoner must have incited the commission of the crime before he can be convicted as accessory before the fact.

"The evidence in the present case does not show that the prisoner participated in the criminal offense performed by Dr. Whitehead. He neither counseled it, nor advised it, nor procured its commission, and it does not even appear that he was willing for the crime to be committed, except that he did permit the use of a room in his house in which the crime was committed. The prisoner was conducting an assignation house and was in the habit of letting his rooms for immoral purposes, and the woman and the putative father of the child occupied this room together for two days before the abortion was committed. The evidence shows that at this time the fact that the woman was pregnant could not have been ascertained by casual examination. After the crime was committed the accused cared for the woman, furnishing her food and necessary medical attention, all at his own expense, and simply, as the evidence discloses, as an act of humanity. He was in no way concerned in the criminal act. There was no motive for its commission by him through the agency of another, and no reason whatever, as shown by the evidence, why he should have been interested in having the criminal abortion performed. If he was present in a legal sense when the crime was committed and aided and abetted it, he could be convicted as a principal in the second degree. Merely aiding the commission of the offense by furnishing a room within which the crime could be committed is not, without more, such a procuring of another to commit the crime as would render the accused guilty as an accessory before the fact. See 12 Cyc. 191 (2)."

I do not concur in the opinion of my Associates that the evidence was not sufficiently conclusive to support the charge against the accused of being an accessory before the fact. The distinctions between principals in the first and second degree and accessories before the fact are fanciful rather than substantial. All are deemed equally guilty and are punished alike. And it has been held that on an indictment against one as principal in the first degree, if the evidence warrants it, a verdict may be had against him as either a principal in the second degree or an accessory before the fact. In some of the states the common law has been changed by statute so as to abolish these distinctions, and accessories before the fact are considered as principals. 1 Wharton, Crim. Law (11th Ed.) § 338, note 6. Especially should this distinction be ignored when the criminal act is the result of a conspiracy or confederacy, for every person entering into a conspiracy or common design is deemed in law a party to all acts done by any of the other parties in furtherance of the common design. All are equally guilty where the separate acts of each contributed to produce the criminal act, although personal knowledge or participation in every act of each is not necessary, provided they all tend to the consummation of the same criminal act. The facts in the present case, in my opinion, prove the existence of a conspiracy between the physician, the putative father, and the plaintiff in error, Jenkins, the owner of the house where the criminal abortion was performed. While this may be true, the statute of this state, which still preserves the common-law distinction, characterizes these offenses differently, though punished alike. Whitehead, the physician, who actually performed the physical act of causing the abortion, was the principal perpetrator, and Gullatt, who hired the physician to produce the abortion, and the accused, who rented the room and bed to Gullatt for the purpose, were accessories before the fact. Assuming the truth of the allegations, there can be no doubt as to the guilt of Whitehead and Gullatt as charged.

The majority of the court think that the evidence does not show such participation in the common criminal design by the accused as to warrant his conviction. In coming to this conclusion they construe the general words of the definition, "procure, counsel, and command" the commission of the criminal act, necessary to make an accessory before the fact, as meaning to "incite," "encourage," "cause." The words "counsel and command" have no application to the facts; but in my opinion the word "procure," used in the definition, is broad enough to embrace the acts and conduct of the accused. I am strengthened in this view by the definition contained in Penal Code 1910, § 44. "An accessory is one who is not the chief actor in the offense, nor present at its performance, but in some way concerned therein either before or after the act committed." This definition is certainly broad enough to include the acts and conduct of the accused, if its meaning is not restricted by the section following, which defines an accessory before the fact as one who, being absent at the time of the crime committed, "doth yet procure, counsel, or command another to commit a crime." The two sections should be construed together, and, so construed, one who aids and abets the commission of a crime by knowingly contributing to its commission would seem to "procure" its commission in the meaning of the statute. There is evidence that the accused, with knowledge that a criminal abortion was to be produced, rented a room and a bed for the purpose and hired a nurse to be present and attend to the woman before, at, and after the commission of the crime. It is probable that, if the accused had been in his house when the crime was committed, for the purpose of being so near as to render any necessary assistance or to prevent any possible interruption, he would have been a principal in the second degree, being constructively present; but as to this the evidence is silent. In renting the room, furnishing the bed and nurse, and taking care of the woman before the crime was committed, he contributed in a very substantial manner to its commission, and, in my opinion, these acts made him an accessory before the fact. In Reg. v. Hollis and Blakeman, 12 Cox's Crim. Cas. 463, a case of criminal abortion, a conviction of Blakeman as an accessory before the fact was upheld; the only evidence against him being the furnishing of a room with knowledge that an abortion was to be caused by Hollis, the principal. Bovill, C. J., saying: "Hollis found the drug and Blakeman the room where the prosecutrix was taken to, and in a short time the effect intended was produced." In that case the statute defining an accessory before the fact was identical with the one in our Penal Code. In Commonwealth v. Follanshee, 155 Mass. 274, 29 N. E. 471, a case of criminal abortion, it was held that one was not an accessory before the fact because she procured ether for the accused, which he administered to a pregnant woman for the purpose of procuring an abortion; the evidence not showing that "she knew the purpose for which it was to be used." The two cases relied upon by Judge Pottle are distinguishable on the facts from the two cases above cited, as well as from the instant case. In R. v. Fretwell, L. & C. 161, although the accused gave to the pregnant woman at her request the drug after her threat to take it to cause a miscarriage, the court held that he was not guilty of being an accessory, because "he was unwilling that she should use it, and did not administer it to her nor cause her to take it." In R. v. Taylor, 2 Cr. Cas. Res. 147, the court held that: "A stakeholder who takes no part in the arrangements for a prize fight, and does nothing more than hold the stakes and pay them over to the winner, is not an accessory before the fact to the manslaughter of one of the combatants." The essential factors of guilt, to wit, knowledge that a crime was to be perpetrated, and aiding and abetting its commission, were lacking in these cases. Here the accused knew that a criminal abortion was to be committed, and furnished for hire a secret, private, convenient place for that purpose. For these reasons, while the question is not free from doubt, I think the evidence authorized the verdict.

RUSSELL, J. (concurring specially). I agree to the reversal of the judgment of the lower court, upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence; but I am further of the opinion that the indictment was demurrable. One charged as an accessory, in common with all who are accused of crime, has the right to be definitely informed as to the precise nature of the transaction as to which he is called on to defend.

The Court of Appeals is without jurisdiction to consider assignments of error addressed solely to the finding of the jury upon issuable facts. There is no complaint that any error of law was committed, the evidence authorized the verdict rendered, and, though the testimony in behalf of the losing party would have warranted a different verdict, the trial judge did not err in refusing a new trial, for the credibility of the witnesses is a matter exclusively for the jury. *Davis v. 2. NEW TRIAL (§ 70*)—GROUNDS.

Under a ruling invoked by the defendant, the only issues submitted to the jury were the value of the automobile, the amount of the loss, and whether the delay in the payment of the policy was due to bad faith. The finding of the jury upon these issues of fact is supported by evidence, and there is no complaint that any error of law was committed. Consequently the trial judge properly overruled the motion for a new trial.

Error from City Court of Americus; R. L. Greer, Judge.

Action by R. E. Parker, guardian, against G. O. Loving & Co. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

W. P. Wallis and L. J. Blalock, both of Americus, for plaintiff in error. Shipp & Sheppard, of Americus, for defendants in error.

POTTLE, J. Parker brought suit, as guardian for an insane person, to recover damages for injuries to his ward, received by being thrown from a vehicle in which she was riding and which had been let by the defendants to the guardian. It is alleged that the defendants furnished defective harness which had been broken, and which was tied together with a cotton string; that while driving along the road in a usual and ordinary manner, and without fault on the part of the plaintiff, the string broke and the tongue of the vehicle dropped to the ground, and the horses became frightened and ran away. It is alleged in the petition that the plaintiff's ward was a member of his family, being his sister, and that he hired the vehicle for the purpose of taking his family, including his ward, on a visit to his wife's mother, a distance of some eight or nine miles. The trial judge rejected a proffered amendment to the petition, and sustained a demurrer upon the ground that the petition failed to show any duty owing by the defendants to the plaintiff's ward, and that it also appeared from the petition that the plaintiff could have known of the defects in the harness complained of, and by the exercise of ordinary care could have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence. The plaintiff has excepted to the rejection of the amendment to his petition, and also to the dismissal of the original petition.

[1] 1. The rejected amendment was no part of the record, and could not be specified and be brought to this court as such. The amendment is not set out in the bill of exceptions, either literally or in substance, nor attached thereto as an exhibit. Consequently this court cannot consider what purports to be a copy of the amendment embraced in the transcript of the record, and cannot determine the assignment of error upon the refusal to allow the amendment. Taylor v. McLaughlin, 120 Ga. 703, 48 S. E. 203.

[2] 2. A livery stable keeper, who lets horses and vehicles for hire, is not a common carrier of passengers, and, as such, bound to exercise extraordinary diligence for the safety of his passengers. The relation between the hirer of the vehicle and the owner is that of bailee and bailor; and the liability of the owner is governed by the rules applicable to such a contract of bailment. He is but a private carrier for hire, and required to exercise due care and diligence in performance of the duty imposed upon him by the contract; that is to say, such care and skill as prudent and cautious men experienced in the business are accustomed to use under similar circumstances. See 25 Cyc. 1518; Erickson v. Barber Bros., 83 Iowa, 367, 49 N. W. 838; Payne v. Halstead, 44 Ill. App. 97; Hadley v. Cross, 34 Vt. 586, 80 Am. Dec. 699; Stanely v. Steele, 77 Conn. 688, 60 Atl. 640, 69 L. R. A. 561, 2 Ann. Cas. 342; McGregor v. Gill, 114 Tenn. 524, 86 S. W. 318, 108 Am. St. Rep. 919. Under the Code of this state the obligation of a bailor for hire, amongst other things, is "to keep the thing in suitable order and repair for the purposes of the bailment, to warrant the right to possession, and that the thing bailed is free from any secret fault rendering it unfit for the purposes for which it is hired." Civil Code, § 3479. Here, therefore, is a statutory declaration that due care on the part of the bailor requires him to examine the thing bailed, for the purpose of seeing that it has no hidden defects which would render it unsuitable for the purposes for which it was hired. What would be ordinary care depends upon the particular business in hand, the circumstances surrounding the particular transaction, and the situation of the parties.

Under our statute the bailor warrants the soundness and suitability of the thing bailed, and is liable for any injury or damage which may result from a latent defect of which the bailee has no knowledge and the consequences of which he could not avoid by the exercise of ordinary care. Much more is it the duty of the bailor to see that the thing bailed is free from patent defects which render it unfit for the purposes for which it was hired. If the hirer knows of the defect, or in the exercise of ordinary care ought to have discovered it, and, notwithstanding this actual or implied knowledge, he uses the thing, and injury results on account of the defect, he will be held to have waived his right to claim damages, since by the exercise of ordinary care he could have avoided the consequences of the bailor's neglect. But what would amount to the care the hirer ought to use to discover the defect is a question of fact for the jury. It cannot be said as a matter of law that, simply because a piece of harness was tied with a string, the hirer is guilty of such negligence in using it as would defeat his right to recover damages of which the defective harness was the proximate cause. The question whether, in the exercise of ordinary care, he ought to have discovered the defect, and whether, if he had discovered it, and that the harness had been repaired by means of a string, he was still guilty of negligence in using it in this condition, were both questions of fact, neither of which could be resolved against the plaintiff as a matter of law.

[3] 3. Since the relation between the parties arose solely from contract, the right of the plaintiff's ward to recover must depend upon whether she sustained any contractual relation with the defendants, either express or implied, so as to raise a duty on their part to use ordinary care and diligence for her care and protection. It is alleged in the petition that the plaintiff's ward was a member of his family, and that he hired the vehicle for the purpose of transporting his family; but it is nowhere alleged that the defendants knew that the plaintiff's ward was a member of his family, or that he intended to convey her in the vehicle which he hired. It is not even distinctly alleged that the defendants knew that the plaintiff intended to transport his family, though this may be inferred from the allegations. All this is, however, immaterial. The fact that a vehicle capable of conveying several persons was hired was itself enough to put the hirer on notice that the person to whom it was let intended to convey therein persons other than himself. In such a case there was an implied agreement on the part of the hirer that the vehicle might be used for the conveyance of any person whom the person to whom it was let might invite to accompany him, or at least for the carriage of members of his family, for whom he was obliged to provide necessary means of travel.

The plaintiff was a member of the family, under the protection of her brother, who hired the vehicle, and the implied agreement that she might be transported in the vehicle raised a duty on the part of the hirer to use the same measure of diligence for her protection as for the person to whom the vehicle was let. The court erred in sustaining the demurrer.

BEARDEN v. STATE. (No. 4,772.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 25, 1913.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 274, 909*)—NEW TRIAL—PLEA OF GUILTY—WITHDRAWAL.

The trial judge did not err in refusing to entertain a motion for a new trial. One who has filed a plea of guilty in a criminal case cannot move for a new trial. Where one accused of crime voluntarily pleads guilty to the charge, a new trial cannot be granted, for there was no verdict. A plea of guilty may, as a matter of right, be withdrawn before sentence; and after sentence the judge may permit it to be withdrawn upon meritorious grounds, addressed to his discretion. But neither before nor after sentence can a motion for a new trial be employed as a means of withdrawing a plea of guilty.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 269*)—PLEA OF GUILTY.

At common law a personal plea was necessary on one's arraignment for trial in a criminal case; but under the provisions of section 971 of the Penal Code of 1910 of Georgia (as under the Codes of Criminal Procedure of most of the states), the plea of the defendant may be made by his attorney. One of the chief purposes of the requirement that a defendant be present at every stage of his trial is to enable him to consult with his counsel, and by the presence of the accused to properly hold him bound by his own acts, and to the acts of his counsel in his presence, to which he interposes no objection. As to the latter, the attorney generally stands in the shoes of his client, and if the client assents, or fails to object, he is bound thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 621-623, 629, 630; Dec. Dig. § 269.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

A. Bearden was convicted of violation of the prohibitory law, and brings error. Affirmed.

R. R. Jackson, of Atlanta, Homer A. Legg, of Blue Ridge, and Myer I. Goldberg, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Hugh M. Dorsey, Sol. Gen., of Atlanta, for the State.

RUSSELL, J. Bearden was arraigned in the superior court of Fulton county, charged with the unlawful sale of alcoholic, spirituous, malt, and intoxicating liquors. The state introduced testimony which would have authorized the conviction of the accused, though it would not have demanded a verdict of guilty. When the state rested its case, the defendant, through his attorney, withdrew the plea of not guilty which had been filed upon arraignment, and filed a plea of guilty, and thereupon the court sentenced the defendant to serve 12 months at hard labor upon the public works.

On the following day (and after the court had imposed sentence) the defendant tendered a so-called motion for a new trial. There are only two grounds in the motion: (1) Because the verdict is without evidence to support it; and (2) because the verdict is decidedly against the weight of evidence and contrary to the evidence and the law applicable in the case. As ancillary, as we suppose, to the above-stated motion, the defendant attached to it an affidavit, in which it is averred that the plea of guilty was entered without his consent and against his wishes, that he is not guilty of the offense charged in the indictment, and that he makes the affidavit in order that the court may permit the filing of a motion for a new trial. The trial judge passed an order declining to entertain the motion, for the reason that the plea of guilty was entered by the attorney of record of the defendant after the state had introduced evidence authorizing a verdict of guilty, and that this motion was not presented until after the sentence had been imposed. The defendant excepts to this judgment.

[1] We think the court properly refused to entertain a motion for a new trial. It would seem to be elemental that one who has voluntarily filed a plea of guilty in a criminal case could not thereafter, in the same case, file a motion for a new trial. The profession generally seems to have considered the point so well settled that we have been unable to find an adjudication upon the subject in Georgia. A motion for a new trial cannot be made upon a plea of guilty for the reason (if for no other) that there is no verdict where there is a plea of guilty, and the only object of the motion for a new trial is to set aside a verdict which has been rendered, so that upon another trial a different verdict may be obtained. The purpose of the motion for a new trial is to obtain another trial. Where a plea of guilty is filed, the judgment does not rest upon the results of a trial, but upon the plea, which is nothing more than a confession in judicio. The verdict is the point of attack to which a motion for a new trial and everything it contains is directed. If there is no verdict, a motion has no raison d'être.

The law provides a different means for avoiding the consequences of a plea of guilty. The defendant may withdraw his plea of guilty, as a matter of right, before sentence is imposed, and he may withdraw his plea after sentence has been imposed for any meritorious reason which addresses itself to the sound discretion of the trial court. If there is any valid and sufficient reason why the defendant should be permitted to withdraw his plea after sentence, in order to prevent injustice, the failure of the court to exercise this discretion in favor of the withdrawal of the plea is an abuse of discretion. Griffin v. State, 12 Ga. App. 615, 77 S. E. 1080. If there cannot be a motion for a new trial in a case in which no verdict has been rendered, certainly a motion for a new trial is not a proper mode of withdrawing a plea of guilty.

[2] 2. At common law a personal plea was necessary on one's arraignment for trial in a criminal case, but under the provisions of section 971 of the Penal Code of Georgia (as under the Codes of Criminal Procedure of most of the states), the plea of the defendant may be made by his attorney. One of the chief purposes of the requirement that a defendant be present at every stage of his trial is to enable the accused to consult with his counsel, and by the presence of the defendant properly hold him bound by his own acts, and to the acts of his counsel in his presence, to which he interposes no objection. As to the latter the attorney generally stands in the shoes of his client, and if the client assents, or fails to object, he is bound thereby. Allyn v. State, 21 Neb. 593, 33 N. W. 212; State v. Greene, 66 Iowa, 12, 23 N. W. 154; State v. Jones, 70 Iowa, 505, 30 N. W. 750; Bateman v. State, 64 Miss. 233, 1 South. 172; State v. Blake, 5 Wyo. 107, 38 Pac. 354; State v. Richardson, 98 Mo. 564, 12 S. W. 245; Conway v. State, 5 Wyo. 107, 38 Pac. 354.

In State v. Richardson, supra, the defendant pleaded not guilty to an indictment for larceny. Thereafter he withdrew his plea, and pleaded guilty, and was sentenced for two years. The next day he moved to have the judgment set aside, and asked leave to plead not guilty, alleging in an affidavit that he was not guilty, and that his plea was made under a mistake as to the statements made at the time by the officers of the court. This motion was denied by the trial judge, and the judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Missouri. The facts which might call for intervention in behalf of the accused were much stronger in the Richardson Case than in the case at bar. Richardson was not represented by counsel at the time he filed his plea of guilty, and he pleaded guilty upon representations of some officers of the court that another case pending against him would be dismissed. There was also evidence as to a conversation with the deputy sheriff, when the accused was being taken back to jail, from which it might be inferred that he did not understand the full purport and effect of his plea.

In the present case Bearden was represented by counsel, and he filed the plea in his behalf after the testimony for the state had been introduced. Bearden interposed no objection when this attorney, in his presence, stated to the court that his plea of not guilty would be withdrawn, and that a plea of guilty would be filed. He did not assert his innocence when sentence was imposed (as was the case in Conway v. State, supra). As we have already said, the provisions of our Code in regard to the plea of a defendant upon arraignment differ from the rule of the common law upon that subject. In our state the attorney stands in the client's shoes. The client has the right to direct the conduct of his case, and in the event of Irreconcilable conflict between his views and those entertained by his counsel he has the right to discharge his counsel. Even if the motion made by the defendant in this case had been one to withdraw the plea, we do not think it would have been any abuse of discretion to have denied it.

Judgment affirmed.

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 189*)—ATTORNEY'S LIEN.

The attorney for the defendant had a lien upon the defendant's interest in the pending suit for his contingent fee, which could not be defeated by any settlement, made without his consent, after the suit was filed. The lien of an attorney at law upon the subject-matter of a suit which he has been employed to prosecute or to defend cannot be rendered ineffective by a contract of his client. Civ. Code 1910, § 3364, par. 2.

Error from Superior Court, Haralson County; Price Edwards, Judge.

Action by A. J. Payton against J. O. Wheeler and others. Judgment for plaintiff. From an order giving an attorney of defendants a lien on the money in question, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Griffith & Matthews, of Buchanan, for plaintiff in error. W. P. Robinson, of Buchanan, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. It appears from the record that Wheeler had been accused of taking certain money from the person of Payton. Parker, the sheriff, arrested Wheeler, and found some money upon his person, and took possession of it. Payton brought an action against Wheeler and the sheriff for money had and received. After judgment by the magistrate in favor of Payton, and on appeal, Wheeler, by his attorney, perfected his plea by alleging that the money which had been taken from him by the sheriff was the property of his wife, placed in his hands by her instructions, to pay certain demands against her. The sheriff answered that he had the fund in dispute in his hands, but was merely holding it as trustee for whomever it might rightly belong to, and was ready to pay it over to the person whom the courts might adjudge to be the owner. At the trial on the appeal a written agreement, signed by the defendant Wheeler and his wife, to the effect that the plaintiff, Payton, should have the money which was in the hands of the sheriff, and that no further claim to the same would be made by them, was put in evidence; and Payton's counsel testified that one Johnson got Wheeler and his wife to sign the agreement, and brought it to him, and that the money was thereafter paid over to him, as attorney for the plaintiff, by the sheriff, under this agreement of Wheeler and Mrs. Wheeler. He further testified that he told Johnson he would not agree to assist Wheeler, who had been convicted of larceny, unless Payton consented, because he had represented Payton in the prosecution of Wheeler, and that he asked Johnson to see Wheeler's attorney, Robinson, and advise him as to the proposed agreement with Wheeler and his wife. It does not appear that Johnson ever saw Robinson. However, in a conversation between Griffith, as attorney for Payton, and Robinson, as attorney for Wheeler, Robinson stated, in effect, that his fee in the case was contingent, and that he was to have a half of the money if the Wheelers won the case. The settlement between Payton and the Wheelers had been agreed upon at that time. Robinson's statement on the trial of the appeal was that he had been employed by Wheeler and Mrs. Wheeler to represent them in the pending case, and was to have a half of the money sued for, for representing them, provided they won the case; that his fee was contingent, and that he knew nothing about the settlement until E. S. Griffith (Payton's attorney) mentioned it to him. This statement of the attorney for Wheeler and Mrs. Wheeler was undisputed by anything in the evidence, and under it he had the right to proceed with the case for the purpose of collecting his fee, and upon the evidence adduced a finding in favor of his client, in order to satisfy his lien for a half of the fund, was demanded; for the only evidence before the jury as to the ownership of the money compelled the legal conclusion that Wheeler was the owner thereof. The only evidence of Payton's title which was before the jury was that he derived it through his agreement with Wheeler and his wife. It may be that Payton could have shown otherwise that it was his money, but he did not do so. He relied upon the agreement which was introduced, and under the terms of which the Wheelers simply consented to let him have the money and make no further claim for it.

Under the provisions of section 3364 of the Code of 1910, attorneys have a lien upon suits, judgments, and decrees, superior to all liens but tax liens, and no person shall be at liberty to satisfy a suit, judgment, or decree until the lien or claim of the attorney for his fee is fully satisfied, and, for the purpose of enforcing his lien, the attorney at law has the same right over a suit as his client had for the amount originally due thereon. It is very plain that Payton's attorney sought to act in the utmost good faith with the attorney for Wheeler; but this has no effect, one way or the other, upon the rights of the latter. Robinson, as attorney for Wheeler, had a lien upon the subject-matter of the pending suit, contingent upon recovery. This right was fixed as soon as the suit was filed, and could not be divested by any settlement or contract, it matters not by whom the settlement may have been made or attempted. The case is fully controlled by the ruling of this court in Georgia Railway & Electric Company v. Crosby, 78 S. E. 612, and the rule is as fully applicable to counsel for attorneys representing the defendant as to the plaintiff's counsel. The facts of the present case illustrate the necessity for the application of the rule to counsel for defendant and plaintiff alike, and many similar instances might be suggested. A case which frequently arises is where the defendant's claim, by way of recoupment or set-off, may justly far exceed the original demand of the plaintiff.

Upon the hearing of the certiorari in the superior court the judge correctly held that the agreement of the defendants to settle the case, which would probably have resulted in rendering the lien of the attorney for his fee wholly worthless, should not be permitted to defeat the lien provided by law. An agreement or contract of a client cannot render ineffective the lien of an attorney upon the subject-matter of a suit which he has been employed to prosecute or to defend.

Judgment affirmed.

MODLIN v. SMITH et al. (No. 4,630.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 25, 1913.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 671*)—DISMISSAL—JURISDICTION.

When a motion to dismiss a bill of exceptions depends upon the adjudication of an issue of fact dehors the record, the motion will be overruled, for the Court of Appeals is not a court of original jurisdiction, and as a court of review it has no other jurisdiction than "the correction of errors in law and equity."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2867-2872; Dec. Dig. § 671.*]

2. GARNISHMENT (§ 42*)—PROPERTY SUBJECT—"CONTINGENT FEE" OF ATTORNEY.

A debt due by an attorney cannot be collected by process of garnishment served upon a debtor of one of his clients, although the attorney may, as a result of his services, have a contingent interest in the debt to the client. A "contingent fee" of an attorney, which is a proportionate part of a judgment recovered by him for his client, cannot be impounded and subjected to an indebtedness of the attorney by garnishing the judgment debtor. The debtor of the client does not become the debtor of the client's attorney by virtue of the fact that under the terms of his employment the lawyer will be entitled to retain a stipulated portion of the recovery as his fee when or after the fund as a whole has been collected.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Garnishment, Cent. Dig. §§ 83-88; Dec. Dig. § 42.*]

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by O. J. Modlin, administratrix, against Burton Smith and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

W. A. James, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Moore & Branch, of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. [1] A motion was made to dismiss the writ of error in the present case. The plaintiff's bill of exceptions was prepared and presented by W. A. James, Esq., who signed it as attorney for the plaintiff in error. The plaintiff in error, through other counsel, now asks that the writ of error be dismissed, upon the ground that it was brought to this court without her authority, and avers that, on the contrary, she specifically directed Mr. James not to file a bill of exceptions, and that after the judgment in the lower court she discharged him. The statements in this motion are verified by her oath, but they are unequivocally denied in the sworn answer, or objections, of the attorney who signed the bill of exceptions. There are other affidavits bearing upon this issue between Mrs. Modlin and the attorney. The motion to dismiss the bill of exceptions must be overruled. This court is a tribunal for the review and correction of errors, and is not a court of original jurisdiction, and for this reason we cannot undertake to decide any question the determination of which depends upon an issue as to facts dehors the record and entirely disconnected from the questions sought to be presented therein. We will say, in passing, that an attorney shown to have been once employed in a case is presumed to continue in that relation, in the absence of positive evidence of his discharge, and that the scriptural dictum, "The laborer is worthy of his hire," is as much applicable to lawyers as to others. Evidence of an attorney's discharge without any recompense for services already rendered should not be viewed with special favor.

[2] 2. It appears from the record that Smith, as an attorney representing a Mrs. Randolph in an action against the Seaboard Air Line Railway for damages for personal injuries, under the terms of his employment was to receive, as a fee for his services, a proportionate part of whatever amount might be recovered by her. There is some dispute as to whether Smith's fee was to be a third or a half of the recovery, but this is immaterial. Mrs. Randolph recovered a verdict against the Seaboard Air Line Railway for \$9,826.31, with interest from the date of the verdict, which was affirmed by the Supreme Court upon the fifth appearance of the case before that tribunal. Seaboard Air Line Railway v. Randolph, 136 Ga. 505, 71 S. E. 887. The judgment was affirmed May 11, 1911, and June 16, 1911, Mrs. Modlin, the plaintiff in error here, as administratrix de bonds non cum testamento annexo of Wiley Rice, sued out a garnishment, and caused summons of garnishment to be served upon an agent of the Seaboard Air Line Railway. In the affidavit upon which the garnishment was predicated, the administratrix swore that Smith owed the estate of Wiley Rice \$1,655 as principal and interest upon a judgment rendered by the city court of Atlanta on June 23, 1908, and that she had reason to apprehend the loss of that sum, or some part thereof, unless process of garnishment issued. On July 3, 1911, the Seaboard Air Line Railway filed an answer, in which it denied having in its hands any property or effects belonging to Smith, but stating the facts above recited with reference to the rendition of the judgment against it, and that it was informed that Smith was the owner of and entitled to 33 $\frac{1}{3}$  per cent. of the judgment in favor of Mrs. Randolph against the railway company as his fee for services as an attorney in obtaining the judgment, and asking a speedy determination of the issue, so that the railway company might be saved further interest. On July 4, 1911, Smith gave a bond conditioned to pay the judgment rendered on the garnishment, and on July 6, 1911, the Seaboard Air Line Railway issued a voucher for \$10,535.17, payable to the order of Smith and his associate counsel, as attorneys of record for Mrs. Randolph, which voucher was indorsed by them and paid on July 11th. On September 2, 1911, the defendant Smith excepted or demurred to the garnishee's answer, and also traversed the answer of the railway company, and averred that it owed him nothing, and on October 9, 1911, the railway company amended its answer by stating the facts with reference to the issuance and payment of the voucher in settlement of the judgment in favor of Mrs. Randolph. The plaintiff in error, by her attorney, on January 1, 1912, demurred to the traverse and exceptions filed by Smith, upon the ground that no person except the plaintiff or a claimant of the funds in the garnishee's hands can except to the garnishee's answer or traverse it; and that Smith could not except to or traverse the answer of the garnishee, because he himself said that the garnishee owed him nothing. The plaintiff, on January 25, 1912, traversed the garnishee's answer as to the proportionate interest of Smith in the judgment in favor of Mrs. Randolph, and set up that Smith's interest was a half of Mrs. Randolph's recovery, instead of 33 $\frac{1}{3}$  per cent. The defendant Smith and his surety on the garnishment bond moved the court to enter a judgment discharging the bond and releasing the surety thereon from all liability, and declaring that no money or other property subject to garnishment was impounded by the garnishment proceedings. On November 5, 1912, the court rendered a judgment to this effect.

It is not necessary to deal with the question whether a defendant, who denies that the garnishee owes him anything, and denies that the garnishee has any of his money or effects in possession, can except to the answer of the garnishee or traverse it. This point is raised by one of the demurrers filed by counsel for the plaintiff in error, but a ruling upon the exceptions and traverse filed by the defendant Smith is unnecessary, in view of the fact that the trial judge very properly held that the controlling question in the case was whether the contingent interest of an attorney in a debt due by a third person to one of the attorney's clients can be impounded by a proceeding in garnishment at the instance of one who is a creditor of the attorney, but who is not a creditor of the particular client of his in whose favor the judgment was rendered. We think the trial judge correctly held that the summons of garnishment was ineffectual to impound Mr. Smith's interest in the judgment against the Seaboard Air Line Railway and in favor of Mrs. Randolph, whatever that interest might be, so that the amount represented by this interest could by appropriate judgment against the garnishee be applied in payment of the judgment in favor of Wiley Rice's estate. If this be so, it is immaterial what steps were taken as to the giving of a bond to dissolve the garnishment; nor would it make any difference to whom the Seaboard Air Line Railway may have paid the money.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error insists that the whole matter should have been submitted to a jury. Even if the contention of counsel for plaintiff in error, to the effect that the defendant had no right to file either exceptions or traverse, is correct, there was nothing to submit to a jury. Certainly it cannot be questioned that the plaintiff had the right to traverse the answer of the Seaboard Air Line Railway, and she attempted to do so; but, after all, she did not deny any statement of the answer of the railway company, except as to the proportion of Mr. Smith's alleged interest in Mrs. Randolph's recovery. The fact that the verdict rendered against the railway company was in favor of Mrs. Randolph, and not in favor of Mr. Smith, was absolutely undisputed. The first question presented to the court, therefore, was whether the judgment debt owed by the railway company to one person could be impounded for the purpose of being applied upon an outstanding debt of another person, conceding that the latter person had an undivided interest in the judgment debt. The case is stronger where the latter person's interest (undisclosed in the judgment) in the debt due by the railway company arose by virtue of the fact that it was his fee as an attorney for services rendered in the case than if this interest depended upon other and different circumstances. As a general rule, the interest of a partner cannot be reached by a garnishment served on a debtor of the partnership of which he is a member.

Branch, Scott & Co. v. Adam, 51 Ga. 114. The Code provides that the interest of a partner in a partnership may be reached by garnishing the partnership; but there is no provision in the law of garnishment, so far as we are aware, for reaching the interest of a partner in the partnership assets by garnishing the debts due to the firm. The effect of such a course would apparently be tantamount in its ultimate effect to subjecting, by sale, tangible assets of the partnership to the payment of the debts of one of the partners without first garnishing the partnership, or without garnishing the partnership at all. It may be that any interest of a partner in the assets of a firm can be reached by appropriate proceedings in equity, but the first question the court had to decide was purely one of law, and the city court of Atlanta is without jurisdiction to afford affirmative equitable relief.

Conceding that there was a joint ownership by Mrs. Randolph and Smith, as client and attorney, in the fund recovered against the railway company, we do not think that garnishment would be the proper remedy to reach the interest of Smith as a joint owner of this money. 20 Cyc. 1030. A garnishing creditor stands in no better position as against the garnishee than the debtor himself does. Singer Sewing Machine Co. v. Southern Grocery Co., 2 Ga. App. 545, 59 S. E. 473. So while Smith, as an attorney at law, might collect for his client the amount of the judgment against the Seaboard Air Line Railway, Smith as an individual—not an attorney at law—could not, by the judgment in favor of Mrs. Randolph, enforce the payment of his interest in that judgment, no matter what his interest might be. Conceding the utmost contention of counsel for the plaintiff in error, to wit, that Smith had a joint undivided interest amounting to half the debt due by the railway company, the lower court rightly decided that this interest could not be reached by garnishment. A debt due jointly to the defendant and another cannot be reached by garnishment in an action against the main defendant. Badger Lumber Company v. Stern, 123 Wis. 618, 101 N. W. 1093, 3 Ann. Cas. 802, and note.

But, aside from this view, the judgment of the lower court was right, because an attorney at law, where his fee as attorney for the plaintiff is payable by special contract out of the proceeds of the suit, has merely an inchoate lien. Twiggs v. Chambers, 56 Ga. 279; Coleman v. Ryan, 58 Ga. 135; Rodgers v. Furse, 83 Ga. 123, 9 S. E. 669; Swift v. Register, 97 Ga. 448, 25 S. E. 315. The attorney's lien is inchoate as soon as the action is commenced. Rodgers v. Furse, supra. That it is essential to show the right of the plaintiff to recover, before the lien can be perfected or established, is pointed out in the Swift case, supra. Even after judgment the attorney who recovered the judgment has only a lien. This lien cannot be disregarded by the debtor who has notice of the lien, either before or after judgment; but it is, after all, but a lien. Civil Code, § 3364.

TROVER AND CONVERSION (§ 16*)—EVIDENCE.

This was an action of trover for the recovery of a horse. The evidence demanded a finding that the defendant, while a member of a partnership which was succeeded by the plaintiffs, and which formerly owned the horse sued for, had exchanged the horse for another horse, which the partnership accepted and used as its own, and that when the plaintiffs came into possession of its assets the partnership had parted with the title to the horse sued for. The evidence demanded a verdict in favor of the defendant. The mortgage introduced in evidence, and in which the horse sued for was described, was irrelevant, because the uncontradicted evidence showed that the exchange of horses was not made until after the mortgage was executed.

In the present case the fact that the accused struck the prosecutor was established by his own statement, as well as by the testimony of the prosecutor. According to the defendant's statement, he struck the prosecutor with his fist; according to the prosecutor, the blow was struck with the jaws of a knifehandle; and in either event the lawfulness of the attack depended upon the justification of the accused in delivering the blow. Error from City Court of Oglethorpe; R. L. Greer, Judge.

Action by the Reynolds Home Mixture Guano Company against Mrs. S. E. Dean. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. J. Bull & Son, of Oglethorpe, for plaintiff in error. Jere M. Moore, of Montezuma, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The Reynolds Home Mixture Guano Company sued Mrs. S. E. Dean upon a promissory note, which stated that its consideration was 90 bags of commercial fertilizer purchased by the defendant. The defendant filed a plea of non est factum, and also defended upon the ground that she had never purchased the fertilizer from the plaintiff, and that the debt, if due, was her husband's debt. The jury found for the plaintiff. The defendant adduced evidence fully supporting her defenses, and therefore, necessarily, the inquiry arises as to whether sufficient testimony was adduced in behalf of the plaintiff to authorize the jury's finding. The defendant testified that she never signed the note in question, and had never authorized any one to sign it in her behalf. The agent of the plaintiff testified that the note was signed in the defendant's presence and at her express request and direction. It was for the jury to determine which witness swore truly. Likewise, while the defendant testified that the guano was purchased by her husband for himself, and that she had nothing to do with the transaction (and other evidence to this effect was introduced in her behalf), we think that, if the jury believed that she authorized the execution of her signature to the note, the jury would be authorized to infer, not only from the fact that she freely gave the note, but from the fact that she had been accustomed in preceding years to purchase fertilizer from the plaintiff, and from the admission that she owned the land upon which the guano was used, and from the fact that she authorized a letter "to hold the matter up for a few days and I [she] will be down and arrange it," that the debt evidenced by the note was her debt, and not that of her husband.

Exception is taken to the admission of the testimony as to the contents of a letter, upon the ground that the loss of the writing was not sufficiently accounted for; but an examination of the record shows that this objection is without merit. The plaintiff's attorney testified that he had received by due course of mail a letter, signed in the name of the defendant, and that on a previous trial of the case he had the letter in his possession. He carried the letter to his office, and it had been lost. He testified that he made an "extraordinary search" in trying to find it. Upon this proof the court did not err in admitting secondary evidence as to the contents of the letter. Furthermore, there was no testimony admitted as to the contents of the lost letter, except the admissions of the defendant upon that point.

The court correctly charged the jury, after fully stating the contention of the defendant, that "when the plaintiff comes into court and introduces its note in evidence, nothing else appearing, it is entitled to recover a verdict against the defendant, because that is making out what the law calls a prima facie case in favor of the plaintiff, and if nothing else appears they are entitled to recover." Immediately following this excerpt the court proceeded very correctly to instruct the jury as to the defendant's plea of non est factum, and her defense that the debt was that of her husband. It is true that the trial judge did not in express terms charge the jury, as ruled in Stanton v. Burge, 34 Ga. 435, that the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to prove the execution of the note when a plea of non est factum is interposed. But it is not necessarily error to fail to instruct the jury as to where the burden of proof lies, in the absence of a timely and appropriate request for instruction upon that point.

The case presents nothing but an issue of fact, which has been adjudicated by the jury within the scope of their prerogative, and the court did not err in refusing a new trial. Judgment affirmed.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 25, 1913.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 824*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REASONABLE DOUBT.

In the absence of an appropriate and timely request that the meaning of the term "reasonable doubt" be defined for the jury, it is not error for the trial judge to confine his instructions upon this subject to the statement that "the guilt of the accused must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt," and that "the testimony which the state is required to produce to remove the presumption of innocence must be of such a character and carry such weight as to remove from your minds any reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt." The instruction given in the present case upon the subject of reasonable doubt is approved. "To give a specific meaning to the word 'reasonable,' when applied to 'reasonable doubt,' is trying to count what is not numbered and to measure what is not space." See Barker v. State, 1 Ga. App. 288, 57 S. E. 990, and citations.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 814*)—INSTRUCTIONS—LIMITATIONS.

Though the fact that the offense was committed was denied, there was no testimony whatever to dispute that the offense, if committed at all, was committed within the period of two years. Consequently the omission of the trial judge to instruct the jury that the evidence must show that the offense was committed within the statute of limitations was not harmful to the accused. Allen v. State, 8 Ga. App. 284, 68 S. E. 1009.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 553*)—CREDIBILITY—QUESTION FOR JURY.

The evidence authorized the verdict of guilty. It is the privilege of the jury to believe the testimony of a single witness in preference to that of any number of witnesses whose testimony may contradict him, and even though testimony be adduced which would suffice to successfully impeach the witness, if this impeaching testimony were accepted by the jury. *Jolly v. #### 1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 922*)—NEW TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE.

The failure of a trial judge in a criminal case to charge the jury to the effect that the defendant enters upon his trial with a presumption of innocence in his favor, and that this presumption remains with him, in the nature of evidence, until rebutted by proof satisfying the jury of his guilt to the exclusion of reasonable doubt, is error requiring the grant of a new trial.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 306, 561*)—INSTRUCTIONS—"PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE"—"REASONABLE DOUBT."

The presumption of innocence is affirmative proof in behalf of one accused of crime, and places upon the prosecution the burden of rebutting it by proof which shall satisfy the jury of the defendant's guilt beyond any reasonable doubt. The term "presumption of innocence" is not synonymous with that of "reasonable doubt." The presumption refers to a substantive right, which is in the nature of evidence; and the phrase "reasonable doubt" applies to the degree of proof necessary to produce mental conviction.

3. INSTRUCTIONS.

Tom Butts was convicted of crime, and brings error. Reversed.

John A. Sibley, of Milledgeville, for plaintiff in error. Jos. E. Pottle, Sol. Gen., of Milledgeville, for the State.

RUSSELL, J. [1] 1. We shall not discuss the testimony in the case, since we are constrained to grant a new trial upon the assignment of error in which complaint is made that the trial judge failed to instruct the jury that the defendant entered upon his trial with the presumption of innocence in his favor, and that this presumption remains with him throughout the trial, until it is rebutted by proof satisfying the jury of the defendant's guilt to the exclusion of any reasonable doubt. The precise point was ruled by this court in Reddick v. State, 11 Ga. App. 150 (4), 74 S. E. 901.

[2] 2. As well pointed out by Mr. Justice (now Chief Justice) White, in Coffin v. United States, 156 U. S. 432, 15 Sup. Ct. 394, 39 L. Ed. 481, the legal presumption of innocence is to be regarded by the jury, in every case, as a matter of evidence. To use the language of Justice White: "The presumption of innocence is a conclusion drawn by law in favor of the citizen, by virtue whereof, when brought to trial on a criminal charge, he must be acquitted, unless proven guilty. In other words, this presumption is an instrument of proof created by law in favor of one accused, whereby his innocence is established until sufficient evidence is introduced to overcome the proof which the law has created. * * * 'Reasonable doubt' * * * is, of necessity, the condition of mind produced by proof resulting from evidence in the cause. It is the result of the proof, not the proof itself; whereas the presumption of innocence is one of the instruments of proof, going to bring about the proof from which reasonable doubt arises. Thus, one is a cause; the other, an effect." Numerous cases are cited by the learned jurist clearly illustrating the proposition that the presumption of innocence is not synonymous with reasonable doubt. A perusal of the opinion of Justice White in the case just cited will delight any one with a taste for history and literature as well as students of the law.

[3] 3. We find no error in the rulings of the court upon the admissibility of testimony; nor is the complaint which is addressed to the instructions of the court on the subject of accomplices well founded. The plaintiff in error is entitled to another trial, because he was deprived of a substantial right. The failure of the judge to present to the consideration of the jury the presumption of innocence, which was a shield in the nature of evidence in his favor, placed upon the state a lighter burden than that imposed upon it by law, and took from the defendant an important accessory of the trial, which might of itself have raised a reasonable doubt.

Judgment reversed.

SMITH v. D. ROTHSCILD & CO.

(No. 4,915.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 25, 1913.)

1. EXECUTION (§ 194*)—LEVY—CLAIM OF THIRD PERSON—EVIDENCE.

There was sufficient evidence to authorize the finding that title to the property levied on was in the defendant in execution at the date of the levy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. §§ 571-574; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

2. EXECUTION (§ 199*)—CLAIM OF THIRD PERSON—JUDGMENT AGAINST CLAIMANT—DAMAGES.

Where property is levied on as that of a husband, and his wife files a claim, and, under the evidence, the main issue is as to whether the wife's claim is collusive and fraudulent, and the jury are authorized to find that it is, they have the right, if they find for the plaintiff, to assess damages on the ground that the claim was filed for delay.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1066*)—INSTRUCTIONS—HARMLESS ERROR.

The instruction that, if the husband made a sale of a stock of merchandise in bulk to his wife, the sale would be void unless the provisions of the sales in bulk act had been complied with, even if not applicable to any issue raised by the evidence, was nevertheless harmless to the claimant.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1074*)—HARMLESS ERROR.

While, after the filing of a claim and after a return of the papers to court, the sheriff has no right, without permission of the court, to amend his return of levy, still, if he does so, and on objection during the trial the return is treated as if the addition had not been made, and the claimant is accorded all the rights he would have had under the return as first made, a verdict in favor of the plaintiff will not be set aside, merely because the court did not pass an order striking from the return the words so added.

5. EXECUTION (§ 195*)—CLAIM BY THIRD PERSON—HEARING—RIGHT TO OPEN AND CLOSE.

Where, in the trial of a claim case, the claimant denies that the defendant in execution was in possession at the date of the levy, it is not error to award to the plaintiff in fi. fa. the opening and conclusion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 575; Dec. Dig. § 195.*]

6. NEW TRIAL (§ 29*)—MISCONDUCT OF COUNSEL.

Counsel for the plaintiff having remarked in the hearing and presence of the jury, while the claimant was on the stand as a witness, that if the claimant "were let alone she would impeach herself," and counsel for the claimant having promptly moved for a mistrial on account of this remark, and the court having declined either to award a mistrial or to rebuke counsel, a new trial should have been granted upon this ground of the motion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 43, 44; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

Error from City Court of Bainbridge; H. B. Spooner, Judge.

Action by D. Rothschild & Co. against W. J. M. Smith. Judgment for plaintiff. On levy of execution, Annie M. Smith, wife of defendant, interposed a claim. Judgment for plaintiff, and claimant brings error. Reversed.

G. G. Bower, of Bainbridge, for plaintiff in error. P. D. Rich, of Colquitt, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. An execution issuing from the city court of Bainbridge in favor of Rothschild & Co., against W. J. M. Smith was, on August 9, 1910, levied by the sheriff upon a stock of goods in a storehouse in the village of Eldorado. Annie M. Smith, the wife of the defendant in fi. fa., interposed a claim. Upon the trial the jury found in favor of the plaintiff, and also assessed damages against the claimant for delay. Her motion for a new trial was overruled, and she excepts.

[1] 1. It is insisted that the verdict in favor of the claimant was demanded by the evidence. Both the claimant and her husband testified, in substance, that during September, October, and a part of November, 1909, the husband conducted a small mercantile business in the storehouse in which the goods were located at the time they were levied on; that in the latter part of November the stock had run down until there was in the storehouse only $15 or $20 worth of goods; that these goods were moved out of the storeroom by the husband, either upstairs in the building, where he and his wife resided, or to his farm, located some distance from Eldorado; that after this was done the wife, with her own money, which she had obtained from insurance upon her father's life, bought the stock of goods which was in the storehouse in the latter part of November, 1909, and thereafter conducted the business in her own name. Both the husband and the wife testified positively that at the time the levy was made the husband did not own any portion of the goods levied on. The plaintiff's theory of the case was that the merchandise belonged to the husband, and that when he became indebted he abandoned the business and put his wife in control, either by selling her the goods in bulk or by making to her a gift of the merchandise. In support of this theory the plaintiff introduced a witness by the name of Williams, who testified that he resided in Eldorado, which was a small place containing only three stores; that he himself was a merchant, conducting a business within 60 feet from that of Smith; that the stock of merchandise in the storehouse with the Smiths did not run down as claimed by them in November, 1909, and that Smith simply abandoned the business and put his wife in charge. This witness swore positively that no goods were carried off and none brought in. He further testified that Smith had told him that he had sold the stock of merchandise to his wife, and that he (the witness) could swear of his own knowledge that the wife began business with the same stock of merchandise with which Smith had been conducting the business, and that the stock had not noticeably run down as claimed by the Smiths. Other witnesses testified that they lived in the vicinity, and had an opportunity to observe the store from time to time; that, if any goods had been moved out and replaced with new stock, they would have known it; and that they had never seen such an occurrence take place.

We think the evidence raised an issue of fact in reference to the ownership of the property, which was properly submitted to the jury for their determination. Even in ordinary cases, slight evidence of fraud may be sufficient to carry a case to the jury on this issue. Civil Code, § 4626. In transactions between husband and wife, the rule ought to be applied with even more strictness. Civil Code, § 3011. The evidence of the declarations of the defendant in fi. fa., unfavorable to the claimant's theory, was not objected to. Admissions or declarations of a defendant in fi. fa., made while the defendant is in possession, are generally admissible against the claimant, but not if made after the defendant has parted with possession. Banks v. McCandless, 119 Ga. 793, 47 S. E. 332; Ozmere v. Hood, 53 Ga. 114. The bona fides of the wife's claim of title rested upon the claim of both the husband and the wife that his stock of merchandise had run down, and that what remained had been moved out and replaced with goods bought by the wife. Witnesses who were in a position to know testified positively that no such substitution of stocks had taken place, but that, on the contrary, the husband simply went out and the wife went in, and took possession of the same stock with which the husband had been conducting the business. The jury had a right to accept this testimony, and, if so, they had the further right to disbelieve the testimony of both the husband and wife that she had replenished the stock with her own money. Especially so, in view of the husband's statement that he had sold out to his wife.

[2] 2. The jury having reached the conclusion that the claimant and her husband had colluded to defeat the plaintiff's demand, they were also authorized to find that the claim was instituted in bad faith, and hence merely for delay. See Civil Code, § 5169. This is not like a case where a claimant in good faith tests a doubtful question of law (Clark v. Lee, 51 Ga. 284); nor a case where one not a party to fraudulent collusion, and without notice of the fraud, in good faith files a claim in order to test the question whether the property was sold him to hinder, delay and defraud creditors (Planters' Bank v. Cotton Mills, 60 Ga. 169).

[3] 3. The charge of the court on the subject of sales of goods in bulk was probably not applicable, but it did the claimant no harm. Its effect was that, even if the jury should believe the husband had in good faith sold the stock of goods in bulk to his wife, the sale would be void, under the sales in bulk act. Civil Code, § 3226 et seq. If the evidence authorized the charge, it was properly given; if not, it was harmless, and did not prejudice the claimant in reference to the real issue in the case, which was whether her claim of title was bona fide and well founded, or whether it was fraudulent.

[4] 4. After the levy by the deputy sheriff, the sheriff added to the return the words, "same in the possession of W. J. M. Smith." Claimant's counsel moved to strike these words from the levy, upon the ground that they had been made without authority. The claim having been filed and the papers returned into court, the sheriff had no authority to amend his return without permission of the court. But the only advantage which the claimant could obtain from having his motion sustained was to prevent the plaintiff from making out a prima facie case upon the sheriff's untraversed return. As the plaintiff took the burden, the claimant accomplished all she sought, and it was not prejudicial that the court did not formally strike from the return the words added by the sheriff.

[5] 5. The position assumed by the claimant in denying that the defendant was in possession was inconsistent with her claim to the opening and conclusion, and the court did not err in holding that the plaintiff was entitled to open and conclude.

[6] 6. A new trial is granted in this case solely because of the remark made by counsel for the plaintiff set forth in the sixth headnote. The counsel states in his brief that the remark was really made to counsel for the claimant, and in a colloquy between the attorneys, and was not intended for the jury. We must, however, take the record as it is. From the motion for a new trial it appears that the remark was made before the jury and in their hearing. In making the remark, counsel went beyond his right to comment upon the evidence and the witnesses in argument to the jury. If the testimony of a witness authorizes the conclusion, an attorney may properly argue that the witness has shown himself to be unworthy of credit on account of the unreasonable and contradictory statements appearing in the testimony; but this is quite a different thing from telling the jury, while the witness is on the stand, that if he is let alone he will impeach himself. In harmful effect, this may be equivalent to testimony that the witness is of bad character and not worthy of credit; and a witness is impeachable only by legal evidence. In the case of a popular and influential attorney, such as was the counsel who made the remark in this case, an expression of his opinion as to the character of the witness is likely to have weight with the jury and prejudice the adversary's case. And especially is this true where the presiding judge, upon his attention being called to it, fails to rebuke counsel, and by his silence, in the minds of the jury, puts the stamp of his approval upon the remark so made. The court has several times indicated its disposition to require counsel and litigants to adhere to the rules of correct practice, that the trial may be orderly, and free from unfair and prejudicial matter, either of evidence or of argument. The object of all legal investigations is the discovery of the truth; but truth must be discovered by the application of rules of law to competent and relevant evidence, and after a trial in accordance with orderly procedure. The remark made by counsel in the present case was doubtless inadvertent, and not intended to prejudice the adversary's case. But its harmful effect was not removed, either by a withdrawal of the improper remark and explanation by the counsel, or by a rebuke by the court; and as counsel for the claimant, by moving for a mistrial, promptly invoked a ruling from the court, we feel constrained to reverse the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial on this ground. Martin v. State, 10 Ga. App. 798, 74 S. E. 306; Clarke v. State, 5 Ga. App. 93, 62 S. E. 663; Pelham R. Co. v. Elliott, 11 Ga. App. 621, 75 S. E. 1062.

Judgment reversed.

JOHNSON v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY.

(No. 4,923.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 25, 1913.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 247*)—PASSENGER TAKING WRONG TRAIN.

One who, after having purchased a railway ticket, takes the wrong train by mistake, is to be regarded as a passenger while riding thereon, and until he has safely alighted therefrom.

2. CARRIERS (§§ 264, 303, 319*)—MISTAKE OF PASSENGER—DUTY OF CARRIERS.

If the mistake was not caused by any negligence on the part of the carrier or its servants, the carrier is not bound to return the passenger to the point where the mistake was made, but is under a duty to afford him a safe place to alight from the train. For injuries resulting from requiring the passenger to disembark at an unsafe place, the carrier would be liable, but not for mental and physical suffering occasioned solely by the mistake in taking the wrong train, or in making an effort to return to a place of safety.

3. CARRIERS (§ 264*)—ACTION BY PASSENGER—PETITION—DEMURRER.

The failure of a railway ticket agent to inform a passenger upon which of two nearby tracks his train will come cannot be made the basis of a recovery for taking the wrong train, in the absence of a request from the passenger for information upon the subject, or of something to indicate to the agent that the passenger is likely to take the wrong train.

4. CARRIERS (§ 275*)—TAKING WRONG TRAIN—ACTION—PETITION.

There was no error in sustaining the demurrer to the plaintiff's petition.

Error from City Court of Polk County; F. A. Irwin, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Neely Johnson against the Seaboard Air Line Railway. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

I. F. Mundy, of Rockmart, and W. W. Mundy, of Cedartown, for plaintiff in error. Brown & Randolph, of Atlanta, and Ault & Wright, of Cedartown, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. The plaintiff's petition was dismissed on demurrer. Her action was predicated upon the following allegations: Plaintiff desired to go to Taylorsville, on the line of the defendant's railway. She came from her home in Curryville to Rockmart, to take the train for Taylorsville, being a stranger in Rockmart. At this point the defendant has a main line leading to and from Atlanta, and a branch line leading to Taylorsville. Plaintiff bought a ticket to the latter point, and upon inquiry from the ticket agent was informed by him that the train would arrive in 40 minutes. At the expiration of this time one of the defendant's trains approached on the main line, and plaintiff, without making further inquiry, boarded the train and took a seat. Shortly after its departure, and when the train had gotten between one and two miles from Rockmart, the conductor came through taking up tickets, and informed plaintiff that she was aboard the train going to Atlanta. Thereupon the train was stopped, and she got off. It is alleged that she was ordered to get off by the conductor, but it is not averred that she requested him to take her on to the next station. Plaintiff was a weak, feeble woman, of delicate health and 54 years of age. She was put off near the woods beyond a high trestle, on top of a high embankment. In alighting she fell to the ground and was greatly embarrassed by the fall, as several passengers were observing her. She was forced to stand on the narrow and high embankment until the train moved away, in consequence of which she became frightened and nervous, and was in no condition to take the long walk back to Rockmart. The conductor told her it was only a few steps back, and if she would run she would catch her train. She did not know this was untrue, and started back in a run or fast walk, and when she reached Rockmart was completely exhausted, and suffering from the nervous strain and fatigue of the walk. When she boarded the train, the conductor did not inform her she was on the wrong train, but she "passed the agent, and he saw her board said train, and he knew she was going to Taylorsville, and misled petitioner by not explaining to her that her train left from the rear of the depot."

[1] Although the plaintiff boarded the wrong train by mistake, she was, while riding thereon, so far a passenger as to entitle her to protection against the company's negligence; and if, while such a passenger, she had been injured as a result of the failure of the company's employes to exercise due care, the defendant would have been liable. Cincinnati Railroad Co. v. Carper, 112 Ind. 26, 13 N. E. 122, 14 N. E. 352, 2 Am. St. Rep. 144; Columbus Railway Co. v. Powell, 40 Ind. 37; I. & G. N. Ry. Co. v. Gilbert, 64 Tex. 536; Arnold v. Penn. Railroad Co., 115 Pa. 135, 8 Atl. 213, 2 Am. St. Rep. 542.

[2] But, whether a passenger or a trespasser, the defendant's servants were bound to afford her a safe place to alight. It is not alleged that the plaintiff sustained any damage in consequence of having been forced to alight at an unsafe place. It is alleged merely that she was embarrassed by reason of falling; and, so far as appears, the fall was not due to any negligence upon the part of any agent or servant of the defendant. The entire injury suffered by the plaintiff was due to the fact that she was compelled to walk back to Rockmart, a distance of about two miles, and to the excitement and nervousness caused by having boarded the wrong train. Her right to recover must therefore depend upon whether her act in taking the wrong train was occasioned by any act of omission or commission on the part of the defendant's agents which would amount to negligence; for, if the mistake was due to the company's fault, it was bound to take her back to the point where the mistake was made, and would be liable for any injuries sustained by her as a result of her effort to reach a place of safety. I. & G. N. Ry. Co. v. Gilbert, 64 Tex. 538. On the other hand, if the mistake in taking the wrong train was not due to the company's default, it was bound only to provide her a safe place to disembark after the mistake was discovered, and when she had thus alighted the relation of carrier and passenger ceased, and the company was no longer under a duty to her as a passenger. Cincinnati Railroad Co. v. Carper, 112 Ind. 26, 13 N. E. 122, 14 N. E. 352, 2 Am. St. Rep. 144. If the plaintiff took the wrong train in consequence of negligence on the part of the ticket agent, the conductor would have had no right to put her off at the place where she alighted, whether he knew of the agent's negligence or not. Head v. Ga. Pacific Ry. Co., 79 Ga. 358, 7 S. E. 217, 11 Am. St. Rep. 434.

[3] The agent correctly gave the plaintiff all the information she sought. In the absence of something to suggest the contrary, the agent was not bound to assume that the plaintiff did not know which train to take. Both tracks were in plain view, and, if the plaintiff was in doubt, she could easily have inquired of the agent, or of the conductor when she boarded the train. It is no part of the ticket agent's duty to follow passengers up to see that they do not get on the wrong train. His business is in the ticket office, and his duty, so far as passengers are concerned, is ended when he furnishes the means of transportation and gives such information in connection with its use as is necessary to enable the passenger to properly use the ticket. If he is applied to for information in reference to schedules, or as to the particular train which the passenger ought to take, it is his duty to give the necessary information; but it is not his duty to volunteer information in reference to these matters to all passengers who apply for tickets, in the absence of some intimation that the information is desired. The statement that the train would be due in 40 minutes was not misleading, at least in the absence of some allegation that it was untrue, and that the only train due about that time was the one which plaintiff mistakenly boarded. The allegation that plaintiff passed the agent, and he saw her board the train, is not sufficient to show negligence on his part; for it was no part of his duty to be on the lookout to see that she did not take the wrong train, and unless he purposely stood by, and knowingly and intentionally permitted her to make the mistake, the company would not be to blame. The allegations do not show that he did this.

[4] It is clear from the petition that the plaintiff's mistake was due to her own failure to exercise ordinary care, and not to any negligence on the part of the defendant. The demurrer was properly sustained. Judgment affirmed.

McKINNEY et al. v. BATTLE BROS.
(No. 4,560.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 25, 1913.)

1. SALES (§ 467*)—CONDITIONAL SALES.

Where a promissory note given for the purchase of a horse reserves to the seller the title to the property until it is paid for, loss in case of death without fault on the part of the buyer will fall upon the seller as owner of the property, in the absence of a stipulation to the contrary. It is within the power of the contracting parties, under the provisions of section 4123 of the Civil Code of 1910, to agree that the purchaser shall bear the risk of the loss.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 1354, 1358-1364; Dec. Dig. § 467.*]

2. SALES (§ 467*)—CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION.

In a contract of sale, with reservation of title to the seller, as above referred to, a stipulation to the effect that it is expressly understood that the seller does not insure the health, life, soundness, or work of the horse, but, "in case of loss or damage to said property, the same shall be the loss of the buyers," when construed as a whole, includes loss by death.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 1354, 1358-1364; Dec. Dig. § 467.*]

Error from City Court of Albany; D. F. Grosland, Judge.

Action by Battle Bros. against Thomas McKinney and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

R. J. Bacon, R. H. Ferrell, and D. H. Redfearn, all of Albany, for plaintiffs in error. Mann & Milner, of Albany, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. The action was against Thomas McKinney, individually and as administrator of his wife, upon a promissory note given by them to Battle Bros., the plaintiffs, for the purchase price of a mare. In the note Battle Bros. reserved title to the mare until payment of the note, with a stipulation, however, that in case of loss or damage to the property the same should be the loss of the buyers, and this stipulation is coupled with the express condition that the sellers do not insure the health, life, soundness, or work of the said mare. Two pleas were filed—one setting up fraud on the part of the sellers, and the other the death of the horse, and the insistence of the defendants upon a rescission of the contract, and that the loss occasioned by death should be the loss of the plaintiffs. The trial judge, upon an inspection of the contract of sale, declined to submit to the jury the issue that the loss due to the death of the mare should fall upon the sellers. The issue of fraud was fairly submitted by the court, and upon this issue the jury found in favor of the plaintiffs. The contention that the defendants should be discharged from liability upon the ground of fraud is abandoned in the brief, and the only question presented by the record is whether the court erred in refusing to present the defendants' contention, that the death of the mare was the loss of the sellers, and that there should be a rescission.

[1] We think that the judge correctly held that the death of the mare was the loss of the buyers, and not of the sellers. Under the provisions of Civil Code, § 4123, the principle stated by counsel for the plaintiffs in error, and which it is insisted the court erred in not presenting to the jury—that where property is sold and delivered, and title is not to pass until payment in full of the purchase money, and the property is destroyed or dies, all without fault of the vendee, the loss must fall on the vendor—is a correct general rule. However, an exception to this rule may be created in any case by an express contract under which the buyer, and not the seller, assumes the risk of loss. In our opinion that is precisely what occurred in this case. The Code section expressly provides for exceptions by contract. Section 4123 of the Civil Code declares: "Where property is sold and delivered, but title is not to pass until payment in full of the purchase money, and the property is lost, damaged, or destroyed without the vendee's fault, he is entitled to rescission of the contract or to an abatement in the price, unless it is otherwise agreed in the contract of sale." Learned counsel for the plaintiffs in error do not insist that an exception cannot be made by which the loss shall be that of the buyer. They contend that under the terms of the contract here involved the contingency of the death of the mare was not provided for in the exception attempted to be made, and for that reason that the defendants should be relieved under the general rule embodied in section 4123. The contention in the present case is that the words "loss or damage," used in referring to the mare, do not include death.

[2] Since each word employed in a contract must be considered and weighed in connection with other words and phrases referring to the same object, or included within the same subject-matter, we cannot concur in this view. The writing under consideration, after describing the mare, which the instrument avers is brought after a full inspection and without warranty, either expressed or implied, states that "it is expressly understood that Battle Bros. do not insure the health, life, soundness, or work of said mare; * * * but, in case of loss or damage to said property, same shall be the loss of the buyers." In our opinion the verbiage of the contract above quoted, when construed all together, is amply sufficient to constitute a stipulation that the loss shall fall on the buyers in the event the property is lost, damaged, or destroyed, and includes loss by death. The word "loss" in this contract relates back to "life" in the previous clause; and loss of life is nothing more nor less than death.

The ruling in Smith v. Culpepper, 108 Ga. 759, 33 S. E. 49, cited by counsel for the plaintiffs in error, is not in point, because in that case, as appears from an examination of the record, there was no attempt to make an exception to the general rule laid down in Code section 4123. Of course, as insisted by counsel for the plaintiffs in error, the contract should be construed most strongly against the plaintiffs, because they prepared it; but in our view no other reasonable construction can be placed upon the contract than that given by the trial judge. For this reason the distinction very learnedly drawn between subjective and objective loss is inapplicable to the present case.

Judgment affirmed.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1144*)—APPEAL—PRESUMPTION—STRIKING PLEA IN ABATEMENT.

As appears from the record, the plea in abatement was filed after arraignment and the joinder of issue. "In order for the striking of a plea in abatement to furnish a ground for reversal, it must affirmatively appear that such plea was filed before arraignment; otherwise, it will be presumed that the judgment of the court was right, and that the plea was filed after arraignment." *Moseley v. RUSSELL, J. Judgment affirmed.

COSPER v. STATE. (No. 4,932.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 25, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1030*)—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 46*)—DETERMINATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS—NECESSITY—CERTIFICATION TO SUPREME COURT.

The question whether a statute is for any reason unconstitutional will not be certified to the Supreme Court, when a determination of the issues involved can be reached without a decision of that question. Nor will a reviewing court pass upon the constitutionality of a statute, unless it appears that the question was made in the court below and passed upon by the trial judge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2619-2621, 2632, 2653; Dec. Dig. § 1030; * Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 43-45; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

2. WEAPONS (§ 3*)—CARRYING WEAPONS.

"The act approved August 12, 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 134), entitled 'An act to prohibit any person from having or carrying about his person * * * any pistol or revolver without first having obtained a license from the ordinary,' etc., should receive a reasonable construction, in accord with the purpose of the Legislature in enacting it." Jackson v. State, 12 Ga. App. 427, 77 S. E. 871; Strickland v. State, 137 Ga. 1, 72 S. E. 260, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 115, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 323; Id., 137 Ga. 115, 72 S. E. 922.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 20, 738*)—EVIDENCE—QUESTION OF INTENT.

A criminal intent is an essential ingredient of crime, and while it may be presumed, as a matter of law, that one anticipates the natural, ultimate consequences of his act, the question of intention rests ultimately with the jury, and is not for the court.

4. WEAPONS (§ 13*)—CARRYING WEAPONS—EVIDENCE.

One who finds a pistol on a public road, and carries it to his home solely for the purpose of safekeeping until the pistol is called for by its owner, is not guilty of a violation of the act prohibiting the carrying of pistols without a license; and it is error to instruct the jury that under such a state of facts they should convict the accused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Weapons, Cent. Dig. §§ 16, 17; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

Error from Superior Court, Heard County; R. W. Freeman, Judge.

Henry Cosper was convicted of carrying a weapon, and brings error. Reversed.

S. Holderness, of Carrollton, for plaintiff in error. J. R. Terrell, Sol. Gen., of Greenville, for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The facts are very brief. The state's witness saw the defendant carrying a pistol on a public road, going toward the defendant's home. He had it in his hand, openly and not concealed. The defendant had no license authorizing him to carry a pistol. The defendant (who was a boy 18 years of age) stated that on the day he met the witness (who was on his way from the home of the defendant's father) he saw a pistol in the middle of the road. He picked it up and carried it to his father's house, and did not know who was the owner of the pistol. A day or two later Sam Cavender, who had lost a pistol, came to the defendant's house and identified it, and the defendant delivered the pistol to Cavender. The defendant stated that he did not himself own any pistol, and had no intention of violating the law, but merely picked it up and preserved it for the owner.

[1] 1. Counsel for plaintiff in error seeks to question the constitutionality of the act of 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 134). In our opinion the point which the learned counsel for plaintiff in error seeks to raise was settled by the ruling of the Supreme Court in Strickland v. State, 137 Ga. 1, 72 S. E. 260, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 115, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 323. But in any event we shall not deal with the question of the constitutionality of the act as affecting the plaintiff in error. The question as to whether a statute is for any reason constitutional will not be certified to the Supreme Court, when a determination of the issues involved can be reached without a decision involving the constitutionality of the law in question. Wimberly v. Georgia Southern & Florida R. Co., 5 Ga. App. 263, 63 S. E. 29. Nor will a reviewing court pass upon the constitutionality of a statute, unless it appears that the question was made in the court below and passed upon by the trial judge. Griggs v. State, 130 Ga. 16, 80 S. E. 103.

[2] 2. The court charged the jury that, if they believed it to be true that the defendant picked the pistol up on the public highway and carried it on his person to his home (it being conceded that the defendant had no license), he would be guilty under the law. As was said by Judge Lumpkin, in delivering the opinion of the court in the Strickland Case, supra: "The act forbidding the carrying of pistols without a license should receive a reasonable construction." Following this ruling, in Jackson v. State, 12 Ga. App. 427, 77 S. E. 371, this court held that the statute was not intended to prevent the manual possession of a pistol for such a length of time as was necessary to examine it with a view to its purchase, nor to penalize the act of one who, having a pistol in his hand for no other purpose than that of examination, might be temporarily called aside by some one who wished to speak to him. In the present case, if there had been no evidence but that in behalf of the state, the jury would have been warranted in convicting the accused. But the defendant made a statement, and it was the right of the jury, if they saw fit, to believe that statement. If they believed it, it was the right and duty of the jury to apply the rule of reason and the test of reasonableness to the circumstances under which the accused had the pistol in his possession, as well as to ascertain whether or not there was in fact any intent to commit a crime. The charge of the trial judge practically eliminated the defendant's statement from the case, and was a holding that, as a matter of law, one has no right to pick up a pistol lying in the public road, no matter what may be his purpose in so doing.

Under the charge of the learned trial judge, the jury was obliged to convict the accused, even if they believed the defendant's statement. The opinion of the judge who presided in this case is entitled to great consideration, because he is not only an upright magistrate, without fear and without reproach, but he is also a most erudite jurist; but still we cannot concur in the view of the statute as presented in the instruction above quoted. As has been several times pointed out by this court (and the fact is also referred to by Justice Lumpkin in the Strickland Case, supra), the sale of pistols in this state is not unlawful. There was a time when it was illegal to sell pistols in Georgia, but that law was repealed. It must be assumed that the Legislature was cognizant of the history of prior legislation upon this subject at the time the act of 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 134) was passed. In the opinion of the majority of the Supreme Court, the Legislature did not intend to prevent the carriage or delivery of a pistol from the place of sale to the home of the purchaser. The purpose of the carrying must be taken into consideration, and there must be some indication that the carrying is more or less habitual. Jackson v. State, supra. Of course, it would never do to hold otherwise than that evidence of carrying on one occasion would be sufficient to authorize the conclusion that the accused habitually carried the pistol identified by proof as having been carried on that occasion, without a license. But we are not prepared to hold that, if in any case it should plainly appear that the carrying was a mere temporary incident, due to an emergency of some kind, or absolutely necessary for the transportation of the property and its preservation, or to prevent a breach of the peace—perhaps a homicide—one who could show a good reason for not taking out a license, in the fact that he had never owned a pistol, should be subjected to punishment for failure to take out a license.

[3] 3. In the offense of carrying a pistol without taking out the license required by law, as in every other act denounced by law as criminal, the culpability of the accused must be determined by the intent with which the act was done. True, as a general rule, the law supplies proof of intent by the presumption that every person intends the legitimate consequences of his act; but this presumption may be rebutted, either by the evidence in the case or the defendant's statement, if the jury see proper to believe it. To constitute a crime, not only must an act be done which is forbidden by law, but there must be operating in addition to this and in the act itself an intention to violate the law, or criminal negligence. It is elementary that there must be "a union or joint operation of act and intention, or criminal negligence," to constitute a crime. Having proved the commission of an act forbidden by law, the legal presumption that the apparent violation of the law was willful and intentional fortifies the prosecution, and completes the case in behalf of the state. But this does not preclude the possibility of the defendant's showing that he had no intention of violating the law. Especially is this true in those cases where the gravamen of the offense consists in the particular intention with which the act was done. In all such cases the question of the intention is one wholly for the jury.

We are of the opinion that the same rule should be applied in a case such as this, where the gravamen of the offense is the failure to obtain permission to do the act which, if the legal requirements had been complied with, would have been permissible. In other words, if the defendant in the present case, being over 18 years of age, had applied for a license and had complied with the other statutory requirements, he could have obtained one. Had he obtained the license, his carrying the pistol would not have been illegal. Can it be said that, if the jury are satisfied from the circumstances, that there was no reason why he should have taken out a license to carry a pistol, he should be punished, forsooth, because he had not obtained a license? In forbidding persons, other than those excepted from the operation of the act, to carry pistols without first obtaining a license, it must be assumed that the Legislature had in mind one who intended to carry a pistol. If one intends to carry a pistol, and does carry it, without obtaining a license, he is guilty of a violation of the law now in question; but if one who has not obtained a license, for the reason that he has never intended to carry a pistol, is forced by some exigency (the stress of which the jury is to consider as illustrative of his intention) to remove a pistol from an unsafe to a safe place, or to prevent its unlawful use, the accused should not be convicted. It is in every case for the jury, from the circumstances of the case, to determine whether the accused intended to carry a pistol without obtaining a license. Of course, if nothing more appeared than that he had carried a pistol and had not obtained a license, or if it appeared that the exigency was not such as satisfactorily to negative the assumption that the pistol carrier intended to violate the law, the accused would properly be convicted. But if, on the other hand, the defendant, either by proof or by his statement, if credible, rebuts the presumption of criminal intention arising from proof that he carried the pistol, an acquittal would be authorized.

[4] 4. One who finds a pistol on a public road and carries it to his home, solely for the purpose of safekeeping, until the pistol is called for by its owner, is not guilty of a violation of the act prohibiting the carrying of pistols without a license, and it is error to instruct the jury that under such a state of facts they should convict the accused. And for this reason, in our opinion, it was error to tell the jury they were by law required to convict the accused, regardless of his statement. Of course, it can never be known whether or not the jury would have believed the defendant's statement; but they might have believed it, and if it is the truth of the case, the defendant was not guilty, although he had not paid the license required by law, because there never was a time when he had carried or intended to carry a pistol within the true meaning and reasonable intentment of the act of 1910.

The word "carry" sometimes involves the idea of habitude, and as pointed out in the Jackson Case, supra, there must be more than a mere temporary handling of the pistol to constitute the offense defined in the act of 1910. When we consider the intention of the Legislature in passing this statute, as well as the ruling of the Supreme Court in Modesette v. State, 115 Ga. 582, 41 S. E. 992, in which it was held that one who comes into possession of a pistol at a public gathering is not guilty of carrying the weapon to the gathering (which ruling was followed in Culberson v. State, 119 Ga. 805, 47 S. E. 173, and Amorous v. State, 1 Ga. App. 313, 57 S. E. 999), and bear in mind the reasoning in the Strickland Case, supra, and the authorities therein cited, especially Hill v. State, 53 Ga. 472, it is apparent that the right to carry arms guaranteed by the Constitution (the exercise of which may be regulated, but cannot be prohibited) is one of habitude. That this is true has been universally admitted in those rulings in which it was held that the proof of concealment of a pistol for but a moment was sufficient to authorize conviction, because it was necessary that one who carried a pistol should have the habit of carrying it openly and fully exposed to view, so that one having his person in view would at all times know that the pistol carrier was armed. Certainly the grant of a license for a designated term involves the thought that the applicant for the license intends to obtain the right to carry a pistol (though openly) as often as he desires during the life of his license and to legalize the habit (if he has the habit) of carrying the pistol. For this reason, the statement of the accused that he did not own a pistol, and did not intend to violate the law, if credible to the jury, was of such legal significance that the jury should have been permitted to at least consider it.

Judgment reversed.

Ex parte MASSEE.

STATE v. MASSEE.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. May 24, 1918. Rehearing Denied Aug. 26, 1918.)

1. HABEAS CORPUS (§ 92*)—SCOPE OF INQUIRY.

Legislation as to extradition being within the power of Congress, its statutes are paramount to state Constitutions and statutes, and all that a state court can do under habeas corpus by one held under an extradition warrant is to determine whether the conditions of the federal Constitution and statutes have been complied with.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Cent. Dig. §§ 81, 83, 87-96; Dec. Dig. § 92; * Extradition, Cent. Dig. § 45.]

2. HABEAS CORPUS (§ 110*)—BAIL PENDING FINAL HEARING.

Ordinarily bail may be granted pending a final hearing in habeas corpus proceedings; but, where the prisoner is held for extradition, bail should not be allowed, if the federal law has been complied with, as it must be presumed the state extraditing will accord the prisoner all his legal rights, though, if the law has not been complied with, the prisoner may be released absolutely or on bail.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Cent. Dig. § 99; Dec. Dig. § 110.*]

3. HABEAS CORPUS (§ 92*)—SCOPE OF INQUIRY—EXTRADITION PROCEEDINGS.

In habeas corpus proceedings the court may determine whether the prisoner is subject to extradition under the federal statute, as whether he is the person charged, whether he is a fugitive from justice, whether he was in the demanding state when the offense was committed, and whether the act charged was a crime in the demanding state; but the court cannot inquire into the motive of the extradition or the merits of the case.

4. EXTRADITION (§ 39*)—VALIDITY OF REQUISITION—PRESUMPTION.

When extradition papers are regular on their face, every intendment is in favor of their validity, and the burden is on the prisoner to show that the statutes have not been complied with.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Extradition, Cent. Dig. §§ 45, 46; Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

5. HABEAS CORPUS (§ 110*)—SCOPE OF INQUIRY—EXTRADITION.

That the prisoner was held for extradition for a crime, but was guilty of no moral wrong, and the prosecution was a hardship, and instituted to collect a debt, and the Governor of another state had refused extradition, did not show that the statutes had not been complied with, and, the extradition papers being regular on their face, the court erred in admitting the prisoner to bail pending hearing in habeas corpus.

6. HABEAS CORPUS (§ 85*)—EVIDENCE—EXTRADITION PROCEEDINGS.

It was error to admit as evidence in a habeas corpus proceeding an affidavit of a private individual stating that the Governor told him that an extradition requisition bearing the Governor's official signature and the great seal of the state had not been signed by the Governor.

7. HABEAS CORPUS (§ 85*)—EVIDENCE—EXTRADITION PAPERS.

Telegrams in relation to extradition proceedings between the Governors of the two states, indicating withdrawal of the requisition, which were considered on the preliminary hearing in habeas corpus without objection, were properly considered on the final hearing.

8. HABEAS CORPUS (§ 110*)—RELEASE ON BAIL—FAILURE OF PRISONER TO APPEAR AT FINAL HEARING.

If, pending final hearing in habeas corpus proceedings, the prisoner is released on bail, and he fails to appear, his bail will be forfeited, and the inquiry into the legality of the arrest be deemed abandoned, unless he can give a legal excuse, the acceptance of which is in the discretion of the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Cent. Dig. § 99; Dec. Dig. § 110.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; Thos. S. Sease, Judge.

Proceedings in habeas corpus by W. J. Massee. From an order discharging him from custody, the State appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Attorney General Frierson, H. S. Stokes, of Nashville, Tenn., and Nicholls, & Nicholls, of Spartanburg, for the State. Sanders & De Pass, C. C. Wyche, and John Gary Evans, all of Spartanburg, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The petitioner, W. J. Massee, was arrested by sheriff of Spartanburg county under the mandate of his excellency Cole L. Blease, Governor of South Carolina, issued on the 25th day of July, 1912, in accordance with a requisition from his excellency Ben W. Hooper, Governor of Tennessee. On the same day, upon the application of Massee, Hon. T. S. Sease, circuit judge, issued a writ of habeas corpus returnable in the afternoon of that day. The sheriff made return to the writ: "That W. J. Massee is held in my custody, under telegram from Governor Cole L. Blease and warrant issued by Magistrate A. H. Kirby, charged with making threats and using duress to induce Robert Williams to dismiss an action in United States Court." The record contains this statement of the proceedings before Judge Sease: "Counsel for the petitioner then moved that the petitioner be admitted to bail pending the hearing of the foregoing writ. Counsel for the state objected on the ground that the statutory four days' notice had not been given. This objection was overruled, and his honor passed the following order admitting Massee to bail, his honor ruling and holding that appellant was entitled to four days' notice, but that he would admit the petitioner to bail in the meantime." Accordingly, an order was made that Massee be discharged from custody on giving bond in the sum of $10,000, conditioned for his appearance before Judge Sease on the 27th day of July, 1912. The bond was made, and Massee was discharged. In the meantime, on the 28th of July, Governor Blease, having received a telegram signed by Governor Hooper stating that the requisition had been signed by mistake and was revoked, requested Judge Sease to continue the hearing until Governor Hooper's telegram could be authenticated under the seal of the state of Tennessee. An order was accordingly made postponing the hearing until the 7th of August, and requiring Massee to appear in person before Judge Sease on the 7th of August at 10:30 in the forenoon, and continuing the bond in force until that time. In passing this order, Judge Sease considered, without objection of counsel, the telegram of Governor Blease to him, the telegram of Governor Hooper to Governor Blease, and a telegram from James B. Cox, Esq., of Knoxville, to Massee stating that Governor Hooper had promised to revoke the requisition.

Massee did not appear on the 7th of August, pleading illness as an excuse, and his counsel presented a paper, purporting to be signed by Massee, waiving his right to be present at the habeas corpus proceedings. Counsel for the state of Tennessee objected to the hearing in the absence of the petitioner on the grounds "(a) that the bond was conditioned upon the personal appearance of the petitioner, W. J. Massee, before his honor, and, upon the failure of the petitioner to enter his appearance in person, the condition of the bond was broken; (b) that in a habeas corpus proceeding in which ex vi termini and, as the law directs, the body of the petitioner must be brought into court, the personal appearance of the petitioner was a duty and not a personal right which could be waived." Overruling these objections, Judge Sease proceeded with the hearing, and admitted for his consideration in the matter the telegram from Governor Hooper to Governor Blease purporting to revoke the requisition, the telegram from James B. Cox, Esq., to Massee stating that Governor Hooper had promised to revoke the requisition, and an affidavit of W. D. McNeil to the effect that, in a conversation with him, Governor Hooper gave his reasons for reinstating the requisition, and stated that he did not previously sign the requisition.

In overruling the objection to all these documents made on the ground that they were mere hearsay, and that the formal requisition of the Governor of a state was not subject to collateral attack in this manner, and that counsel were taken by surprise, and had no opportunity to meet the statements of the affidavits of McNeil, Judge Sease held "that, as such had been introduced before him, and considered by him when he passed the order extending the time for the hearing, they were already in, and would be considered by him, as they were referred to in an order previously passed by him in this matter." Counsel for the prosecution then produced a telegram from Governor Hooper to Governor Blease, dated July 26, 1912, withdrawing the message of the day before purporting to revoke the requisition.

Upon this showing, after argument, Judge Sease made the following findings and judgment: "(1) That the requisition is irregular on its face, and not in conformity with the act of Congress relating thereto, in that no copy of the indictment found by the courts of Tennessee, as required by law, was produced; (2) I find, as a matter of fact, that the requisition was not authorized by the Governor of Tennessee, but the same was issued without authority, and is therefore null and void. It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the prisoner, W. J. Massee, be discharged from the custody of the sheriff, and his recognizance canceled of record, and that he be allowed to go hence without delay."

The validity of the requisition from the Governor of Tennessee depends on whether the papers transmitted by him to Governor Blease were made out as required by the federal statute, and we think that Judge Sease was clearly in error in holding that they were on their face irregular and defective. The statute provides: "Whenever the executive authority of any state or territory demands any person as a fugitive from justice, of the executive authority of any state or territory to which such person has fled, and produces a copy of an indictment found or affidavit made before a magistrate of any state or territory, charging the person demanded of having committed treason, felony, or other crime, certified as authentic by the Governor or chief magistrate of the state or territory from whence the person so charged has fled, it shall be the duty of the executive authority of the state or territory to which such person has fled to cause him to be arrested and secured, and to cause notice of the arrest to be given to the executive authority making such demand, or to the agent of such authority appointed to receive the fugitive, and to cause the fugitive to be delivered to such agent when he shall appear." Revised Statutes of United States, § 5278. The objection sustained was that no copy of the indictment found by the courts of Tennessee was produced. The record before us shows that the copy of an indictment charging a crime under the laws of the state of Tennessee was attached to the requisition, and certified therein by Governor Hooper to be authentic. The objection that the certificate of the clerk of the circuit court stated that the paper purporting to be an indictment was a copy of the minutes of the court, and not of the indictment, has no foundation. Even under the strictest verbal test, the certificate can bear no other construction than that the indictment appears in the minute book, and that the indictment itself, not the minute book, was on file in the clerk's office. There can be no doubt that the requisition papers were on their face regular in every respect.

[1] The assigned error next in sequence is the admission of the petitioner to bail pending the hearing, without notice to the attorneys representing the prosecution. The question made is not now a practical one, for the bail bond was taken, and the petitioner released, and it would be impossible for this court to restore the status existing before the bond was taken. But since the point is important, we may state our views of it. Legislation in respect to extradition of fugitives from one state to another being within the power of Congress, the regulations fixed by federal statutes are paramount to state Constitutions and statutes, and all that a state court can do under habeas corpus proceedings is to determine whether the conditions prescribed by the federal Constitution and statutes have been complied with. If they have not, the court may release absolutely or on bail, according to its discretion.

[2] The general rule in habeas corpus proceedings is well established, that pending a final hearing the judge or court may admit to bail. Barth v. Cilse, 79 U. S. 400, 20 L. Ed. 393; In re Kaine, 14 How. 124, 14 L. Ed. 345. But extradition laws are enacted on the presumption that the state making the demand will accord to the fugitive his right to bail and all other legal rights, and, when it is remembered that the power of the court or judge under habeas corpus is necessarily limited to the inquiry, whether the conditions of the federal laws have been met, it seems obvious that bail should not be allowed pending the hearing, unless some departure from the federal law has been made to appear. On this point the reasoning of the Supreme Court of the United States on the subject of international extradition applies with equal force to state extradition. In Wright v. Henkel, 190 U. S. 40, 23 Sup. Ct. 781, 47 L. Ed. 948, Chief Justice Fuller said: "The demanding government, when it has done all that the treaty and the law requires it to do, is entitled to the delivery of the accused on the issue of the proper warrant, and the other government is under obligations to make the surrender—an obligation which it might be impossible to fulfill if release on bail were permitted. The enforcement of the bond, if forfeited, would hardly meet the international demand, and the regaining of the custody of the accused obviously would be surrounded with serious embarrassment. And the same reasons which induced the language used in the statute would seem generally applicable to release pending examination." Ex parte Wall, 84 Miss. 783, 38 South. 628; Ex parte Hobbs, 32 Tex. Cr. R. 312, 22 S. W. 1035, 40 Am. St. Rep. 782; In re Foye, 21 Wash. 250, 57 Pac. 825; 19 Cyc. 98.

[3] But under habeas corpus proceedings the courts may inquire whether the prisoner really falls under the conditions of the federal statute, that is, whether he is subject to extradition. For example, they may ascertain whether the prisoner is the person charged, whether he is a fugitive from justice, whether the papers show that he was in the demanding state at the time the offense was committed, and whether the act charged was a crime against the laws of the demanding state; but judicial inquiry cannot extend to the motive of the proceedings. The Supreme Court of the United States, in Robb v. Connolly, 111 U. S. 624, 4 Sup. Ct. 544, 28 L. Ed. 542, declared the power of the state courts to inquire under the writ of habeas corpus whether the statutes of the United States have been complied with, using this language: "What we decide—and the present case requires nothing more—is that, so far as the Constitution and laws of the United States are concerned, it is competent for the courts of the state of California, or for any of her judges having power under her laws to issue writs of habeas corpus, to determine, upon writ of habeas corpus, whether the warrant of arrest and the delivery of the fugitive to the agent of the state of Oregon where in conformity with the statutes of the United States, if so, to remand him to the custody of the agent of the state of Oregon."

In Pearce v. Texas, 155 U. S. 311, 15 Sup. Ct. 116, 39 L. Ed. 164, the court approved of the action of the courts of the asylum state in leaving to the courts of the demanding state the protection of the prisoner in his constitutional rights.

In Hyatt v. New York, 188 U. S. 691, 23 Sup. Ct. 456, 47 L. Ed. 657, it was held that the court might discharge the prisoner when it appeared on the face of the extradition papers that he was not in the demanding state at the time the crime was committed; but, in Munsey v. Clough, 196 U. S. 364, 25 Sup. Ct. 282, 49 L. Ed. 515, the court said: "But the court will not discharge a defendant arrested under the Governor's warrant, where there is merely contradictory evidence on the subject of presence in or absence from the state, as habeas corpus is not the proper proceeding to try the question of alibi, or any question as to the guilt or innocence of the accused."

The court held, in Pettibone v. Nichols, 203 U. S. 192, 27 Sup. Ct. 111, 51 L. Ed. 148, 7 Ann. Cas. 1047, that the inquiry in habeas corpus whether the prisoner was a fugitive from justice could not extend to an inquiry into his guilt or innocence, saying that: The constitutional and statutory provisions referred to were based upon the theory that, as between the states, the proper place for the inquiry into the question of the guilt or innocence of an alleged fugitive from justice is in the courts of the state where the offense is charged to have been committed."

lays down the limitation of the judicial power of inquiry in habeas corpus in this language: "This court in the cases already cited has said, somewhat vaguely, but with as much precision as the subject admits, that the indictment, in order to constitute a sufficient charge of crime to warrant interstate extradition, need show no more than that the accused was substantially charged with crime. This indictment meets and surpasses that standard, and is enough. If more were required, it would impose upon courts, in the trial of writs of habeas corpus, the duty of a critical examination of the laws of states with whose jurisprudence and criminal procedure they can have only a general acquaintance. Such a duty would be an intolerable burden, certain to lead to errors in decision, irritable to the just pride of the states and fruitful of miscarriages of justice. The duty ought not to be assumed, unless it is plainly required by the Constitution, and, in our opinion, there is nothing in the letter or the spirit of that instrument which requires or permits its performance."

These statements of the principle involved by the tribunal to whose authority, in questions of this kind, all other courts must yield, none made clear the principle that the authority of the courts, in extradition proceedings, does not extend to inquiry into the motive, or into the merits of the case in any respect. The Supreme Court of this state and other state courts of high authority have explicitly laid down the same limitation.

In Ex parte Swearingen, 13 S. C. 74, Mr. Justice McIver, with his usual force and clearness, thus states the rule: "It seems to us that the true rule is that when a requisition comes to the Governor of this state for any person found in this state, which shows upon its face that all the requirements of the act of Congress have been complied with, it is the duty of the proper authorities of this state to recognize the statements of fact made therein as true, and to surrender to the agent of the state making the demand the person demanded, in the fullest confidence that he will receive ample justice at the hands of the authorities of such state. The very fact that there is no mode of enforcing the performance of the duty imposed upon the Governor of the state upon which the demand is made, by mandamus or otherwise (Kentucky v. Dennison, supra [24 How. 63, 16 L. Ed. 717]), makes it all the more obligatory that he should be scrupulously exact and prompt in the performance of such duty, and that the courts should not lend their aid to defeat the provisions of the Constitution so essential to the preservation of that good will which ought always to exist between sister states, by demanding more than is required by the act of Congress." In re Sultan, 115 N. C. 57, 20 S. E. 375, 28 L. R. A. 294, 44 Am. St. Rep. 433; Barranger v. Raum, 103 Ga. 465, 30 S. E. 524, 68 Am.

St. Rep. 113; Singleton v. State, 42 South. 281; Ex parte Edwards, 91 Miss. 621, 44 South. 827; Bruyneel v. Wies, 153 Iowa, 565, 138 N. W. 1067. See, also, extended note 57 Am. Dec. 396; 21 Cyc. 329.

[4] Another established and obvious principle is that, when the extradition papers are regular on their face, every intendment is to be indulged in favor of their validity, and the burden is on the prisoner to show that some one of the conditions of extradition prescribed by the statutes, as above indicated, have not been met. Marbles v. Creecy, 215 U. S. 63, 30 Sup. Ct. 32, 54 L. Ed. 92. When the prisoner has made that prima facie showing, the court or judge issuing the writ may admit him to bail pending the final hearing on the writ.

[5] Applying these settled rules, it is perfectly clear that the circuit judge erred in admitting the prisoner to bail pending the final hearing. When the application was made, the showing before the judge consisted of the requisition papers of the Governor of Tennessee, and the mandate of the Governor of South Carolina, all made out in accordance with the statute and the verified petition of the prisoner. This petition contained nothing but statements that he intended to show that, while the prisoner had violated the criminal laws of Tennessee, he was guilty of no moral wrong, that the prosecution was a hardship on him, that it was instituted to collect a debt, and that the Governor of Georgia had refused to issue a requisition. All this had no tendency to show that the extradition statute had not been complied with, and therefore, under the principles just stated and the authorities sustaining it, furnished no ground whatever for the discharge of the prisoner on bail. This being so, the law required that the petitioner should be remanded to the custody of the sheriff to be thereafter surrendered to the state of Tennessee, according to the mandate of the Governor of the state of South Carolina, unless, at the future hearing, ordered for 27th of July, a successful attack should be made on the regularity of the proceedings.

It was further contended, on appeal, that the circuit judge erred in admitting the petitioner to bail without four days' notice to the counsel representing the prosecution. The state statute provided: "When it appears, from the return of the writ or otherwise, that the party is imprisoned on a criminal accusation, he shall not be discharged until sufficient notice has been given to the Attorney General, or circuit solicitor, or other attorney acting for the state, that he may appear and object to such discharge, if he think fit." We are not now concerned with the question whether a judge may not grant bail in cases of emergency, when the prisoner is entitled to bail, under the Constitution, as a matter of course; the only question being as to the amount. Here, as we have seen, he was not entitled to bail, as a matter of course, but only when a prima facie showing of noncompliance with the requisition statute should be made, and in such a case, while the statute does not prescribe the time, its clear import is that counsel shall have sufficient notice to enable them to resist the application for bail. The time is in the discretion of the circuit judge; but we think that there is strong reason for the position that it was error of law for the circuit judge to grant bail to a prisoner held on extradition proceedings, against the objection of counsel for the prosecution, on a few hours' notice. As the court is not unanimous now even on that point, and its decision is not necessary in this case, it is left undecided. We hold that the circuit judge was in error when he granted bail, because, on the showing before him, the petitioner was not entitled to bail.

[6] The circuit judge erred, also, in admitting as evidence to impeach the requisition of the Governor of Tennessee, solemnly made over his official signature and under the great seal of the state, mere affidavits of outside persons, to the effect that the Governor of Tennessee had told them that he had not signed the requisition. No argument or authority need be adduced to show that such a method of impeaching an official document is not only contrary to the rules of evidence, but would be an intolerable impugning by the judiciary of the most solemn communications between the highest executives of sovereign states.

[7] On the other hand, the circuit judge was clearly right in considering the telegram from Governor Blease, and that from Governor Hooper to Governor Blease indicating a withdrawal of the requisition. But even these telegrams were not sufficient authority to warrant the circuit judge's holding that the requisition had been revoked. They were of value only as justifying a continuation of the hearing to a future day, so as to give Governor Hooper an opportunity to withdraw his requisition by a formal communication to Governor Blease to that import. Governor Blease expressed accurately the force to be given to them when he requested Judge Sease to continue the habeas corpus proceedings until he could get the substance of the telegrams authenticated under the seal of the state of Tennessee. This was no doubt the view of the circuit judge also, who had before him, in addition to the documents above referred to, a communication from Governor Hooper to Governor Blease withdrawing the message of revocation, for he does not rest his order of discharge on the ground that the requisition had been withdrawn.

[8] The final question is whether there was error in considering and adjudicating the petition, and discharging the petitioner in his absence. The petitioner did not appear according to the terms of the bond, but submitted a physician's affidavit to the effect that he was too sick to leave his home in the city of Macon. Whether this affidavit was sufficient to warrant a further continuance would have been in the discretion of the circuit judge, if the petitioner had been properly discharged; but the principle is well settled in this state that, when an accused person gives bail for his appearance at a future time for the adjudication of the question whether his body shall be held in custody or released, he cannot have his right to discharge adjudicated, unless he is actually in the presence of the court or in the custody of an officer subject to the court's order. If he fails to appear without legal excuse, his bail will be forfeited, and his application for the inquiry as to the legality of his arrest and detention will be considered abandoned. If he offers sufficient excuse for not appearing, then the cause must be continued until it is possible for him to appear. In habeas corpus proceedings, the whole matter before the judicial officer is whether the accused shall be released or remanded to custody. Unless he is present in person or subject to the order of the court, it is manifest the court cannot make effective its judgment against the person. A preliminary hearing demanded by the prisoner falls under the same principle. In considering the point, as applied to a preliminary hearing, the court said, in State v. Rabens, 70 S. C. 542, 60 S. E. 442, 1110, 14 Ann. Cas. 968: "A preliminary examination must have one of three results, dependent on the decision of the magistrate: The discharge of the defendant; the taking of bail for his appearance to answer the indictment; or his imprisonment. It may be the magistrate, in the absence of the defendant, could adjudge his discharge; but to take bail from the defendant or commit him to jail, it was manifestly necessary for him to be present in person. The defendant could not demand that the magistrate go through the empty form of conducting an examination which could have no efficient result. By failing to appear in person, he had forfeited the recognizance (State v. Minton, 19 S. C. 280), and he waived his preliminary examination when, by voluntary absence, he made it impossible for the magistrate to enforce his judgment."

The judgment of this court is that the order of Judge Sease be reversed, and that the petitioner be required to appear in person before Judge Sease on a day to be designated by him, and that he then be remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Spartanburg county to be surrendered to the proper officer of the state of Tennessee, unless it shall officially appear that the requisition of the Governor of Tennessee or the mandate of the Governor of the state of South Carolina has been revoked. Reversed.

SIMPSON v. COX et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 16, 1918.)

1. USURY (§ 127*)—RIGHTS OF PARTIES NOT PRIVY TO USURY—WHO ARE PRIVY TO THE USURY.

The payee of a note, secured by mortgage, discounted it at the bank. The note was subsequently renewed by the bank at a usurious interest, the original payee indorsing it, but not receiving any benefit from the usury. The note was again renewed, discount at 8 per cent. being added to the principal, and indorsed and discounted by the original payee at another bank. The original payee paid the last note, and brought action to foreclose the mortgage. Held, that while the original payee could not recover the usury in the last note, as he would secure benefit therefrom, the usury in the first renewal note was no defense as it was an executed transaction, with which the original payee had nothing to do.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Usury, Cent. Dig. §§ 365-379; Dec. Dig. § 127.*]

2. REFERENCE (§ 100*)—REPORTS—EXCEPTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF.

An exception to a referee's report, alleging error in allowing plaintiff a certain sum, on the ground that so much was not due, was too general, as it did not apprise the court and opposing counsel of any specific error, and was insufficient to raise the question whether a particular note should have been allowed in the amount found to be due plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reference, Cent. Dig. §§ 157-168; Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 722*)—ASSIGNMENT OF ERRORS—FORM OF IN GENERAL.

Each assignment of error relied on should be clearly and concisely stated in separate exceptions, or under proper subdivisions, and be free from repetition and argument, though the ground on which the assignment of error is predicated may be stated when not otherwise apparent, but only one exception should be made for the same error, though it occur at different steps in the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2990-2996; Dec. Dig. § 722.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Anderson County; George E. Prince, Judge.

Action by W. A. Simpson against J. F. Cox and others, for foreclosure of a mortgage. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Martin, Greene & Earle, of Anderson, for appellant. Bonham, Watkins & Allen, of Anderson, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. [1] On July 31, 1908, the defendant Cox gave plaintiff his note for $2,300, payable six months after date, and secured same by mortgage. Plaintiff discounted the note at the Farmers' Bank of Williamston. Defendant made several payments on the note at the bank, and on April 24, 1909, renewed it for $1,341.00, due six months thereafter, plaintiff indorsing the renewal. On November 15, 1909, the Farmers' Bank of Williamston demanded payment. Defendant having failed to pay it, plaintiff agreed that if the bank would have defendant execute a renewal note for the amount due, he would indorse it and get the Bank of Piedmont to discount it. At that time Cox owed the Farmers' Bank of Williamston another note for $75, which was, by consent of the parties, included in the renewal note, which was discounted by the Bank of Piedmont. Defendant having failed to pay this last note at maturity, plaintiff paid it to the bank, and brought this action for foreclosure.

The answer set up the following defenses: A general denial, partial failure of consideration, usury, and a counterclaim for usurious interest paid. The referee found against all the defenses, and reported the amount due as alleged in the complaint. On exceptions to the report, only two questions were argued to the court, to wit, that the referee erred (1) in not sustaining the plea of usury, and (2) in including the $75 note in the mortgage debt. The court held that the last note was usurious, because discount at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum was added to its face, when by its terms it was to bear only straight interest at that rate, and decreed accordingly. But with regard to defendant's contention that the first renewal note was also usurious for the same reason, the court held that, as the transaction was entirely between the defendant and the Farmers' Bank of Williamston, the plaintiff getting none of the usurious interest charged by the bank on that renewal, and having nothing to do with it, except to indorse the renewal note, which was again voluntarily renewed by the defendant, the transaction was an executed one, and even though that renewal note was usurious, the plea of usury therein could not avail the defendant against the plaintiff. Upon this point, we agree with the circuit court. With regard to that renewal, the defendant is in the same position he would have been if he had paid the note at maturity. In that event he would have had no cause of action against the plaintiff, who did not receive any usurious interest, or any benefit thereof. On the other hand, if plaintiff had been allowed to recover in this action according to the face of the last renewal note, he would have received the benefit of usury therein.

[2] The court refused to consider the assignment of error in including the $75 note in the mortgage debt, on the ground that none of defendant's exceptions properly raised that question, holding that defendant's fifth exception, which was alone relied upon for that purpose, was too general. That exception was as follows: "Error of said special referee in finding as a matter of fact, and so reporting, the amount to be due plaintiff on said debt to be $1,490 principal and $149 interest, plus attorney's fee; it being shown by the preponderance of the testimony that the amount due plaintiff is not so much as that amount, and said special referee committed error in concluding that plaintiff is entitled to judgment of foreclosure against the defendant Cox for such amount." We agree with the circuit court in holding that this exception was too general. The office of an exception is to point out—specify—the error complained of. Turning to the exception, we find that it assigns error in finding $1,490 principal, and $149 interest, and attorney's fees to be due, on the ground that so much was not due. Now, how could the court or opposing counsel tell from the exception what the error complained of was? Was it in the principal, or in the interest, or in the attorney's fees? If the latter, whether the amount was too great, or whether the contention was that nothing at all was recoverable? Or, was it because of an error in calculation of interest, or because of the claim that one of the defenses set up should have been sustained; and, if the latter, which one? And why? For error of law or of fact? Any one or all of the matters mentioned could have been argued under the general language of the exception, as well as the point that the amount of the $75 note could not have been legally found to be a part of the debt secured by the mortgage, which shows conclusively that the exception did not specify the error complained of, which it is always easy to do, in a few words and without repetition, when one has clearly outlined in his own mind the assignment of error which he desires to bring to the attention of the court. In this case, it would have been sufficient to say that the referee erred "in including in the amount found to be due on the mortgage debt the amount of defendant's note for $75 to the Farmers' Bank of Williamston." The rule that exceptions must specify the errors complained of is simple and easy to comply with. It was intended to let the court and opposing counsel see at a glance what points of law or fact the appellant desires the court to review, and it is not fair, either to the court or opposing counsel, to allow an appellant, by the generality of the language of his exceptions, to so mask the questions which he will ask the court to review that they can be ascertained only by the aid of his own explanation of the purpose concealed in the generality of his language, thereby perhaps also allowing them to serve as a cover for an afterthought.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[3] Keeping in mind the purpose of exceptions, it is clear that it is rarely, if ever, necessary for them to be long or involved. They should contain no repetition or argument. They may properly contain the ground or reason upon which the assignment of error is predicated, when it is not clearly shown or necessarily implied in the assignment itself, but argument should be reserved for the briefs of counsel. Each assignment of error relied upon should be clearly and concisely stated in a separate exception, so that no exception should embrace more than one specification of error, unless it is under proper subdivisions. On the other hand, only one exception should be taken to bring up the same assignment of error. It is scarcely worth while to waste the time and tax the patience of the court with a point that is so attenuated that it requires to be stated in many ways to be seen and understood. Again, counsel sometimes file separate exceptions on the ground that the court erred in refusing a nonsuit, the direction of a verdict, and a motion for a new trial—all on the same ground. One exception should cover them all. We recently heard a personal injury case in which there were 39 pages of exceptions. Every point made could have been fully and clearly stated within the limits of three or four pages at most. To classify and analyze the exceptions in such a case, in order that they may be intelligently disposed of, is an unnecessary and vexatious strain upon the court and opposing counsel, and the court would have been warranted in dismissing the appeal because the exceptions were not taken in the manner prescribed by its rules. Besides, there is great danger that a single grain of wheat may be effectually concealed in so much chaff.

We take this occasion to make these observations and suggestions in the hope that, in future, exceptions both to the circuit court and to this court will be short, clear, and concise, specifying the errors complained of without circumlocution, argumentation, or repetition, and that only one exception will be taken to raise the same point. Counsel may act upon these suggestions with the assurance that all objections which their exceptions specify will receive the consideration of the court.

Judgment affirmed.

Watts, J., dissenting.

Appeals from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marlboro County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

Actions by the Royal Exchange Assurance of London and others, and by the Syracuse Insurance Company and others, against the Bennettsville & Cheraw Railroad Company. From a judgment for defendant in both cases, the plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

John T. Seibels, of Columbia, and James K. Owens, of Bennettsville, for appellants. Knox Livingston, Townsend & Rogers, and Stevenson, Stevenson & Prince, all of Bennettsville, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. These cases were heard together by consent, as they involve the same question.

[1] The appeal is from an order of his honor, the circuit judge, setting aside the service of the summons, on the ground that the complaint, which was not served with the summons, was not served upon the defendant's attorneys within the time required by the statute, after they had demanded that a copy be served upon them. The summons stated that the complaint would be filed in the office of the clerk of the court of common pleas.

The record contains the following statement of facts: "Each of the summons was served by the sheriff of Marlboro county on the agent of the defendant corporation on the 24th day of January, 1911. On February 13, 1911, counsel for defendant gave notice of appearance and demand that copy of the complaint in each case be served on them at the office of Stevenson, Stevenson & Prince, in Planters' National Bank Building, Bennettsville, S. C., the service of which was accepted by J. K. Owens on said date, and on the 14th day of February, 1911, the said John T. Seibels received through the mail an envelope postmarked 'Bennettsville, February 13, 7:30 p. m.' containing in each case a notice of appearance, and demand for service upon them for a copy of the complaint, signed by Messrs. Stevenson, Stevenson & Prince, defendant's attorneys, at their office, Planters' National Bank Building, Bennettsville, S. C. On Monday, the 6th day of March, 1911, the twenty-first day after the said 13th day of February, 1911, the complaint in each case was prepared by the said John T. Seibels, plaintiffs' attorney, and was deposited in the post office by his clerk and stenographer in the city of Columbia, in an envelope sealed and addressed to 'Messrs. Stevenson, Stevenson & Prince, Planters National Bank Building, Bennettsville, S. C.,' with sufficient postage prepaid. On Tuesday, March 7, 1911, defendant's counsel received by mail a copy of the complaint inclosed in an envelope postmarked 'Columbia, S. C., March 6, 1911, 9:30 p. m.'"

It will be observed, that the last day upon which the plaintiffs had the right to serve a copy of the complaint was Sunday.

Section 180 of the Code is as follows: "A copy of the complaint need not be served with the summons. In such case, the summons must state where the complaint is or will be filed, and if the defendant, within twenty days thereafter, causes notice of appearance to be given, and, in person or by attorney, demands in writing, a copy of the complaint, specifying the place within the state where it may be served, a copy thereof must, within twenty days thereafter, be served accordingly; and, after said service, the defendant has twenty days to answer."

Section 445 of the Code provides that: "The time within which an act is to be done, * * * shall be computed by excluding the first day and including the last. If the last day be Sunday it shall be excluded."

Section 448 provides, that: "Service by mail may be made where the person making the service and the person on whom it is to be made reside in different places, between which there is a regular communication by mail."

Section 454 of the Code is as follows: "The summons and the several pleadings in an action shall be filed with the clerk within ten days after the service thereof respectively, or the adverse party, on proof of the omission, shall be entitled without notice to an order from a judge that the same be filed within a time to be specified in the order, or be deemed abandoned."

Section 456 of the Code provides that: "The provisions of this chapter shall not apply to the service of a summons, or other process, or of any paper to bring a party into contempt."

The chapter just mentioned embraces sections 448 and 454 of the Code.

In Salley v. Railway, 76 S. C. 173, 56 S. E. 782, the court thus states the rule as to the computation of time within which an act is to be done, when the last day is Sunday: "The general rule laid down in this country is that where an act is required to be done in a certain number of days exceeding a week, Sunday is not excluded in the computation; but if the number of days is less than seven, Sunday is not counted." But the court further says: "It has been held, however, that Sunday must always be counted when the time is prescribed by statute"—thus recognizing the principle that the rule is inapplicable when the statute prescribes the manner in which the computation shall be made. And, as section 445 of the Code provides that Sunday shall be excluded if it be the last day within which an act is to be done, the rule in cases where the number of days is less than a week has no application.

[2] It is also contended by the appellants' attorneys that section 448 of the Code is inapplicable for the reason that the service of a copy of the complaint, under the circumstances herein mentioned, must be regarded as process; section 456 of the Code providing that the provisions of the chapter embracing said section should not apply to the service of a summons, or other process.

In Walters v. Laurens Cotton Mills, 53 S. C. 155, 31 S. E. 1, it was held that a notice of appeal, deposited in the post office on the tenth day, properly addressed and postage prepaid, was served in accordance with the statute. See, also, Craig v. Insurance Co., 80 S. C. 151, 61 S. E. 423, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 106, 128 Am. St. Rep. 877, 15 Ann. Cas. 216, and State v. Gandy, 87 S. C. 523, 70 S. E. 163.

Section 454 of the Code recognizes the distinction between the summons and the pleadings, the latter of which—pleadings—embraces the complaint.

The word "process" has been variously defined, for the reason that the context generally plays an important part in its construction. "The term 'process' comprehends all mandates of a court issued to its officer, commanding him to prepare certain service within his official cognizance, and embraces every writ that may be necessary to institute or carry on an action or suit and to execute the judgment of the court." 28 Enc. of Law, 160. Process, in the sense in which it is employed in the present title, means the writ, or other formal writing issued by authority of law, for the purpose of bringing defendant into a court of law to answer plaintiffs' demands in a civil action, although in a more technical and limited sense the term is frequently applied only to those writs or writings which issued out of a court. 82 Cyc. 419-421. In its general acceptance it means a writ, a summons, or order issued in a judicial proceeding to acquire jurisdiction of a person or his property, to expedite the hearing of the cause to a final determination, or to enforce the judgment of the court. A complaint is a mere pleading, and does not partake of these characteristics.

It is the judgment of this court that the order of the circuit court be reversed.

HYDRICK and FRASER, JJ., concur.

WATTS, J. (dissenting). These cases were heard together on the appeal, and the facts involved and questions raised are identical. The summons in each case was served upon the defendant by the sheriff of Marlboro county, on January 24, 1911. The complaints were not served with the summons. The summons stated that the complaint "will be filed in the office of the clerk of the court for common pleas for said county," and required the answer to the complaint to be served on John T. Seibels, No. 5 Clark Building, Columbia, S. C., within 20 days after service, exclusive of the day of service. The summons was subscribed by John T. Seibels and J. K. Owens, plaintiffs' attorneys. Seibels lives at Columbia, S. C., and Owens at Bennettsville, S. C. On February 13, 1911, counsel for defendant gave notice of appearance, and demanded that copy of complaint in each case be served on them at the office of Stevenson, Stevenson & Prince, in the Planters' National Bank Building, Bennettsville, S. C. The service of this notice was accepted by Mr. Owens on that date, and on February 14, 1911, Mr. Seibels received this notice, by mail, at Columbia, S. C. On March 6, 1911, 21 days after February 13, 1911, the complaints in each case were prepared and mailed with postage prepaid, to the defendant's counsel at Bennettsville, S. C., as demanded by the notice of appearance. The defendant's counsel received the complaints so mailed next day, March 7, 1911, and forthwith returned the same to plaintiff's attorneys, as not having been served within the time prescribed by law. The complaints were not filed in the clerk of court's office for Marlboro county, until March 22, 1911. On March 20, 1911, the defendant's counsel served notice that they appeared solely for the purpose of said motion, and would move on the 24th day of March, 1911, before his honor, Judge Shipp, "for an order setting aside the service of summons dismissing this case for failure to file the complaint in time, and also for failure to serve the same in time under the statutes of this state." After hearing the motion, his honor passed an order setting aside the serving of the complaints in each case, on the ground that it appeared that the complaints in each of the actions were not served within 20 days, in accordance with the notice, and demand of copy thereof, or pursuant to the statute in such cases made and provided, nor were the complaints filed in the office of the clerk within 20 days, as stated would be done in the summons in said actions. Upon announcing the judgment of the court a motion was made for leave to serve the complaints at that time on the ground of surprise, the court denied this motion, as no notice was given the other side that any such motion would be made, but without prejudice to plaintiffs' applying to any proper authority for any relief they may be entitled to under any section of the Code. The appellants appeal, and challenge the correctness of his honor's order.

We think the appeal should be dismissed; and, while we can find no ruling in this state directly on the points at issue, we find the identical language in our Code, as in the New York Code: "A copy of the complaint need not be served with the summons, in such case the summons must state where the complaint is, or will be filed; and if the defendant within twenty days thereafter causes notice of appearance to be given, and in person, or by attorney, demands in writing a copy of the complaint, specifying a place within the state where it may be served, a copy thereof must, within twenty days thereafter, be served accordingly," etc.

"In ordinary cases 20 days are allowed after demand for service of copy of complaint, where defendant's attorney served notice of retainer, and demanded complaint at two different times for several defendants, and after 20 days from the first service, but not the last, moved to dismiss the complaint for want of service, held that the defendant might move on the proof of service of the first notice, and demand without waiting for the expiration of 20 days from the last service." Luce v. Trempert, 9 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 212.

"An order giving the plaintiff further time to serve his complaint, cannot be granted ex parte, after the time for serving it (the complaint) has expired. Notice" must be given, "or an order to show cause." Stephens v. Moore, 6 N. Y. Super. Ct. 674.

"Where the complaining party should file his pleading within a specified time, or where either party has placed his adversary in such position as to make it a duty to plead, it is requisite that, unless further time be granted, the required act should be fully performed within the time limited, whether that time be prescribed by statute, general rules of court, or rule or order to declare or plead." Ency. of Pleading and Practice, vol. 21, page 699.

Reference to footnotes made from South Carolina cases sustain this doctrine. McBride v. Floyd, 2 Bailey, 209; Stephen v. Thayer, 2 Bay, 272; Kennedy v. Smith, 1

Brev. 208; Murphy v. Sumner, 1 Hill, 216; Higginbottom v. Wright, 1 Nott & McC., p. 8; Perry v. Aiken, 3 Rich. 60; State Bank v. Torre, 2 Speers, 501.

I think judgment should be affirmed, however, without prejudice to the right of the plaintiffs. Appellants to apply to the circuit court for leave to serve the complaint nunc pro tunc upon such terms as the court may impose as provided for in Judge Shipp's order.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Greenville County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

B. G. Wade and another were convicted of fornication, and they appeal. Reversed.

John C. Henry and J. Robert Martin, both of Greenville, for appellants. P. A. Bonham, of Greenville, for the State.

HYDRICK, J. [1] The appellants were tried, in their absence, for fornication. With the exception of certain admissions of the defendant Meta Wade, proved by the deputy sheriff who executed the warrant of arrest, the evidence was wholly circumstantial. Stated most strongly against the defendants, the substance of it was that B. G. Wade was a widower whose family consisted of a son and two daughters. At the time of the trial, the son was 19, and the daughters were 13 and 14 years old, respectively. He had also an older son, who was the husband of the defendant Meta. Some years ago—possibly from three to five, though the testimony does not disclose the date even approximately—Meta and her husband moved into the home of B. G. Wade, and lived with him, as members of his family. Some time after that (another period not fixed by the evidence) Meta's husband died, and she continued to live in the house of her father-in-law, as a member of his family. After the death of her husband she gave birth to two children. One died shortly after its birth. The other was about two years old at the time of the trial. Meta's statement to the deputy sheriff was to the effect that for several years she had been wanting to leave B. G. Wade, and go back to her father's, but that she could not do so, because he would not let her go, and that if he (the officer) would keep Wade off her, until she could get away, she would leave him and go to her father's. She admitted that she had slept in the bed with her codefendant, and said she knew the officer had a warrant for them for living in adultery. She showed him a bleeding cancer on her breast, and told him that Wade had come home drunk, and beat her nearly to death, and stamped her in the breast.

The court instructed the jury that, if they could not come to any other reasonable conclusion, from the facts and circumstances in evidence, than that the defendants were guilty, they would be justified in so finding, but that, if they could just as reasonably conclude that they were innocent as that they were guilty, they would not be warranted in convicting them; that they were entitled to the benefit of every reasonable doubt; that the admissions of Meta could not be considered as evidence against B. G. Wade; and that they must acquit or convict both; that, under the indictment, they could not acquit one and convict the other.

[2, 3] It appears clearly that there was no competent evidence to support the conviction of B. G. Wade. Meta's admission cannot be taken against him. The other facts and circumstances are not inconsistent with his innocence. In other words, all of them may be true, and still he may be innocent. Therefore they do not come up to the standard required by the law to warrant a conviction, which is that they must point so conclusively to guilt as to exclude every other reasonable hypothesis. Therefore the court erred in refusing to set aside the verdict.

[4] The court erred also in charging that, under the indictment, one of the defendants could not be acquitted and the other convicted. If that ruling was based upon the reasoning that, because the indictment charged the defendant jointly, only a joint verdict could be found, it was erroneous, because, while the indictment was joint in form, in legal effect it was joint and several.

[5, 6] Nor does the nature of the offense forbid a severance either in the trial of the parties charged, or in the verdict, when they are jointly tried. While it is true that it takes two to commit the crime, as it also does the crime of adultery, so far as the physical act is concerned, it does not necessarily follow that both engage in it with criminal intent. One may be insane, or may participate in the act on account of force, fear or fraud. In such a case the law would neither allow the guilty party to escape, nor would it punish the innocent one. If B. G. Wade compelled Meta to submit to him through force or fear, she should be pitied and protected rather than condemned and punished. Again, it may happen on the trial of such a charge that, though both the defendants may be guilty, there may be no evidence at all against one, while there may be ample evidence by admission or confession against the other. This question was involved in State v. Carroll, 30 S. C. 90, 8 S. E. 433, 14 Am. St. Rep. 883, where it was decided contrary to the instructions given in this case. See, also, State v. Cutshall, 109 N. C. 764, 14 S. E. 107, 26 Am. St. Rep. 590.

The other grounds are overruled.
Reversed.

STATE v. STONE.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 25, 1913. On Petition for Rehearing Sept. 1, 1913.)

1. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 7*)—ELEMENTS—NATURE OF PRETENSE.

Under Cr. Code 1912, § 220, providing that any person who shall by any false pretense or representation obtain from any other person any money, chattel, or other property, with intent to cheat and defraud any person of the same, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, an indictment charging that accused falsely pretended that a certain horse was sound in every respect, which pretense he knew to be false, whereby he obtained another horse, the property of such witness, with intent to cheat and defraud him, stated facts constituting a crime; the representation that the horse was sound in every respect being the statement of a material fact and not of an opinion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 5-12, 25; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

2. FALSE PRETENSES, (§ 49*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In a prosecution for falsely pretending, in connection with a horse trade, that the horse traded by accused was sound in every respect, evidence as to the representations made by him and as to his knowledge of their falsity held sufficient to support a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. § 62; Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

Watts, J., dissenting.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Laurens County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Frank Stone was convicted of obtaining goods under false pretenses, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Richey & Richey, of Laurens, for appellant. R. A. Cooper, of Laurens, for the State.

GARY, O. J. The defendant was tried before a jury, and convicted of obtaining goods under false pretenses. The indictment charged him with falsely pretending that a certain bay horse was sound in every respect, which pretense he then and there knew to be false, whereby he obtained from Lander H. Willis one roan horse, the property of the said Lander H. Willis, of the value of $150 with intent to cheat and defraud the said Lander H. Willis.

[1] The first question that will be considered is whether his honor, the presiding judge, erred in refusing the motion to quash the indictment, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a crime. Section 220 of the Criminal Code (1912) provides that: "Any person who shall, by any false pretense or representation, * * * obtain from any other person any chattel, money, * * * or other property * * * with intent to cheat and defraud any person of the same, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." The allegation in the indictment that the defendant represented that the bay horse was sound in every respect was not only the statement of a fact and not of an opinion, but of a material fact sufficient to render him liable for damages in a civil action, if the statement was untrue. The indictment charged that the defendant made this representation, knowing it to be false, with intent to cheat and defraud the prosecutor, and thereby obtained from him one roan horse of the value therein alleged.

The case of State v. Hicks, 77 S. C. 289, 57 S. E. 842, shows that the motion to quash the indictment was properly refused. In construing the statute, the court in that case said: "It is perfectly manifest from the express terms of the statute that an intent to cheat and defraud is an essential element of the statutory crime, and it is elementary that every essential element of the crime must be alleged and proven. This principle was well understood by the prosecuting officer, for the indictment not only alleges that the pretenses were known to be false, but that the defendant thereby intended to cheat and defraud."

Turning to the appellant's authorities, we find that he quotes the following language from Bishop on Criminal Law, vol. 2, § 454 (7th Ed.), under the head of false pretenses: "If we look to the reason of the law, and especially to its words, we shall see that its aim is to prevent cheating, and the specific cheat denounced is the one affected by a false pretense. Now a mere opinion is not false pretense; but any statement of a present or past fact is, if false. When two men are negotiating a bargain, they may express opinions about their wares to any extent they will, answering, if they lie about the opinions, only to God, and to the civil department of the law of the country. But when the thing concerns fact, as distinguished from opinion, his words in reason amount to a false pretense." The words of the indictment constitute the false statement of an existing fact at the time of the exchange of horses. While there are many cases as to the soundness of a horse, in which there can be no certain knowledge, still there are also numerous cases in which the fact of unsoundness may be as certain as in any other instance. When the fact of unsoundness is certain, and the party making a statement in regard to it has knowledge of such fact, and nevertheless makes a false representation, with intent to cheat and defraud, it would be against public policy to allow him to escape punishment under the criminal law. The language hereinbefore quoted from Bishop on Criminal Law sustains our conclusion as to the sufficiency of the indictment.

The appellant's attorneys also rely upon the case of State v. Delyon, 1 Bay, 353. The report of that case is very short, and is as follows: "The defendant in this case was indicted under the swindling act for selling a blind horse as and for a sound horse, excepting a blemish in one eye, when the defendant had been told he was a blind horse before the sale. The Attorney General contended that this was an act of swindling, under the law for preventing such deceitful practices. The court (present, Waties, J., and Bay, J.), after hearing counsel in reply, were of the opinion that this was not such a fraud as was indictable either at common law or under the act of assembly; that it had the appearance of a breach of contract, or rather a concealment of a blemish (if the defendant knew it), for which he was answerable in damages in a civil suit; that to encourage a prosecution of this kind would have a tendency to bring almost every civil injury into the jurisdiction of the court of sessions, which might be extremely injurious in its consequences to the community."

There are material differences in the two cases. In the first place, it does not appear that the defendant in the Delyon Case knew that the horse was unsound, and, in the second place, even if the defendant knew of the defect, it was regarded as rather a concealment of a blemish, which is passive or negative, and not a false pretense, knowingly made with intent to cheat and defraud, which is active and positive in its nature. But, be that as it may, if that decision must be construed as holding that a false representation of the soundness of a horse, made with knowledge of the fact that the horse was unsound, with intent to cheat and defraud, then it will not be longer regarded as authority for that proposition; such a doctrine would tend to encourage fraud and swindling, and is against the canons of morality.

[2] The next question for consideration is whether there was error in refusal to direct a verdict, on the ground that there was no testimony tending to prove that the defendant made any false representation, or that he had any intention to cheat and defraud.

Lander H. Willis, the prosecutor, testified in substance as follows: "The defendant and one W. N. Myers came to Gray Court in a buggy, driving a bay mare and leading a roan mare. The bay mare belonged to the defendant, and the roan mare belonged to W. N. Myers. Willis' roan horse matched Myers' roan mare, and the defendant wanted the pair for a prospective buyer. In the afternoon the defendant offered to trade his bay mare for prosecutor's roan horse, and asked $25 to boot. The defendant hitched his mare and Myers' mare to prosecutor's buggy, for him to see the mare work, and after driving around awhile the prosecutor offered to trade even, but no trade was then made. Thereafter the defendant offered to trade for $10 to boot. Prosecutor would not agree to give $10, but said he would stick to his offer to trade even. The defendant said, 'Well, I will just make you trade anyway.' Prosecutor said, 'Now remember, you guarantee the horse to be sound, straight, and work anywhere.' Defendant said, 'Yes.' Prosecutor then turned to Mr. Owens and Mr. Stevens and said, 'I call you all as witnesses to that.' Then the defendant said, 'Now, I have only had the horse 10 days; I will guarantee it, as far as I know.' The prosecutor then told the defendant, 'If he had had the horse 10 days, he had had it long enough to know whether it was sound or not.' Defendant then said to the prosecutor, 'Well, don't you want to try it?' Prosecutor then said, 'Well, we will have to go over into the field to change; we can drive it over there, and I can let the negro plough it, to see how it ploughs.' The prosecutor and defendant went to the field, and the negro ploughed the mare; she ploughed all right, and the trade was made. The next morning the prosecutor discovered that the mare was blind in one eye, and could not see much out of the other, and wrote the defendant that he had put a blind horse off on the prosecutor. Not hearing from the defendant, the prosecutor swore out a warrant for the defendant."

Arthur Stevens, a witness for the state, testified in substance as follows: "That he and the prosecutor were in the store playing checkers; that defendant came in and said something about a horse swap. Prosecutor said he would stick to what he had said. Defendant said something about taking less. Prosecutor said he would not do anything more than what he had said. Defendant said, 'Well, I will just consider it a swap.' Prosecutor said, 'You have to guarantee the horse to be sound and all right in every respect.' Defendant said he would, so far as he knew. Prosecutor turned to Mr. Owens and myself, and called us as witnesses to it. Defendant said he would guarantee it, so far as he knows, and that is about all I heard of it. Defendant said he had only had the horse about 10 days."

The agreement on the part of the defendant that he would guarantee the horse to be sound, as far as he knew, was sufficient to render him liable in a civil action, whether the facts were such as to make him amenable to the criminal law or not. In order, however, to constitute the offense of obtaining goods under false pretenses, there must be not only a false pretense or misrepresentation, but it must be made to cheat and defraud. The agreement to guarantee the soundness of the horse, so far as the defendant knew, when considered in connection with the other testimony, was susceptible of the inference that he intended his words as a representation that if the horse was unsound he did not know it. Therefore, his knowledge of the unsoundness of the horse was a material fact in the case. In the synopsis of the defendant's testimony the following appears: "Defendant knew that the mare had defective eyes; knew her eyes were weak; did not know that one eye was entirely gone; did not know that the mare would likely go blind." In the synopsis of G. H. Moore's testimony we find the following: "While witness was examining defendant's horse, he, the witness, struck at the horse's eye to see if it was blind. Defendant told witness not to do that, because Mrs. Willis was out there, and further said that witness would have the horse blind in both eyes—something like that—in a joking way. Witness examined the horse's eyes, and one looked like it was blind; the other eye looked fairly well." Pearly Moore, a witness for the defendant, testified in substance as follows: "Witness knows Frank Stone; saw him at Gray Court the day he traded horses with Lander H. Willis; saw defendant's blaze-face mare; noticed her eyes. One eye looked like it was out, the other eye looked like it might be all right. A person of ordinary intelligence could see that there was something wrong with one of the mare's eyes." It seems that the defendant was a horse trader and that the prosecutor, Willis, rather relied upon the defendant's representation that upon his own judgment as to the soundness of the mare.

The foregoing testimony amply sustains the verdict of the jury.

Judgment affirmed.

HYDRICK and FRASER, JJ., concur.

WATTS, J. I dissent from the opinion of the Chief Justice, herein, and think the motion to quash the indictment should have been granted, as it did not state any criminal offense. The allegation that the defendant represented that the bay horse was sound could not be any more than in the opinion of the party making the statement he was. If he made a false statement knowingly that he was, might be sufficient to render him liable for damages in a civil action. Parties trading horses are allowed latitude in expressing the opinion of their horses, and trade generally with intent each to get the better of the others, and under the evidence in the case the trial judge should have directed a verdict of acquittal, as the evidence of prosecutor, himself, showed that the defect in the horse, complained of, was patent, not latent, and by the exercise of the slightest care, by examining and using his eyes, he could have ascertained that the horse's eyes were defective, and under the evidence and the case of State v. Delyon, 1 Bay, 353, quoted by the Chief Justice, the motion of defendant to direct a verdict should have been granted. That state has succeeded in convicting the defendant on testimony, which in my opinion it is doubtful if the prosecutor would win in a civil suit for damages against defendant where he could recover if he make out his case, by a preponderance of the evidence only. For these reasons I dissent.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. After careful consideration of the petition herein, the court is satisfied that the opinion practically disposes of every question presented by the exceptions.

It is therefore ordered that the petition be dismissed and that the order heretofore granted staying the remittitur be revoked.

POTTS v. CITY OF ATLANTA.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 19, 1913.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 238*)—APPEAL BY CITY—PROCEDURE—BONDS.

Where a municipality seeks to condemn an easement for the construction of a sewer, and desires to appeal from the assessors' award, under Civil Code 1910, § 5228, the appeal is duly entered upon the city's filing with the clerk of the superior court, within the statutory time, a bond for the eventual condemnation money, containing a recital of the proceedings and the result thereof, and of a desire to appeal from the award to the superior court.

(a) Such a bond may be executed and the appeal entered by the attorney at law of the city.

(b) Corporate municipal action is not necessary to authorize the appeal.

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 79*)—GROUNDS—JUDGMENT NOT FOLLOWING VERDICT.

That a judgment does not follow, or is not authorized by, the verdict upon which it is entered, is not a good ground of a motion for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 165½; Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

3. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 136*)—COMPENSATION—DAMAGES.

Where it is sought to condemn an easement of sewer on private property for public use, the landowner is entitled to recover damages for the property actually taken, and, in addition thereto, such damages to the remainder of the lot as flow from the construction of the sewer. The excerpts from the charge to which exception is taken, when considered in their relation to the whole charge, did not encroach or narrow this legal principle.

4. REVIEW OF INSTRUCTIONS.

Other grounds of the motion are without merit.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Condemnation by the City of Atlanta against Henry Potts. From the assessment, the City appealed, and on verdict rendered for a less amount, defendant moved for new trial, and on refusal brings error. Affirmed.

Walter R. Brown, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Jas. L. Mayson and W. D. Ellis, Jr., both of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. The city of Atlanta proposed to construct a trunk sewer across the rear of the property of Mrs. Henry Potts, a distance of 404 feet. Being unable to agree upon the amount of damages resulting from its construction, the city proceeded under the statute to condemn the property. The majority of the assessors awarded to Mrs. Potts the sum of $1,500 as the value of the easement upon the land actually used in the construction of the sewer, and $3,000 as consequential damages to the balance of the property. One of the assessors dissented. An appeal was taken to the superior court by the city, and on the trial of the case a verdict was returned against the city for the sum of $262.50. Mrs. Potts moved for a new trial, which was refused.

[1] 1. A motion was made to dismiss the appeal, on the grounds that no exceptions were filed to the award by the city and no demand for an appeal; that the bond was signed by the assistant city attorney, who was without authority to sign it; and that no appeal could be taken by the city without corporate action. In the matter of an appeal from the award of assessors in a condemnation proceeding, the statute provides that "in case either party, or representative of either party, is dissatisfied, he or they shall have the right, within ten days from the time the award is filed, to enter in writing an appeal from the award to the superior court of the county where the award is filed." Civil Code, § 5228. No particular form of entering an appeal is prescribed by the statute. The general provisions applicable to appeals from inferior courts to the superior court provide that an appeal may be entered by the plaintiff or his attorney; but the appellant shall, previously to obtaining such appeal, pay all costs which may have accrued, and give bond and security for the eventual condemnation money. Civil Code, §§ 5002, 5003. The statute does not require that the entry of an appeal be made by a separate writing. An appeal to the superior court is duly entered where a party within the time prescribed by the statute pays the costs and executes and files a bond in terms of the statute, containing the recital of the judgment and a desire to appeal therefrom to the superior court. Ordinarily an affidavit of the appellant's inability to pay costs and give bond is a legal excuse for not paying the cost and giving the bond; but such affidavit in forma pauperis must be filed within the time for entering an appeal.

In the case at bar, within ten days from the filing of the award of the assessors, the city paid the accrued costs and filed an appeal bond, duly approved by the deputy clerk, conditioned to pay the eventual condemnation money. This bond containing the recital that the city undertook to condemn an easement for the construction of a sewer over a described lot of land belonging to Mrs. Potts, and that the majority of the assessors made an award that Mrs. Potts would be damaged in the sum of $4,500 by the construction and maintenance of the sewer, with which award the city was dissatisfied, and desired to appeal therefrom as provided by law to the superior court. The filing of this bond within ten days from the time the award was filed was a sufficient entry of an appeal. The bond was signed by the city's attorney. The statute expressly authorizes an attorney at law to enter an appeal, and also sign the name of his principal to the bond. We know of no law which requires a corporation to take corporate action with reference to each step in a lawsuit to which such corporation is a party. A corporation who duly appears by an attorney impliedly authorizes such attorney to take all necessary steps to conduct the litigation to a conclusion.

[2] 2. One ground of the motion was that the decree in the case did not follow the verdict. There was no direct exception complaining of any variance between the verdict and decree. A motion for new trial reaches the errors in the finding of the jury, or such errors of the court as may lead to the finding, but is not the proper method of correcting errors in a decree or judgment. First State Bank v. Carver, 111 Ga. 876 (2), 86 S. E. 960.

[3] 3. There was evidence that there was a spring on or near the property sought to be occupied by the construction of the sewer, and that the taking of the particular strip of land would destroy or materially injure the spring, which would result in consequential damage to the remainder of the property. The movant carves out two excerpts from the charge, which are not in juxtaposition, as follows: "If you find that there is a spring on that property through which the easement goes, you would have the right to consider that in connection with the value of the property; but you do not determine what the spring is worth and give any damage to Mrs. Potts for the value of the spring. The question is: What is the land worth, the 6 feet of land, or any other number of feet which the city seeks to obtain? What is the value of that land, with the spring on it, or anything that is on it, and what damage does the city do by constructing a sewer through there—the easement that the city undertakes to establish by putting a sewer through that strip of land? The damage to that strip of land by the easement is the thing that she has a right to recover." And: "If the spring is not on the strip of land through which the easement goes but is on the other land adjacent thereto, belonging to Mrs. Potts, then Mrs. Potts could recover, not the mere damage to the spring, but any damage to the market value of the property on account of the sewer and whatever the sewer did, whatever the construction of the sewer accomplished. If it has affected the market value of the balance of the land, or lessened it, she is entitled to recover. If it has not lessened it, she is not entitled to recover. But, as I stated to you before, if the spring is on the strip through which the city seeks an easement, you look to the value of that strip as it was, and you determine what is the damage to that strip by reason of putting the sewer through, and that damage Mrs. Potts would have the right to recover, without any set-off; so that, to make it a little plainer, gentlemen, it is a question of damage without any set-off on the question of easement, but on the question of damage to the balance of the land it is a question as to whether its market value has been affected, and, if so, whether it is detrimental, and how much it is detrimental to the market value."

It is complained that these excerpts limited a consideration of the value of the spring, if located on the land actually taken, as affecting the land actually taken, or, if located on the land not taken, as affecting the land not taken, and were too restrictive in scope, inasmuch as they excluded from the computation of damages the value of the spring if located on the land actually taken in its relation to the value of the whole property. In other places in the charge the court instructed the jury that the landowner was entitled to be compensated for the value of the land actually used for the construction and maintenance of the sewer, without any deduction, and that in addition thereto the landowner was entitled to be reimbursed for any consequential damage to the remainder of the property resulting from the construction of the sewer. When the charge is taken as a whole, we do not think that the court could have been understood by the jury as instructing them that, if the spring was located on the land actually taken up by the sewer, the effect of its destruction or material injury could not be considered in arriving at the consequential damage to the remainder of the property.

[4] 4. The instructions on the subject of the preponderance of evidence, and on the form of the verdict given to the jury, are not open to the criticism made of them. There was evidence sufficient to uphold the verdict, which has the approval of the trial judge.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

STREET RAILROADS (§ 117*)—INJURY TO PEDESTRIANS—QUESTIONS FOR JURY—PLEADING.

In a suit by a widow to recover damages for the homicide of her husband by a street railroad, the question of the defendant's negligence, and of the diligence of the plaintiff's husband in avoiding the consequences of the alleged negligence of the defendant by the exercise of ordinary care, and to what extent the deceased contributed to his injury by his neglect, if any, were questions for the jury.

(a) Where in such a case the petition alleged that immediately preceding the injury the plaintiff's husband looked in the direction from which the car was coming before attempting to cross the tracks at a regular street crossing, and that at that time the car was far enough away to have enabled him to cross in safety, but that, owing to the high and unlawful rate of speed at which the car was running, it overtook, struck, and injured him, and this allegation was denied by the answer, and neither the petition alleged nor the evidence showed that the deceased ever saw the car or heard the gong before being struck, it was error for the court to direct a verdict for the defendant.

(b) In such a case it was a question for the jury to decide, under the evidence, whether the defendant was negligent, or whether the plaintiff's husband exercised ordinary care in going upon the tracks of the defendant company, or to what extent he contributed to his injury by his neglect, if any.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

Action by Belle S. Howard against the Savannah Electric Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Mrs. Belle Strong Howard instituted an action against the Savannah Electric Company to recover damages for the alleged wrongful killing of her husband, Charles M. Howard, by the running of its cars. The petition alleged, in substance, that as Howard was proceeding east on the south side of Bolton street, in the city of Savannah, and was proceeding across Whitaker street, and across the tracks of the defendant company, which are about the middle of the street, a car of the defendant struck and killed him; that the defendant was negligent in running the car at a high, dangerous, and unlawful rate of speed, to wit, in excess of 10 miles an hour, in violation of the Code of the city of Savannah; that there was an electric light at the corner of Whitaker and Bolton streets, which illuminated the streets; and that Howard was in full view of the motorman, had he been looking, while Howard was crossing the tracks, and the motorman could have avoided striking him, if the car had been going at a moderate rate of speed and he had had it under control, and if he had been properly experienced, which it was alleged he was not, but was an inexperienced youth.

The eighth paragraph of the petition is as follows: "Your petitioner shows that her said husband cautiously crossed said tracks; that he looked in the direction from which the car came before going on the tracks, and that at that time the car was far enough away to have enabled him to cross in safety; but that owing to the high and unlawful rate of speed at which the car was running it overtook the said Howard just as he was stepping from the eastern rail, and struck his right kneecap, breaking it. The car ran about 150 feet before coming to a stop." It was alleged that Howard was 62 years old, and was in the exercise of ordinary care and caution for his own safety; that he had the right to cross the tracks at a regular street crossing; that at the time he started across the car was a safe distance away, and he would have crossed in safety, had not the car been run at a high and dangerous rate of speed by a boy who was inexperienced; that Howard did not contribute or assent to his injuries; that, even if his act in crossing the street amounted to contributory negligence, the defendant was so grossly negligent (and without this negligence deceased would not have been injured) that the plaintiff will not be barred a recovery, but that her recovery will be diminished under the law applicable to such cases, etc.

The answer denied each and every material allegation contained in the petition, including the eighth paragraph quoted above. After the introduction of evidence had closed, the defendant moved the court to direct a verdict in its favor, on the ground that the allegations of the petition and the evidence thereunder, and particularly the eighth paragraph of the petition, showed as a matter of law that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, because the deceased did not exercise ordinary care for his own safety, when by the exercise of such care he could have avoided injury to himself. The court directed a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff excepted.

Twiggs & Gazan, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error. Osborne & Lawrence, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). The decision in the case of Thomas v. Central Ry. Co., 121 Ga. 38, 48 S. E. 683, is relied upon by the defendant as controlling in this case. This court there held: "One who deliberately goes upon a railroad track in front of an approaching train, thinking that she can cross before the train reaches her, and miscalculating its speed because she is in front of it, cannot recover for injuries resulting from being run down by the train, although the company's servants may have been negligent in running at a high rate of speed at that point, and also in failing to check the speed of the train at a public road which crossed the track between the place where the train was when first seen by the plaintiff and the point at which the injury occurred. The above facts being set out in a declaration, a demurrer thereto was properly sustained; for it is clear, from the allegations made, that the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have avoided the injury." That case is distinguishable from the instant one. That case involved a steam railroad, on which the rate of speed and the danger is much greater than in the case of a street railroad, where cars stop usually at every street crossing, and the speed is regulated by city ordinance. In the present case the speed was not to exceed 10 miles an hour. The public have the right to the use of the street car tracks for the purpose of crossing and recrossing, without being regarded as trespassers. At street crossings, owing to the low rate of speed and the light construction and equipment of the cars, the public have the right to expect that they will be under control. The public has never surrendered the entire use of the streets. In the Thomas Case, supra, the deceased had deliberately gone upon the tracks of a steam railroad, knowing of the approach of a train, and miscalculating its speed, and her ability to cross in safety, took the chances and was injured. In such a case, of course, there could be no recovery. The deceased in that case was guilty of such contributory negligence as to bar a recovery.

In the present case, the deceased was an old man, 62 years old, and deaf. He was in a public street, attempting to cross. He was not a trespasser, but had a right to the use of the tracks. It is true that in the petition it is alleged that the plaintiff's husband looked in the direction from which the car was coming before going on the tracks, and that at the time the car was far enough away to have enabled him to cross in safety, but that, owing to the high and unlawful rate of speed at which the car was running, it overtook him just as he was stepping from the car track, and struck his right kneecap, breaking it, from the effects of which he died. But all these allegations were denied by the answer, including, of course, the allegation that the deceased looked in the direction the car was coming. But the petition did not allege, nor did the evidence show, that the deceased ever saw the approaching car before he stepped upon the track where he was struck. Indeed, the evidence of the motorman tended to show that he did not see the deceased until he was within 15 or 20 feet of him, when he sounded the gong, applied the brakes, and endeavored to stop the car, but could not until the deceased was struck. He was in as good position to see the deceased as the deceased was to see the car.

The issue as to the speed of the car, the negligence of the defendant's agents, and the diligence of the plaintiff's husband were thus in issue. The evidence for the plaintiff tended to show that immediately before the car struck the deceased the high speed of the car attracted the attention of some of the passengers. The conductor was asked why he was running so fast, and whether that was his last trip. He replied that he had another trip to make. The witness "had hardly gotten the words out of" his mouth when the deceased was hit by the car. The car was going 18 or 20 miles an hour. The car rolled 30 or 40 feet after it struck the deceased. The evidence for the defendant tended to show that he had about 2 years' experience as a motorman, and was 22 years old. The car was going not more than 6 or 8 miles an hour, and he based that estimate of the speed of the car on the fact that "we were going to make schedule." The motorman noticed the deceased just as he stepped off the curbstone on the west side of Whitaker street. He was ringing his gong continuously all the way out there. When the deceased stepped off the curbing he was in a position of safety. From the curbing to the western rail is about 7 feet. When the motorman saw the deceased step off the curb he rang the gong especially for him and "halloped" at him. He did not stop, but walked across the track very rapidly. When the motorman saw that the deceased did not heed the warning, he tried to stop by applying the brakes and reversing the current. The car went 12 feet after striking the deceased. Although the petition alleged that the plaintiff's husband looked in the direction the car was coming, it does not appear from the petition or the evidence that the deceased ever saw the approaching car, or that he heard the gong or shout of the motorman.

Under these circumstances, we cannot say, as a matter of law, that the effort of the plaintiff's husband to cross the track ahead of the car at a public crossing in a city was such an act of contributory negligence on his part as to amount to a failure to exercise ordinary care. Whether it was or not, under the circumstances of this case, was a question of fact which should have been left to the jury to determine. It was a question for the jury to decide whether the defendant was or was not negligent in the running of its cars at the time of the injury as alleged in the petition; and it was also a question for them, under the evidence, whether the plaintiff's husband was guilty of such a want of ordinary care or contributory negligence as would bar a recovery. Lavie v. Central R., 71 Ga. 222 (3); Harrison v. Georgia Ry. & Co., 134 Ga. 718, 720, 68 S. E. 505; Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Ferguson, 113 Ga. 708, 713, 39 S. E. 306, 54 L. R. A. 802; *Williams v. 1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 823*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REASONABLE DOUBT—CURE OF ERRORS.

On the trial the evidence tended to show that the homicide was murder, without any mitigating circumstances, but the accused in his statement claimed that it was an accidental killing. The judge defined reasonable doubt, and otherwise fully charged the jury on that subject. Immediately following such charge, he also instructed the jury on the law of accidental killing, thus: "The law says no person shall be convicted of any crime or misdemeanor that is the result of an accident or misfortune; and in this case the court charges you that if you are satisfied from the evidence in this case that the person alleged to have been killed, if he was killed, and you are satisfied that it was an accidental killing, and that there was no evil desire or intention or criminal negligence you would not be authorized to find the defendant guilty." After giving the instruction just quoted, he proceeded to charge the law in regard to the prisoner's statement, after which he concluded with the charge: "If you are not satisfied to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt of the material allegations in the bill of indictment, or if you have any reasonable doubt in this case, it would be your duty to give the benefit of that doubt to the defendant and acquit him." Held, that the charge in regard to homicide by accident was not error, on the ground that it destroyed the effect of the charge on the law of reasonable doubt. ### 1. EJECTMENT (§ 9*)—TRIAL (§ 165*)—MOTION FOR NONSUIT—TITLE—EVIDENCE.

While the plaintiff in an action for land must recover on the strength of his own title, yet, in passing on a motion for nonsuit upon the conclusion of the evidence submitted in behalf of the plaintiff, such evidence should be construed most favorably to him, and if, so construed, a prima facie case for the plaintiff is made out, a nonsuit should be refused.

It follows that the court erred in granting a nonsuit.

DIVORCE (§ 289*)—CUSTODY OF CHILDREN—RES JUDICATA.

Where a motion, based on pending libel for divorce, is made to the judge under Civil Code 1910, § 2980, for temporary alimony and the custody of children of the marriage pending the litigation, the judge, in determining the custody of the children, is not bound by a previous judgment in habeas corpus between the same parties, but, after hearing all the facts and circumstances, should exercise a sound discretion in awarding the custody of the children. Civil Code 1910, §§ 2971 and 2980, being in pari materia, must be construed together.

C. E. Dunbar, of Augusta, for plaintiff in error. C. H. & R. S. Cohen, and Hamilton Phinizy, all of Augusta, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. Julian J. Zachry and Mary W. Zachry were married on November 12, 1909. During May, 1913, the husband instituted a habeas corpus proceeding against his wife, before the ordinary of Richmond county, to recover the custody of their two minor daughters, both under the age of three years, and on May 12, 1913, the custody of the children was awarded to the husband by the ordinary. Three or four days thereafter the wife filed in Columbia county a petition for divorce against her husband, who was a resident of that county; and she made an application for the support and custody of her children under Civil Code, § 2980, based upon her pending libel for divorce. On the hearing the court allowed attorney's fees and temporary alimony to the wife, but refused her the custody of her children, holding that the judgment in the habeas corpus proceeding conclusively adjudicated the right of the husband to their custody; there being no contention that there was any change in the status of the parties other than the filing of the petition for divorce. The wife excepts to this judgment.

The case is governed by Civil Code, §§ 2971, 2980. The last named of these sections provides for an interlocutory hearing before the judge, on a motion made pending a divorce proceeding, to determine who shall be entitled to the care and custody of the children pending the litigation, as if the same were before him on a writ of habeas corpus. If nothing more appeared in the statute, we would be constrained to follow the analogy of a proceeding of this kind to that of a habeas corpus, and to apply the rule that a judgment on habeas corpus in a contest between parents over the custody of minor children is conclusive in a subsequent application, unless some new fact has occurred which has altered the state of the case or the relative claims of the parents in some material respect. Kirkland v. Canty, 122 Ga. 261, 50 S. E. 90. But the cognate section (2971) is to be construed in connection with it. That section declares: "In all cases of divorce granted, the party not in default shall be entitled to the custody of the minor children of the marriage. The court, however, in the exercise of a sound discretion, may look into all the circumstances, and, after hearing both parties, make a different disposition of the children, withdrawing them from the custody of either or both parties, and placing them, if necessary, in possession of guardians appointed by the ordinary. The court may exercise a similar discretion pending the libel for divorce." In cases of final divorce the custody of the children will be awarded to the party not in default (if approved by the presiding judge), notwithstanding their custody may have been given to the other party in a former habeas corpus proceeding. The statutory design seems to be that on the final verdict for divorce the court shall not be hampered by any former decree or judgment in a habeas corpus case, but that the court will be at full liberty in providing for the welfare of the children. And there is much reason that the court should not be fettered by any former judgment rendered on habeas corpus, because the issues are not altogether the same.

In a contest by habeas corpus between parents for the possession of children, the contending parties are pressing their private claims, and the welfare of the children is made a subsidiary matter by the striving parents; whereas, in the case of divorce granted, the marital bonds are dissolved, and henceforth the parents are no longer in domestic relation. In such a case the welfare of the children appeals most strongly to the humanity and conscience of the judge, and it is wise that he be left untrammelled by any former judgment on habeas corpus in making provision for the children's future. The statute confers on the judge a supervisory control, with respect to the custody of the children, over the whole divorce proceeding, and in the exercise of a wise discretion he may award their custody to the parent in fault, or even to strangers, in case of divorce granted. The statute further declares that "the court may exercise a similar discretion pending the libel for divorce." What meaning are we to give to these words? If we confine their meaning to an exercise of discretion with respect to matters transpiring subsequently to a judgment rendered in a habeas corpus proceeding, we not only write such restriction into the statute, but we do violence to the legislative fiat that the court shall have and exercise a discretion similar to that given him in cases of divorce granted, which is unfettered by any previous adjudication on habeas corpus. We think the legislative purpose was to take a proceeding under section 2980, to determine the custody of children pending divorce litigation, from without the operation of any former judgment on habeas corpus, and to confer upon the judge plenary power for the exercise of a sound discretion in awarding the custody of the children of the parties to the divorce libel. We reverse the judgment, that the court may hear all the facts and exercise a sound discretion in awarding the custody of the children.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

EVANS v. OALLAWAY, Deputy Sheriff, et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 14, 1913.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 519*)—COLLATERAL ATTACK—ACTION ON FORTHCOMING BOND.

Certain justice court executions in favor of the Arnold Grocery Company against J. R. Evans were levied on described goods as the property of the defendant in fi. fa. Affidavits of illegality were interposed, and in order to get possession of the property the defendant executed and delivered to the levying officer bonds conditioned to deliver the property "at the time and place for sale," in the event that the illegalities "should be dismissed by the court or withdrawn." The property was then delivered to the defendant, who afterwards sold or otherwise disposed of it, so that he could not produce it in terms of the bonds. In the superior court the levying officer, for the use of the plaintiff in fi. fa., instituted suit on the bonds for the amount due on the fi. fa., which was less than the value of the property levied on. The defendant (the principal in the bonds) interposed a plea which, as amended, admitted what has just been stated, and set up, in substance, the following: The ground of illegality was that the defendant had not been served in the suits in the justice court. While the illegality cases were pending on appeal in the superior court, and before the term convened, the defendant and the attorney of plaintiff agreed upon a settlement of the cases. Under the agreement the defendant "was to pay cash $100," and the attorney "was to stop all further costs, and was to accept rent notes for the balance, and upon this was to mark the said case settled." The defendant paid the $100, and the attorney "agreed to carry out the other terms of the contract," and, relying on such promise, defendant did not attend court; but, "instead of carrying out this contract, said plaintiff by its attorney dismissed" the affidavits of illegality, and "refused to accept rent notes or abide said contract." The defendant alleges that it "is inequitable not to enforce said agreement," and it is prayed that the "agreement be enforced, and said cases be reinstated in the court," and the issue tried, and that in the meantime that the suit on the bonds be enjoined. Held, construed in its entirety and in the light of the prayers, the object of this portion of the plea was to set aside the judgment of the superior court dismissing the illegality cases, and to reinstate them for trial, and to enjoin the suit on the forthcoming bonds.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 519*)—ACTION ON FORTHCOMING BOND—CONSTRUCTION OF PLEA—COLLATERAL ATTACK ON JUDGMENT.

The attack made upon the judgment dismissing the illegality cases, in the plea of the defendant in the suit by the levying officer on the forthcoming bond, was merely a collateral attack, and would not suffice as a basis for setting aside the judgments or the grant of the injunction. *Porter v. On the trial of a suit brought by the receiver of a corporation to recover the price of stock alleged to have been subscribed by a stockholder, whose defense was that he subscribed for a certain number of shares, for which he had paid according to contract, but that the number of shares set opposite his name on the subscription list was raised to a larger number by some one not authorized by him, the price of which excess number of shares the suit was brought to recover, it was not error requiring a new trial, under the facts of this case, for the court to decline to allow in evidence, when offered by the plaintiff, the stockbook of the corporation, containing a blank stock certificate, signed by the defendant as president of the corporation, and the stub attached thereto, which read "Certificate No. 54 for 25 shares issued to" the defendant, the number of shares named being in excess of the number the defendant had conceded to have subscribed, where he, as a witness in his own behalf, gave evidence showing the existence and contents of the stub and certificate as contended by the plaintiff.

Action by W. P. Hardee, receiver, against J. F. Tietjen. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

HILL, J. W. P. Hardee, as receiver of the Savannah Sand Lime Brick Company, brought his action for an alleged unpaid subscription to the capital stock of that company against John F. Tietjen. The petition alleged that the defendant subscribed for 50 shares of the capital stock of the company, of the par value of $100 per share, to wit, the sum of $5,000, and had paid only $2,000, leaving $3,000 still due by him to the company. A demurrer to the petition as amended was overruled. The defendant filed an answer, denying that he subscribed for 50 shares of stock, but averring that he subscribed for 20 shares, to be paid for in 200 acres of land, and that he had paid for his stock in the manner provided for in the contract of subscription, and had obtained a certificate covering these 20 shares. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and the plaintiff excepted.

There was abundant evidence to sustain the verdict. Numerous grounds of error were assigned on the admission of evidence, refusal to admit evidence, excerpts from the charge of the court, and a failure to charge as requested. We have examined each ground of the motion carefully, and have come to the conclusion that none of these assignments possess sufficient merit to require the grant of a new trial.

[1] 1. One ground of error assigned is that the court declined to allow in evidence, when offered by the plaintiff, the stockbook of the Savannah Sand Lime Brick Company, containing certificate No. 54, which consisted of a stub and certificate. The stub read (omitting the immaterial parts): "Certificate No. 54 for 25 shares issued to J. F. Tietjen." Stock certificate No. 54 itself, attached to the stub, was in blank, signed: "John F. Tietjen, President." The stub and certificate were offered as tending to show that there were 25 shares of stock issued to J. F. Tietjen. The stock certificate was in blank form, signed by Mr. Tietjen, which signature was proved. Exception is taken to the refusal of the court to allow the stub and certificate in evidence, for the reason that, as the certificate was signed by Mr. Tietjen, and his signature was not denied, but was proved, the weight of the offered evidence was for the jury, and not the court. Even if the stub and certificate were admissible in evidence, it was not harmful error under the facts of this case, requiring a new trial, to exclude them, as the defendant Tietjen, as a witness, gave evidence tending to show that, while he signed the certificate in blank, both the stub and certificate were filled out by some one other than himself, without his knowledge or consent. His testimony tended to show the existence of the stub and certificate as contended; but it also explained that he did not insert or authorize to be inserted the words "25 shares of stock" in the stub. There was no conflict in the evidence, which tended to show that the defendant signed the stock certificate in blank, that he did not have possession of the stockbook containing the certificate and stub attached thereto after the certificate was signed by him in blank, that the stub was filled out by another without the defendant's knowledge or consent, and that it was in the possession of another official of the corporation, and the defendant did not know of the contents of the stub and certificate while they were in the possession of the other officer.

[2] 2. Error was assigned because the court allowed the defendant to put in evidence, over the objection of the plaintiff, a certain receipt, as follows: "Office of G. B. Whatley, Attorney and Counselor at Law, Room 18, Provident Building. Telephone 1177. Savannah, Ga., Jan. 26, 1905. This is to certify that John F. Tietjen has signed his name to the Sand Lime Brick Company for $2,000, to be paid for in 200 acres of land containing the sand from which the bricks are to be made, situated at Eden, Georgia. [Signed] W. G. Paschall. [Signed] G. B. Whatley." The objection urged to the introduction of the receipt as evidence was "that the company never authorized or accepted the contract; also, that the original subscription of Mr. Tietjen, being the subscription sued on, was before the court, and that the plea filed was not a plea of non est factum, and the contract did not appear to be complete in reference to the subscription to which Mr. Tietjen had signed his name, and that the name of the company was the Sand Lime Brick Company, and not the Savannah Sand Lime Brick Company. The evidence of G. B. Whatley, whose name appears signed to the receipt (the other signer being dead), tended to show that he wrote out and signed it, and at the time was representing the promoters of the company, and that Mr. Tietjen subscribed and paid for only 20 shares of stock. The minutes of the company, which were put in evidence, showed that it was sometimes called Sand Lime Brick Company, and sometimes Savannah Sand Lime Brick Company. We think the evidence was admissible, and that the court did not err in so ruling. See Howard v. Glenn, 85 Ga. 239 (9), 11 S. E. 610, 21 Am. St. Rep. 156.

[3] 3. The refusal to give the following instruction to the jury is assigned as error: "If you find from the evidence that the treasurer of the Savannah Sand Lime Brick Company had its subscription list, and that subscription list had on it the signature of John F. Tietjen, with 50 shares written thereafter, and the treasurer was charged by the corporation with the duty of collecting such subscription, then, at the time the treasurer of the corporation ascertained that such subscription was 50 shares, the treasurer knew it, and John F. Tietjen, when he became president of the corporation, would be chargeable with such knowledge." It is insisted that the defendant knew his subscription was for 50 shares of stock; that even if the subscription was originally for 20 shares, and had been raised to 50 shares, as he contended, the treasurer of the corporation knew the list showed it was for 50 shares, and this was also notice to the defendant, who was president of the corporation; and that if he took no steps to repudiate it, he will be considered in laches, and as being estopped from setting up any defense to the suit filed thereon. As to the first proposition, it is a question of fact as to whether the defendant knew the subscription list was for 50 shares as being subscribed by him. On this question the evidence was conflicting, and the jury found with the defendant, and under the evidence was authorized so to do.

We next consider the contention that the list showed that the defendant's name was on the list for 50 shares, and the treasurer of the corporation had the list and knew this, and that notice of that fact to the treasurer was notice to the president, who was

John F. Tietjen, the defendant. There was evidence tending to show that the treasurer of the corporation had in his possession the list of subscribers to the capital stock, and that this list showed that opposite the name of J. F. Tietjen, were the words "50 shares." The evidence for the defendant tended to show that he subscribed for only 20 shares of the stock, which were to be paid for with 200 acres of land, and this was done. It also tended to show that the defendant did not see the list, with the words "50 shares" opposite his name, or knew of it, and had no knowledge of his subscription having been raised from 20 to 50 shares. In view of the evidence in the case, and the general charge of the court, we think the court did not err in declining to give the requested instruction to the jury. While, as a general rule, notice to an agent of a corporation, acting for it in connection with its business and within the scope of his agency, is notice to his principal (Wade on Notice [2d Ed.] § 672), we do not think that notice to one agent of a corporation that the stock subscription of another agent has been raised is notice to the other agent of the same corporation as a private stockholder, so as to charge him with notice that his stock subscription has been raised from the amount which he subscribed to a higher amount. See Georgia Milk Producers' Ass'n v. Crane, 137 Ga. 50, 72 S. E. 414; 31 Cyc. 1587 (4).

The principle here ruled applies to the other assignments of error, which raise substantially the same question in varying forms as the question here decided. The charge of the court as a whole covered the issues in the case, and was as favorable to the plaintiff as he was entitled to. The other assignments of error are without merit.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 13, 1913.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 103*)—
TAX ELECTION—LEVY.

Civil Code 1910, § 1535, provides for the holding of elections in school districts to determine whether a local tax shall be levied for the purpose of supplementing the funds received from the state for public schools in the district, and it is declared that "two-thirds of those voting shall be necessary to carry the election for local taxation for public schools." Where such an election has been held, and the requisite majority is obtained, it is the duty of the ordinary to declare the result, and thereafter a tax will be levied as provided for in Civil Code 1910, § 1537.

2. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 103*)—
TAX ELECTION—LEVY.

Where the law for levying a local tax for supplementing the funds in a school district has been put into effect by an election in a district as mentioned in the preceding note, it will continue until changed by law.

3. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 103*)—
LEVY OF TAXES—EFFECT OF ELECTION.

Civ. Code 1910, § 1536, deals with the matter of repeal of the local tax law in a given school district in so far as it is applicable to such district. Properly construed, the statute reflects the legislative design that local application of the law could be repealed in the district, if, at an election called after the law had been in effect in such district three years, two-thirds of those voting at the election should favor the repeal. It does not contemplate a repeal by the result of an election called "to pass upon the question of local taxation for schools" in the district, at which 60 votes were cast "for local taxation for schools" in the district, and 34 votes were cast against it.

4. SCHOOL TAX—INJUNCTION.

The application to enjoin the levy of the tax was properly refused.

Error from Superior Court, Dade County;
A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by Leon Connally and others against W. G. Morrison and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Leon Connally and several other persons, as citizens and taxpayers of the 960th district of Dade county, instituted an action against W. G. Morrison, John L. Case, and S. J. Hale, as district trustees, and others, alleging that more than three years before the institution of the suit an election was held in the district, as provided by law, for the purpose of assessing a local school tax upon the taxpayers of the district, and that the election resulted in favor of local taxation, and the law authorizing such taxation remained in force "until the three years limited by law had expired." After "the limit had expired, a sufficient number of taxpayers petitioned the ordinary to call an election to pass on the question of local taxation for schools in the district." The call for the election was advertised, as provided by law, and the election was held, "which resulted in 60 votes for local taxation for schools in said district and 34 votes against local taxation." It was further alleged that "local taxation did not carry," for the reason that "there was not the requisite two-thirds majority voting for such taxation"; it being urged that under the Constitution (Civil Code, § 6579), and the laws in pursuance thereof (Civil Code, §§ 1534, 1535, 1536), "a two-thirds majority vote was requisite" to place the burden of taxation for such purpose upon the inhabitants of the school district. There were allegations suggestive of improper conduct upon the part of the managers of the election, which need not be stated. The ordinary has publicly declared that at the election local taxation for school purposes was carried, and in view of such announcement the school commissioners will assess and levy a school tax, which action, it is contended, would be contrary to law. The prayers were that the defendants be enjoined from assessing and levying any tax whatever for school purposes in the district; that no accounting or reckoning be taken of it until ordered by the court under a decree framed in conformity with the law; that the tax collector be enjoined from collecting any tax for school purposes; that such other and further relief be granted "as may be just, equitable, and lawful"; and that process issue, etc. The petition was sworn to by one of the plaintiffs, who made an affidavit that the facts, when stated of deponent's own knowledge, were true, and, when stated upon information, he believed them to be true. When the petition was presented to the judge at chambers, he did not issue a rule nisi, but passed an order denying the injunction, on the ground that the provisions of Civil Code, § 1536, if constitutional, were not intended to authorize a small minority to repeal the local tax law after it has been lawfully put into effect in a school district. The plaintiffs excepted to this order, and the case came to the Supreme Court on a fast bill of exceptions under the provisions of Civil Code, § 6153.

W. U. Jacoway, of Trenton, and H. P. Lumpkin, of La Fayette, for plaintiffs in error. W. H. Payne, of Chattanooga, Tenn., for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. The record discloses that upon mere inspection of the petition the judge refused the injunction, on the ground that he considered that the petition was clearly without equity. That he could do so has been decided. Remahart v. Savannah &c. R. Co., 54 Ga. 579; Brown v. Wilson, 56 Ga. 534. Whether there was any equity in the petition would depend on the right of the officers to levy the tax, which, under the allegations of the petition, was merely a question of law. It was conceded that the law authorizing the school tax in the district had been effective by virtue of an election previously held for that purpose, and the only ground upon which it was contended that there was no authority at the time suit was filed for the levy of such a tax was that the law authorizing the levy of the tax was no longer effective in the district.

[1] By article 8, § 4, of the Constitution of this state (Civil Code, § 8579), it is declared: "Authority may be granted to counties, militia districts, school districts, and to municipal corporations, upon the recommendation of the corporate authority, to establish and maintain public schools in their respective limits by local taxation; but no such laws shall take effect until the same shall have been submitted to a vote of the qualified voters in each county, militia district, school district, or municipal corporation and approved by two-thirds majority of persons voting at such election, and the General Assembly may prescribe who shall vote on such questions."

In pursuance of this provision of the Constitution there are statutory provisions of law now embodied in the Civil Code, as follows:

"Sec. 1535. Whenever the citizens of any school district wish to supplement the funds received from the state public school fund by levying a tax for educational purposes, they shall present a petition from one fourth of the qualified voters of the district to the ordinary, who shall order the election not earlier than twenty days, nor later than sixty days, after the petition is received: Provided, that notice of the same shall be posted in at least three conspicuous places in the district ten days prior to the election. The election shall be held at a time and place prescribed by the proper authorities, and under rules governing ordinary elections. Those favoring local taxation for public schools shall vote 'For local taxation for public schools.' Those opposed shall vote 'Against local taxation for public schools.' The returns of said election shall be made to the ordinary of the county, who shall declare the result, and two-thirds of those voting shall be necessary to carry the election for local taxation for public schools. No person shall vote in said election except the regularly qualified voters residing in the district six months prior to the election. An election for the same purpose shall not be held oftener than every twelve months."

"Sec. 1536. An election for repealing the local tax law provided for in this article, when the same has been established for over three years, shall be called as in first instance. And if abolished by vote under similar regulations as in first instance, no new election for re-creating the same shall be called within one year. If not abolished by vote, no election for the same purpose shall be called within one year."

"Sec. 1544. All elections held under the provisions of this article shall be governed as to registration and qualification of voters as the general law governing special elections provides."

"Sec. 1537. In those districts which levy a local tax for educational purposes, the board of trustees shall make all rules and regulations to govern the schools of the districts, and build and equip school houses under the approval of the county board of education. They shall have the right to fix the rate of tuition for nonresident pupils, and to fix the salaries of the teachers. They shall receive from the county board of education the share of public school funds apportioned to the district by the county board of education. They shall determine the amount necessary to be raised by local tax on all the property of the district. The secretary of the board of trustees of said district, with the aid of the county school commissioners of said county, shall ascertain from the tax returns made to the tax receiver, and from the returns made to the comptroller general, the total value of all the property in said district subject to taxation for county purposes, and a regular digest of all such property in said school district shall be made by said secretary in a book furnished by the board of trustees and kept for that purpose. At or before the time of fixing the rate of taxation for said county, the secretary of each local board of trustees, with the aid of the county school commissioner, shall levy such rate on the property thus found as will raise the total amount to be collected: Provided, that such rate shall not exceed one half of one per cent. The county school commissioner of each county, at or before the time for fixing the rate of said county by the ordinary thereof, or the county board of commissioners, as the case may be, shall certify to the said ordinary, or said board of commissioners, as the case may be, and to the comptroller general of the state the rate of taxation fixed for each school district in the county, and said taxing authority of said county shall levy such special tax at the same time and in the same manner as is now prescribed for levying taxes for county purposes. A copy of the special tax digest of said local tax district shall be furnished by the secretary of the local board of trustees to the tax collector of the county."

[2] The foregoing provision of the Constitution and the statutory provisions of law authorize taxation in school districts for the purpose of supplementing the school funds received from the state in such districts, whenever, at an election held for such purpose in the school district, a two-thirds majority of persons voting at such election vote in favor of local taxation, and the result of the election is declared. The law is not of its own force applicable in all school districts of a county, but it is a general law and becomes applicable in any given district when it is declared so as the result of an election held in accordance with the statute. There is no suggestion anywhere that after the law, by virtue of an election, becomes effective in a given district, it would cease to be so by mere lapse of time. It does not, as alleged in the petition, "expire" after it has been in effect three years. The words at the conclusion of section 1535, "an election for the same purpose shall not be held oftener than every twelve months," manifestly refer to the holding of elections to determine whether the law shall become effective in the district, and have no reference to rendering the law ineffectual after it has once been declared applicable in the district. The provision was intended to restrict the frequency of such elections which would likely occur if the result were not in favor of local taxation in the first instance. If the law did not expire by mere lapse of time, then by what means did it become inoperative in the district?

[3] It is urged that it did so by virtue of the election held after the law had been in effect three years. In support of this it is insisted that the election was held under Civil Code, § 1536, at which 60 votes favored taxation and 34 opposed it; and that this caused the repeal of the law in so far as it related to that district. The judge doubted the constitutionality of Civil Code, § 1536; but no constitutional question was raised, and none is now for consideration. The judge differed with counsel for plaintiffs in the construction of the statute, and held that the election did not repeal the local application of the law. In this we agree with the judge. The error into which counsel for plaintiffs have fallen commences by assuming that the election under section 1536 was for the same purpose as that provided for in 1535, whereas it was not; the purpose of the election under 1536 being to determine whether the general law for levying a tax in school districts should become applicable in that district while the purpose of the election under 1536 was to determine, after the law had been made applicable, whether its application to the district should be repealed. In the one instance the proposition is to apply the law, and in the other to repeal. In each instance it requires affirmative action to bring about the change of condition for which the election is called to accomplish. In section 1535 provision is made for holding the election; and it is declared, in effect, that, in order to carry the election or bring about the change of condition, it is essential that a two-thirds majority of those voting should favor the change. On this subject section 1536 uses different language, but manifestly it was intended to mean the same thing. Instead of setting out at length provisions for calling the election, it merely recites that it shall be called "as in the first instance," intending thereby that the election shall be called with the same formalities as set forth more particularly in the preceding section; and instead of setting out at length provisions for holding the election, and qualifications of voters and for returns of the managers and declaring the vote necessary to carry the election, or to bring about the change in the law which was sought to be produced, it merely recites that if the law be "abolished by vote under similar regulations as in first instance, no new election for re-creating the same shall be called within one year," thereby intending that the election would carry, or that the change of condition should result, if the election were held and returns made according to the formalities more fully set out in the preceding section, and the proposition to make the change should receive the majority necessary to carry the election, as is more fully set out in the preceding section. In effect, relative to these matters, it adopts a part of the provisions of the preceding section. If any other interpretation be placed on this part of section 1536, it would be necessary to say either that the Legislature, while providing the machinery for this election and giving it effect, omitted altogether to say what vote should be necessary to carry the election, or that it was intended that it might be carried, and the existing law repealed, by any minority vote equal to or exceeding one-third of the votes cast. This result would be both unusual and inconsistent with the language actually employed, and manifestly not in accord with the legislative intent.

[4] Under this construction of Civil Code, § 1536, the election described in the petition "to pass on the question of local taxation for schools in the district," at which 60 persons voted for local taxation and 34 persons voted against it, did not affect the existing local application of the law. It was the duty of the officers to levy and collect the tax, and there was no equity in the petition to become the basis of the relief sought.

Error from Superior Court, Jackson County; B. F. Walker, Judge.

Action by E. B. Stone against the King-Hodgson Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

In December, 1911, Mrs. Eva B. Stone brought an action in the superior court of Jackson county against King-Hodgson Company, a partnership, all the members of which resided in Clarke county, and J. O. Stapler, C. E. Fleeman, J. P. Johnson, and J. J. Pace, residents of Jackson county; the substance of the petition being as follows: Petitioner is the owner of a described parcel of land, upon which she resides and has resided for more than 15 years. About four years ago she was indebted to King-Hodgson Company in amounts aggregating less than $1,000, some of the amounts really representing indebtedness of her husband, E. A. Stone. One of the firm of King-Hodgson Company, together with their lawyer, came to her home to get her to sign what they told her was a mortgage deed to her land to secure said debt. The same was not read over to her, but as soon as her signature was obtained they immediately went away. They had been getting her to sign some mortgages the same year, or the year before, on her crops to pay her debts and those of her husband, and she was informed and thought this one was just like she had been signing. Her land at that time was worth more than $3,000. Her husband had been cultivating it for her, and her crops were all gathered and brought to her home, except such as were sold. During the year 1911 she heard that King-Hodgson Company claimed to hold a deed to her land. King-Hodgson Company, alleging themselves to be the landlord of her husband, have sued out a possessory warrant against him, issued by J. O. Stapler, notary public and ex officio justice of the peace, by virtue of which the crops of petitioner have been seized by C. E. Fleeman, constable. Immediately after such seizure she went before Stapler and offered to file her claim to the crops, with bond in double their value, which she was willing and ready to give; but Stapler, acting under the instructions of counsel for King-Hodgson Company, refused to permit her to do this, whereupon she "then went before the justice in her own district, to wit, 1704th Dist. G M., said county, and took out a distress warrant, and has had this distress warrant levied upon the same property in the field and ungathered, as well as some of the crops gathered, that was levied upon and seized by said C. E. Fleeman, L. C., as aforesaid, from said 253d Dist. G. M., said county, under said possessory warrant proceeding issued by said King-Hodgson Company against said E. A. Stone [her husband], and the constable of the 1704th Dist. G. M., said county, under said distress warrant has the same property levied upon, and both claim they are entitled to hold the same or take bond for same. The said constable from the 253d Dist. G. M., said county, is seeking to take the said property outside of said district, and while the constable of the 1704th will not turn it over except by giving a forthcoming bond for it, forthcoming at his court at the time and place of sale, and there is a conflict of authority between these two officers, that cannot be reconciled and adjusted outside of a court of equity, and there is and will be a multiplicity of suits growing out of said situation." "At the time said supposed mortgage was given by her to said King-Hodgson Company, [petitioner] is informed that they also included, all her stock, mules, and horses, and wagons, and farming implements, to the value of $500, in said instrument, and she is informed that said King-Hodgson Company claim they also have a title to said personal property; but the same is your petitioner's property, incumbered only with a lien upon the same for whatever she herself might have been indebted to said King-Hodgson Company, and that all her said property, both real and personal, [is] worth more than $3,500, she has never received either in payments of debts that she owed and money, more than $1,000, if that much on the same." She "is informed and believes, and so charges, that said King-Hodgson Company have put in and included in said mortgage deed that they obtained as aforesaid more than $1,000 worth of indebtedness that her said husband owed, but that she has only recently found this out; that she learned this some time during the summer of 1911; that said King-Hodgson Company, knowing that the land was hers, and all the said personal property was hers, deliberately planned to deceive your petitioner as to the amount she owed them, and to get her said property for her said husband's debts, and that, even if she was liable for her husband's debts, which she is not under the law, and which said King-Hodgson Company knew, the said property they claim to have a mortgage deed on is worth more than $1,000, more than all said debts." She "is informed, and so charges, that said King-Hodgson Company claim to have a straight deed from her to all said real and personal property, and they claim that is the basis upon which they are seeking to proceed with their said possessory warrant proceedings, when in truth they have no such deed; and if they have, petitioner was deceived by them in getting the same by misrepresentations, and by getting her to sign something that was represented to her as a mortgage, and conveying her property to pay her husband's debts, and in signing which she would not be absolutely deeding away her property, but simply for the purpose of securing what she might at the time have owed said King-Hodgson Company. She is further informed and charges that said King-Hodgson Company put in the paper she signed, which was not read to her, more than $1,000 of debts they held against her said husband, or debts that they bought up against him, and knowing at the time that your petitioner was not liable for said debts and that her property was not subject to said debts." She "further says that she has been informed, and so charges, that the said King-Hodgson Company have threatened to try to evict her from her said land, and claim that they will try to put her off said land after January 1, 1912, when they have no right to do so."

The prayers of the petition are that further proceeding of both the possessory warrant and the distress warrant be enjoined; that the justices of the peace who respectively issued them, and the constables who respectively seized and levied upon the crops, all be enjoined "from any further action on said cases"; "that said King-Hodgson Company, as well as petitioner, be enjoined from prosecuting their several said cases in said justices' courts heretofore referred to; that there be an accounting between said King-Hodgson Company and petitioner, and that any mortgage deed or other deed or conveyance they hold against petitioner, purporting to be signed by her to secure her indebtedness to them, be decreed by this court to be only a lien on said property to secure only what she was indebted to said King-Hodgson Company when the same was signed, and that for all other purposes it be canceled as null and void; that said King-Hodgson Company be enjoined and restrained from interfering with the crops raised on said premises for the year 1911, and from interfering with her possession of the same for 1912, as she stands ready and willing to give a reasonable bond for what would be reasonable rent of said premises for 1912." There were also prayers for a temporary restraining order, for process, and for second original for Clarke county, to be there served upon King-Hodgson Company. An amendment to the petition was allowed, alleging that the petitioner holds the land under a deed from her father, who was in possession of the land for 20 years before he conveyed it as a gift to her. King-Hodgson Company demurred to the petition generally and specially. One of the grounds of demurrer was that it appeared from the petition that the demurrants resided in Clarke county, that no substantial relief was prayed against any of the defendants in Jackson county, and that therefore the superior court of that county had no jurisdiction of the case. The demurrer as a whole was sustained, and the petitioner excepted.

W. W. Stark, of Commerce, for plaintiff in error. John B. Gamble, of Athens, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The Constitution of this state declares: "Equity cases shall be tried in the county where a defendant resides against whom substantial relief is prayed." Civil Code, § 6540. An exception is made by Civil Code, § 5527, as to "cases of injunctions to stay pending proceedings, when the petition may be filed in the county where the proceedings are pending: Provided, no relief is prayed as to matters not included in such litigation." This exception is upheld only on the theory of waiver; that is, that where a party institutes a proceeding in a court of a county other than that of his residence, against a person residing in such county, he submits himself, to the extent of such suit, to the equity jurisdiction of the county wherein the suit is brought. Crawley v. Barge, 182 Ga. 96, 68 S. E. 819. This waiver, however, extends only to matters included in the pending litigation against which injunction is sought; for, as was held in the case just cited, the defendant in the pending proceeding cannot go beyond the matters therein included and convert it into a general suit in equity against the original plaintiff. As the defendant cannot do this, certainly one not a party to the pending proceeding cannot.

[2] Indeed, the general rule is that an action will not be enjoined at the instance of one not a party thereto, particularly where the judgment in the action will not conclude the rights of such person. 22 Cyc. 787. In the case at bar, the possessory warrant sued out by King-Hodgson Company was a pending proceeding (Ellis v. Stewart, 123 Ga. 242, 51 S. E. 321); but Mrs. Stone was not a party to it, and of course would not be bound by any judgment therein rendered. Granting, however, that she had rights as to the crops—the subject-matter of the possessory warrant—which might in some way be adversely affected, should the possession of the crops by the judgment of the court be given to King-Hodgson Company, the scope of her petition and the prayers thereof, as will readily be seen by reference to the statement of facts preceding this opinion, go far beyond the matters which could be included in any issues which could be properly made in the possessory warrant proceedings. It necessarily follows, therefore, that the petition for injunction did not come within the exception provided by Civil Code, § 5527, and that the superior court of Jackson county had no jurisdiction as to King-Hodgson Company, as all the members of that firm resided in the county of Clarke.

[3] Injunction to stay proceedings in courts of law is not directed against the court itself, but against the parties to the proceeding. Hood v. Hood, 182 Ga. 778 (2), 64 S. E. 1074.

Therefore injunction did not lie against the two justices of the peace who resided in Jackson county. Nor was any substantial relief prayed against the constables who resided in Jackson county, there being no allegations of misconduct against them.

[4, 5] It follows from what has been said that the court properly sustained the demurrer on the ground that it appeared from the petition that the superior court of Jackson county had no jurisdiction of the defendant King-Hodgson Company, and no substantial relief was prayed against the other defendants.

1. POWERS (§ 33*)—EXECUTION OF POWER—INTENT.

Where a donee of a power to apportion property and appoint from a class certain persons, who are to hold the apportionment made by the donee, under the terms, conditions, and limitations imposed by the donor in his will creating the power, executes a will devising the specific property in parcels to appointees selected from the proper class, such will is to be regarded as an act indicative of the donee's intention to execute the power.

2. POWERS (§§ 34, 38*)—WILLS (§ 693*)—CONSTRUCTION—EXECUTION.

A testator made specific devises of property to his children and issue of deceased children, with certain conditions and limitations. He devised certain property to his wife for life, with power in the wife by will to dispose of the property devised to her, the same to be devised by her to such of the testator's children or issue of deceased children as the wife may desire, and such devise to be upon the same terms, conditions, and limitations as the devises which were made to them under the will. The wife made a will, which contained no reference to the power, but in which she devised the property, without limitation or condition, to two children and two grandchildren of the testator.

Held:

(a) That the power to the wife extended only to the nomination of certain persons from a class, and the apportionment of property among her appointees, who would take under the donor's will, subject to the terms, conditions, and limitations therein imposed upon each appointee.

(b) Where the quantity of interest to be taken by an appointee is expressly limited by the instrument creating the power, and the donee is only authorized to appoint the property over which the estate is to ride, an appointment by the donee of an interest exceeding that intended to be given to the appointee is tantamount to an exercise of the power of appointment to the extent of the power.

(c) The donee's will was a good execution of the power.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

Action by Germania Bank and others against William L. Grayson and others. From the judgment, certain defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Alfred M. Martin died on the 18th of May, 1910, leaving a will. The first item was as follows:

"I give and devise to my beloved wife, Elizabeth M. Martin, the homestead plantation, being the place on which I now reside, with my summer place included, together with all the lands connected with the same; also all the horses, mules, cattle, household furniture, and everything else upon or connected with said plantation; also the sum of seventy-five thousand dollars to consist of such bonds and stocks as she may elect to take out of the assets of my estate. To have and to hold the above-mentioned real estate and personal property for and during the period of her natural life, with full control over and enjoyment of the rents, issues, profits, dividends and interest thereof, to be used and disposed of by her as she may deem proper; and I do hereby authorize and empower my said wife to dispose of the property hereby bequeathed to her, by her 'will,' the same to be devised by her to such of my children or the issue of any of my children as she may desire, the children of my deceased daughter, Alice Tyler Marshall, as well as others; but the bequests so made by my said wife must be upon the same terms, conditions, and limitations, as the bequests hereinafter made by me to my children and my grandchildren. But in case my said wife shall die, leaving no will, then and in that case the property hereby devised to her shall be equally divided among my children and the issue of any deceased child or children per stirpes, the issue of my deceased child taking the share that his, her, or their parent would have been entitled to if living; the title to such share to vest in the trustees or guardians hereinafter provided for, or their successors appointed according to the terms of this will, and subject to the same terms, conditions and limitations as hereinafter provided, as to bequests hereby made. I do further direct that in the event that my said wife should elect to take any other property belonging to my estate in lieu of the real estate hereby devised to her, she may make such election to the value of sixteen thousand dollars, the valuation placed on said above-described real estate, and shall hold such property elected by her to be taken, upon the same terms, conditions, and limitations as hereinbefore provided."

In item 3 he declared that it was his desire to make his children as nearly equal in the division of his estate as practicable. He thereupon devised specific property to each of his five living children and to two grandchildren, sons of a deceased child. The devise to each of his children and two grandchildren was upon certain trusts, terms, and limitations. His wife elected to take 694 shares of the capital stock of the Southwestern Railroad Company, of the value of $75,000, and the certificate for the 694 shares of this stock was issued to her as a life tenant under her husband's will; and she elected to keep the real estate and tract of land consisting of 1,300 acres in Hampton county, S. C. She exercised her right of election prior to the execution by her of her last will. She owned no stock in the Southwestern Railroad Company, and had no interest in any stock of this corporation, except the right or power of appointment over the 694 shares obtained under her husband's will. The real estate that she elected to take is the same real estate which she disposed of under her will, and she exercised the right of life tenant over this property up to the time of her death.

On January 17, 1911, Mrs. Elizabeth M. Martin made her last will and testament. Items 1 and 2 related to the manner of her burial, and the direction to her executors as to the payment of her just debts, should there be any. The remainder of her will was as follows:

"Item 3. I give, bequeath, and devise unto my daughter, Bessie E. Cozart, three hundred (300) shares of the capital stock of the Southwestern Railroad Company.

"Item 4. I give, bequeath, and devise unto my grandson, Alfred M. Marshall, ninety-seven (97) shares of the capital stock of the Southwestern Railroad Company; and I give, bequeath, and devise unto my grandson, Samuel F. Marshall, ninety-seven (97) shares of the capital stock of the Southwestern Railroad Company. I give, bequeath, and devise unto the said Alfred M. and Samuel F. Marshall and Elise M. Jones, to share and share alike, all of that tract of land situate, lying and being in the state of South Carolina, in the county of Hampton, adjoining 'Woodstock,' and more particularly described as all that tract of land bounded north by Woodstock, east by Woodside, south by the lands of Elliott and Solomons, and on the west by the Savannah river.

"Item 5. I give, bequeath, and devise unto my daughter, Elise M. Jones, two hundred (200) shares of the capital stock of the Southwestern Railroad Company; and I also give, bequeath, and devise unto my said daughter, Elise M. Jones, all of that tract of land situate, lying and being in the state of South Carolina in the county of Hampton, formerly known as the 'Homestead,' and now known as 'Woodstock'; said tract of land containing thirty-five hundred (3,500) acres more or less, and being bounded on the southwest by the Savannah river, northwest by the lands now or formerly belonging to Joseph M. Bostick, northeast by the lands now or formerly belonging to John Lawton and M. G. Solomons, east by the lands now or formerly belonging to D. Ramsey and A. M. Martin. I also give, bequeath, and devise unto my said daughter, Elise M. Jones, the dwelling house situate on the above described plantation, together with all the outhouses, farming implements, growing crops, and all and singular the rights, members, hereditaments, and appurtenances to the said tract of land being, belonging, or in any wise incident or appertaining. The said tract of land, herein intended to be devised and bequeathed, is the same property formerly belonging to Edmund Martin, and is the property conveyed to Elizabeth M. Martin by Abram M. Martin and John Marshall, executors of the last will and testament of Edmund Martin, as will more fully appear from the description of said tract of land in Book of Mesne Conveyances, 7 D's, page 305, on the records of Beaufort county, South Carolina. All of the bequests in the foregoing items are made after mature deliberation, and with full appreciation of my duty toward my other children and heirs at law, and with undiminished love and affection for each of my children and all of my beloved grandchildren. The difference made between Bessie E. Cozart and Elise M. Jones is made in recognition of the many sacrifices made by the said Elise M. Jones for me, she having unselfishly devoted the best years of her life ministering to my comfort and happiness; and it is therefore my earnest desire that she possess and enjoy Woodstock plantation, with all of its appurtenances, as fully and completely as I have in my lifetime.

"Item 6. I hereby nominate, constitute, and appoint the said Elise M. Jones the sole executrix of this my last will and testament; and I hereby expressly confer upon her full and complete power, as such, to administer my estate, expressly relieving her from giving bond or making any inventory, or having any appraisalment of my estate, and also from making any returns to the probate court of Hampton county, South Carolina, or any other court of said state. And I do hereby expressly authorize and empower her, as my executrix, without the order or permission of any court, and without any notice or advertisement of any kind, to sell at public or private sale any part of my estate, and execute all conveyances, transfers, and assignments she may deem necessary to carry out the provisions of this my last will and testament."

The railroad stock of the Southwestern Railroad Company and the land referred to in item 4 was the property devised to her by her husband for life, and the subject-matter upon which the power of appointment was to operate under the first item of her husband's will. The plantation called "Woodstock" and referred to in item 5 was her individual property. Shortly after the making of the will Mrs. Martin died, and her will was duly admitted to probate. The executors of Alfred M. Martin, who were also trustees and testamentary guardians under his last will and codicil, brought their petition to the superior court of Chatham county against the legatees of Alfred M. Martin, the executrix of Elizabeth M. Martin, and others, alleging the foregoing facts, and stating that they were advised by counsel that two possible constructions could be placed upon the will of Elizabeth M. Martin, in so far as the same relates to the railroad stock and the land which was devised to her by her husband's will with power of appointment; one construction being that the bequests, being to the respective parties in their own right and not under the terms of the will of Alfred M. Martin, are void, which would result in the property held by the life tenant passing, under the first item of the will of Alfred M. Martin, to all the different shares; the other construction being that Elizabeth M. Martin having devised property which had been devised to her in her husband's will for life, and selecting as devisees the children and grandchildren of Alfred M. Martin, her will should be so upheld and construed as to carry out the intention of both wills, so that the devisees under the will of Elizabeth M. Martin should be added to the respective shares under the will of Alfred M. Martin, and that the executors of the will of Alfred M. Martin, who were also named as trustees therein, could not safely administer their trusts without a determination of the question whether the will of Elizabeth M. Martin was an execution of the power of appointment conferred upon her by item 1 of the will of Alfred M. Martin.

The facts being admitted, the case was referred to the judge without a jury. He held that the will of Elizabeth M. Martin was a due execution of the power of appointment under item 1 of the will of Alfred M. Martin, and decreed agreeably to this holding. The minor children of William E. Martin, a deceased son of Alfred M. Martin, and their guardian ad litem, excepted to the decree.

EVANS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). Perhaps upon no subject of the law have there been employed so many legal refinements, or such technical disquisition, as in the construction of powers and their mode of execution. In the greatest number of instances which have come under our observation the courts have been concerned with the determination of the validity and execution of powers which have been created in wills. The cardinal principle of interpretation of wills is to give effect to the testator's intention, where it can be ascertained from the will, and where such intention is not incompatible with established rules of law and equity. We have before us two wills, that of Mr. Martin, which gave to his wife the power of appointment by will of property devised to her for life, and that of his wife, as being in execution of that power. In reaching the ultimate points for decision, and in a consideration of the reasons which impel us to our conclusion, we shall keep constantly before us this fundamental principle of testamentary construction. The case before us may be said to rest in its main characteristics upon two questions: (1) Is the will of Mrs. Martin to be construed as an act done in pursuance of the execution of the power given her by her husband in his will in relation to the status and title of the property after her death, which was devised to her for life? (2) Is her will a good execution of the power?

[1] 1. With respect to the first question, our own decisions go to the extent of holding that, in the execution of a power, a direct reference to the power is not necessary, and if it be apparent that the act of the donee of the power is not fairly or reasonably susceptible of any other interpretation than as indicating an intention to execute the power, such act will be construed to be an execution of the power. Terry v. Rodahan, 79 Ga. 286, 5 S. E. 88, 11 Am. St. Rep. 420; Middlebrooks v. Ferguson, 128 Ga. 232, 55 S. E. 34; Mahoney v. Manning, 133 Ga. 784, 66 S. E. 1082; Nort v. Healy, 136 Ga. 287, 71 S. E. 471. These cases rest the doctrine upon the argument that by doing a thing which, independently of the power, would be nugatory, the donee of the power evinces an intention to execute the power. Thus in Middlebrooks v. Ferguson, supra, it was ruled that "where the donee of a power of sale, who individually has no interest in its subject, executes, without referring to the power or the instrument creating it, a fee-simple deed to land covered by it," etc. Mrs. Martin individually owned a plantation described in her will as "Woodstock." Her will purported to operate and only operated, upon three items of property, viz.: (1) Stock of the Southwestern Railroad Company; (2) the plantation devised to her for life by her husband; and (3) Woodstock plantation, its crops, farming implements, etc., thereon. The two first items of property were given to her for life, with power of appointment by will, and the third item was hers individually. She recognized the difference between the property in which she had only a power of appointment, and that which she owned in fee simple, in the devise disposing of "Woodstock." In explaining the liberality of her devise to her daughter Elise, the testatrix said that it was done "in recognition of the many sacrifices made by the said Elise M. Jones for me, she having unselfishly devoted the best years of her life ministering to my comfort and happiness, and it is therefore my earnest desire that she possess and enjoy Woodstock plantation * * * as fully and completely as I have in my lifetime." Now, she devised to her daughter Mrs. Bessie Cozart 300 shares of railroad stock, and to her grandsons Alfred and Samuel Marshall each 97 shares of railroad stock, and to her daughter Mrs. Elise M. Jones 200 shares of railroad stock, and to her grandsons Alfred and Samuel Marshall and Mrs. Elise M. Jones she devised the land which was given to her for life by her husband. Thus it will be seen that she was careful to state that her gratitude to Mrs. Jones was compensated for out of the testatrix's individual property, and that she was not using the property which was devised to her by her husband in rewarding her daughter for her unselfish devotion of many years. We think the power conferred by Mrs. Martin on her executors to sell any part of her estate to carry out her will is referable to the devise of her individual property. Mrs. Martin devised the property over which she was given a power of appointment to the persons to whom she was empowered to do so, under her husband's will. Her interest in this property would cease upon her death, and she could not devise it as her own property. Unless we consider her devise of the specific property, in which she had no interest after her death, but with respect to which she did have a power of appointment to such of the children and grandchildren of herself and husband as she might select, as done in pursuance of the execution of the power, then her will as to these items of property would be absolutely senseless and nugatory. Therefore we conclude that Mrs. Martin's will, with respect to the property devised to her for life, with power of appointment under her husband's will, was in pursuance of that power.

[2] 2. We come now to the question whether Mrs. Martin's will was a good execution of the power. As a preliminary to its solution, it is well to consider the testamentary plan of Mr. Martin. His will discloses that he was a man of ample fortune, and his elaborate scheme of trusts, life estates, and remainders evinces an unmistakable purpose to keep his property among his descendants almost, if not quite, to the limit of time permissible under the rule against perpetuities. He made to his children and representatives of children specific devises, with trusts, life estates, and remainders. He intended equality among his children at the time of the making of his will, and expressly said so in the third item. He anticipated that his wife would survive him, and that circumstances might change after his death, and he gave to her the right to exercise an absolute and unrestrained discretion as to which of their children and grandchildren should share in the property devised to the wife for life. In making the selection the wife was not given the power to change the trusts, terms, conditions, and limitations which he impressed on the property. If the wife executed the power conferred upon her, the persons selected by her took the property appointed to each upon the same terms, conditions, and limitations which he created in his will. If she failed to execute the power, then, upon the falling in of her life estate, the property was to be divided among his children and the issue of deceased children upon the terms, conditions, and limitations of his will. It would therefore seem to have been the testator's intention to confer upon his wife a power of selecting from among his children, and the issue of deceased children, such of them as she deemed proper to share in the remainder estate of the property devised to her for life, and to name them and the proportions or amount each was to take in such property by her last will; the tenure of their title to be as fixed in the testator's will. Her power extended only to the nomination of certain persons from a class, and the division of the property among her appointees, who took it subject to the terms, conditions, and limitations imposed upon each appointee in the testator's will. The quantity of interest to be taken by the appointee is expressly limited by the will of Mr. Martin, and Mrs. Martin was only authorized to divide the property, and appoint the several portions of it to the appointees. In such cases it has been considered that, even at law, where the quantity of interest to be taken by the appointee is expressly limited by the instrument creating the power, and the donee is only authorized to appoint the lands over which the estate is to ride, an appointment by the donee of an interest exceeding that intended to be given to the appointee is tantamount to a regular exercise of the power of appointment. 2 Sugden on Powers, § 79.

We are cited by the plaintiffs in error to the Canadian case of Scane v. Hartwick, 11 Upper Canada Q. B. 550, as maintaining a different rule. In that case the testator devised to his wife all of his property "as long as she, my said wife, shall exist; at her decease the said property to be at her sole disposal, unto any one or other of my descendants, so as the said property and land shall be entailed in the family, from one generation to another." The wife devised to a grandson in fee, and it was held that her devise was an excessive execution of the power, and was void. This case differs from the one in hand in this important fact: There the power was to the donee to create an estate tail, which she might have done either as an estate tail general or special, male or female. The donor did not create any estate to pass to the appointee. But in the case at bar the donor created the estate and imposed the terms, conditions, and limitations thereon, and the donee was only given the power to apportion the estate in remainder, and appoint such of his children or issue of deceased children to the allotment of her selection. At common law the rule was very rigid as to the execution of powers, and the common-law courts rejected all attempted executions as void where the donee, being given the power to appoint a particular estate, appointed one greater than that authorized by the power. The strictness of the common-law rule was modified by the English equity courts about the middle of the eighteenth century. In the leading case of Alexander v. Alexander, 2 Ves. Sr. 640, the rule was announced that where a person, purporting to execute a power, has done something outside the power, then, if the things are distinguishable, the execution within the power is good, and the excess void; but if the boundaries between the excess and execution are not distinguishable, the execution will be void in toto. In that case the power was to appoint among children, and was exercised by appointment to children, and grandchildren, and it was held that the appointment was good as to the former and bad as to the latter. Likewise it was held that a power to charge a particular sum will be executed by a charge of a larger sum, and the excess only will be void. Parker v. Parker, Gilb. Eq. 168. The equitable rule in this regard obtains in this state, and finds support in Civil Code, § 4583, which declares: "Accident or mistake in the execution of a power, or causing the defective execution of the power, will be remedied in equity." As we have seen, the power granted to Mrs. Martin was not to create a particular estate to the donee's appointees, but to apportion property and to nominate the persons from a designated class to take such estates therein as the donor had himself created. In her will Mrs. Martin used language similar to that employed by her husband. With reference to the property in which she had only a life estate, with power of appointment, she said: "I give, bequeath, and devise" to persons from the class from which her husband gave her the power of appointment. Of course, she could not technically devise property which was not hers, and we will not give the language such a technical meaning as to thwart her plain purpose of appointment. And any strained technical implication of an attempt to create a fee-simple estate will be considered a harmless effort in excess of her power. We therefore conclude that Mrs. Martin executed the power given to her in her husband's will.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

NEW TRIAL (§§ 114, 132, 155*)—JURISDICTION OF APPLICATION—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

Under the facts of this case, the court erred in not dismissing the motion for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 234-236, 273-275, 315; Dec. Dig. §§ 114, 132, 155.*]

Error from Superior Court, Jackson County; J. B. Jones, Judge.

Action by Mrs. M. J. Duke against F. L. Pendergrass. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error, and plaintiff files cross-bill. Reversed on cross-bill, and main bill dismissed.

The case of Duke v. Pendergrass was tried at the February term, 1912, of the superior court of Jackson county, which term continued longer than one week. Judge J. B. Jones, of the Northeastern circuit, presided the first week of the term, in the absence of Judge Brand, the judge of the Western circuit, of which Jackson county constitutes a part. The case was tried and submitted to the jury during the first week. At the close of that week, the jury still having the case under consideration and not having returned a verdict, it was agreed by counsel for both parties that the jury should return a sealed verdict on Monday of the second week of the court. Judge Walker, of the Toombs circuit, presided during the second week. The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff on Monday of the second week, which was February 10th, and a decree was entered thereon, signed by Judge Walker. On February 12th, while Judge Walker was presiding, the defendant presented to Judge Jones, who was then presiding in the superior court of Stephens county, in his own circuit, a motion for a new trial on the general grounds that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, etc. On the last-mentioned date Judge Jones granted a rule nisi calling upon the plaintiff to show cause before him on April 29th following, at Gainesville, why a new trial should not be granted. This order provided: "If for any reason this motion is not heard and determined before the beginning of the next term of this court, then the same shall stand on the docket until heard and determined at said term or thereafter. It is further ordered that the movant have until the hearing, whenever it may be, to prepare and present for approval a brief of evidence in said case, and the presiding judge may enter his approval thereon at any time, either in term or vacation; and if the hearing of the motion shall be in vacation, and the brief of evidence has not been filed in the clerk's office before the date of the hearing, said brief may be filed in the clerk's office at any time within ten days after the motion is heard and determined." The order directed that the plaintiff be served with copy of the motion and order. The motion, together with the order granting the rule nisi, was filed in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Jackson county on February 14, 1912, and on the same day counsel for the plaintiff acknowledged due and legal service of the motion and order, and waived time, copy, and all other and further service. No brief of evidence accompanied the motion when it was presented to Judge Jones, or when it was filed with the clerk. When the hearing of the motion for a new trial came on before Judge Jones at Gainesville, April 29, 1912, and before the motion was heard, counsel for the respondent moved to dismiss it on the following grounds: "(1) Because the order requiring respondent to show cause why a new trial should not be granted did not issue from the superior court of Jackson county. (2) Because said order was not signed by the judge presiding over said court at the time the record in said case was closed. (3) Because the order requiring respondent to show cause why a new trial should not be granted was not signed by the judge presiding over Jackson superior court at the time the application for a new trial was made." Judge Jones, after hearing argument, took the matter under consideration, and on May 28, 1912, he overruled the motion to dismiss the motion for a new trial, and refused to grant a new trial. The brief of evidence was filed May 30, 1912. Pendergrass excepted to the overruling of his motion for a new trial, and Mrs. Duke filed a cross-bill excepting to the overruling of her motion to dismiss.

Ray & Ray and P. Cooley, all of Jefferson, for plaintiff in error. John J. Strickland and F. C. Shackelford, both of Athens, and J. A. B. Mahaffey, of Jefferson, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The question that is controlling, as to both the main and cross bills, is whether Judge Jones, at the time he rendered the judgments respectively complained of in the main and cross bills of exceptions, had jurisdiction to render the judgments. It is true that a motion for a new trial had been filed during the term at which the trial was had, but no brief of evidence—which is an essential part of a valid motion—accompanied it; nor, as will hereinafter appear, had any valid order been granted extending the time for preparing and filing such brief. While a judge of a superior court has power to hear and determine a motion for new trial in vacation as well as in term time, without an order passed in term time (Civil Code, § 4852), when upon the application of either party the judge has fixed a time for the hearing, and 10 days' notice thereof has been given the opposite party (Civil Code, § 4852), such power can be exercised only where there is a valid motion for new trial pending. When the motion for a new trial in the present case was filed, Judge Walker was presiding. Judge Jones, at the end of the previous week of the term, had severed his connection with the court in which the trial was had; and therefore he had no more power to grant an order relating to the motion for new trial, or authority to hear and determine it, than any other judge of the superior courts of the state who had not presided in the court during the term at which the trial of the case was had. Of course, Judge Walker, who was presiding when the motion was filed, could have granted a rule on the motion for new trial returnable before Judge Jones, to be heard and determined by him; but as this was not done, we are of the opinion that Judge Jones was without jurisdiction to entertain the motion for a new trial and to pass upon its merits, and therefore that he should have dismissed it on motion.

The judgment on the cross-bill of exceptions is therefore reversed; and as this ruling disposes of the whole case, the main bill of exceptions is dismissed. All the Justices concur.

THOMAS v. GEORGIA GRANITE CO. et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 12, 1913.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 107*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—DANGEROUS WORK.

The general rule of law declaring the duty of a master in regard to furnishing a servant a safe place to work is usually applied to a permanent place, or one which is quasi permanent. It does not apply to such places as are constantly shifting and being transformed as a direct result of the servant's labor, and where the work in its progress necessarily changes the character for safety of the place in which it is performed as it progresses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 199-202, 212, 254, 255; Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 206, 229*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

A servant assumes the ordinary risks of his employment, and is bound to exercise his own skill and diligence to protect himself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 550, 674, 683; Dec. Dig. §§ 206, 229.*]

3. DEMURRER TO PETITION.

There was no error in dismissing the petition on general demurrer.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by Jennie Thomas against the Georgia Granite Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Jennie Thomas instituted an action against the Georgia Granite Company and E. B. Respass, to recover damages for the homicide of Scott Thomas, the plaintiff's husband. Relatively to the manner in which Thomas was injured, the petition alleged the following in substance: In January, 1912, the defendants, under a contract with the city of Atlanta, were engaged in constructing a sewer along Barnett street. Thomas was working for them as a laborer. Preparatory to laying the sewer, the defendants were opening a ditch, and had opened it a part of the way along Barnett street, and at the point where Thomas was killed it was about 10 or 12 feet deep and 2 or 3 feet wide. Under instructions from defendants, who had a foreman present, Thomas was working in the bottom of the ditch, engaged in throwing out dirt. While so engaged, a large amount of dirt caved in, mashing and injuring him to such an extent that he died. Other allegations were that the dirt caved in because the sides of the ditch were not braced or propped, and had nothing to support the dirt and prevent it from caving for a distance of 20 feet or more along the street. Ordinary care upon the part of the defendants would have required braces or props to support the sides of the ditch every 5 or 6 feet; but the defendants negligently failed to have any props or braces for 20 or 30 feet from where Thomas was working. The defendants knew, or ought to have known, that the place was unsafe; and Thomas was free from fault, and by the exercise of ordinary care could not have prevented the injury. On general demurrer the petition was dismissed, and the plaintiff excepted.

Moore & Branch, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Jas. L. Key and Tindall & Silverman, all of Atlanta, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. [1] 1. On demurrer this petition is to be construed most strongly against the plaintiff. The allegations that the defendant knew, or ought to have known, that the place was unsafe, amount to no more than a charge of implied notice that the place was unsafe. Babcock Lumber Co. v. Johnson, 120 Ga. 1030 (6), 48 S. E. 438; Fraser v. Smith & Kelly Co., 136 Ga. 18, 70 S. E. 792. The general charge that the plaintiff's husband was free from fault, and by the exercise of ordinary care could not have prevented the injury to himself, when considered in connection with the other allegations of the petition in regard to the work which he was doing, and his opportunity to see and know the dangers of the place, are mere conclusions of the pleader, and add nothing to the special facts alleged, upon which the court is to pass in determining whether the husband was free from fault, and whether by the exercise of ordinary care he could have prevented the injury to himself. There being no allegations to the contrary, it must be assumed that he was of ordinary intelligence and skilled in the business in which he was engaged, and that he was laboring under no physical defect or disability which rendered him incapable of appreciating the situation and knowing the danger incident to his employment. The sides of the ditch caved in at the very place where he was working. He was engaged in throwing out dirt from the bottom of the ditch. It is inferable that the work which he was doing tended directly to undermine the walls and to render the place unsafe. Such would be the natural result, and there was no allegation that it did not do so, and that his work did not cause the walls of the ditch to cave. The facts bring the case within the principle of Holland v. Durham Coal & Coke Co., 131 Ga. 715, 63 S. E. 290, where it was held: "The general rule of law declaring the duty of a master in regard to furnishing a servant a safe place to work is usually applied to a permanent place, or one which is quasi permanent. It does not apply to such places as are constantly shifting and being transformed as a direct result of the servant's labor, and where the work in its progress necessarily changes the character for safety of the place in which it is performed, as it progresses." This principle was overlooked in the decision of the case of Southern Bauxite Mining Co. v. Fuller, 116 Ga. 695, 43 S. E. 64, which was not rendered by an entire bench of six Justices. The Holland Case was decided by six Justices, and is controlling. See, also, Donato Citrone v. O'Rourke Engineering Con. Co., 188 N. Y. 339, 80 N. E. 1092, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 340, and note 3e on page 358.

The basis of the suit was that the defendants had failed to provide the servant with a safe place at which to work. It appearing from the allegations that, on account of the character of the work in which the servant was employed, the master was not under any duty to furnish him a safe place, the court properly sustained the demurrer.

[2] 2. The case involves the further principle of assumption by the servant of the ordinary risks of the employment, against the dangers of which he is bound to exercise his own skill and diligence to prevent injury to himself. The plaintiff's husband was employed to make a ditch. This involved the creation of the danger from which he suffered injury. He was bound to know that under natural laws there would be more or less danger of the sides caving in as the work of deepening the ditch progressed. It was not alleged that there was anything unusual about the soil, which the master knew, which the servant did not know, and by the exercise of ordinary care could not ascertain, and which caused the sides of the ditch to cave in; but the complaint is that the sides caved in because they were not braced at the proper interval, and the only ground of negligence charged against the master consisted in allegations of failure to cause the braces to be erected at closer intervals. From these allegations it appears that the injury was received from a danger that would ordinarily and naturally exist in doing the work which the servant was employed to perform. But this is not all. The servant could not have engaged in the work without knowing and seeing the braces and the intervals at which they were placed, or, in other words, without seeing the identical condition which, as grounds of negligence, it is alleged that the master allowed to exist.

The case of Ludd v. Wilkins, 118 Ga. 529, 45 S. E. 429, did not refer to an injury received in excavating a ditch; but the principle of the case is applicable. In that case the defendant was engaged as a contractor in constructing in the city of Atlanta what is known as the "Whitehall Street viaduct." The servant was engaged at work upon the viaduct, and at the time of receiving the injury which resulted in his death was engaged in putting in place a piece of iron, and standing on or near iron brackets which received these iron pieces. Planks had been placed, extending from one bracket to the other, for employes to stand upon while engaged at work. These planks were apt to slip off the brackets. There was evidence that this slipping could have been prevented by nailing pieces under each end of the plank, or by putting a bolt through each end of a ten-penny nail, or by tying the plank to the bracket. None of these methods were adopted. The plank was laid loosely upon the brackets. There was no evidence that there were any defects in any of the planks. The plank upon which the servant was standing had slipped to a point where walking upon it would cause one end to leave the bracket; and this precipitated him to the street below, and he died as a consequence of this fall. It was alleged that the defendant negligently failed to have the plank so braced or secured as to prevent the same from slipping, and that it was the defendant's duty to furnish the deceased with a safe place to work, and to do this it was incumbent upon him to have the plank securely fastened. The court granted a nonsuit. In affirming the judgment this court held: "This being an action against a master to recover damages for the homicide of a servant, and it appearing from the evidence that, even if the servant did not know of the fact which is charged as negligence against the master, he had equal means with the master of knowing it, and by the exercise of ordinary care could have discovered the same, there was no error in granting a nonsuit."

A somewhat similar case is that of Sou. Ry. Co. v. Taylor, 137 Ga. 704, 73 S. E. 1055, where the rule in regard to the assumption by the servant of the ordinary risks of his employment was applied. Some of the cases in other states which apply the doctrine of assumption of risks, where the persons injured were engaged in the work of excavating trenches and the like, are: Brown v. Electric Ry. Co., 101 Tenn. 252, 47 S. W. 415, 70 Am. St. Rep. 666; Olson v. McMullen, 34 Minn. 94, 24 N. W. 318; Swanson v. Great Northern R. Co., 68 Minn. 184, 70 N. W. 978; Pederson v. City of Rushford, 41 Minn. 289, 42 N. W. 1063; Regan v. Palo, 62 N. J. Law, 30, 41 Atl. 364; Carlson v. Sioux Falls Water Co., 8 S. D. 47, 65 N. W. 419; Zeigenmeyer v. Goetz Lime & Cement Co., 118 Mo. App. 330, 88 S. W. 139; Batty v. Niagara Falls Hyd. Power Co., 79 App. Div. 466, 79 N. Y. Supp. 784; Hughes v. Malden & Melrose Gas Light Co., 168 Mass. 395, 47 S. E. 125. See Bayley on Personal Injuries (2d Ed.) 1230.

REYNOLDS BANKING CO. v. SOUTHERN PACIFIC GUANO CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 18, 1918.)

1. EXECUTION (§§ 204, 207, 210*)—CLAIM BY THIRD PERSON—FORTHCOMING BOND—BREACH—READVERTISEMENT.

A claimant who obtains possession of the property levied upon by means of a forthcoming bond, and who appropriates the property to his own use by a sale of it, cannot file a second claim after the dismissal of the first. Nor is it necessary in such case to readvertise the property for sale, as a condition precedent to an action on the forthcoming bond. An action on the bond will not be enjoined because the claimant, after disposing of the property, cannot assert his title in a second claim, and because the property was not readvertised for sale. Having elected his remedy by claim, he is bound by the consequences of his election.

2. INJUNCTION (§ 26*)—GROUNDS—ACTION AT LAW.

Equity will not enjoin the prosecution of an action at law because of certain matters which, if defensive to the right asserted in the action at law, are as much available as a defense in that action as in the equitable action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 24-49, 54-61; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

Error from Superior Court, Taylor County; S. P. Gilbert, Judge.

Action by the Reynolds Banking Company against the Southern Pacific Guano Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Jere M. Moore, of Montezuma, C. B. Marshall, of Reynolds, and Allen & Pottle, of Milledgeville, for plaintiff in error. W. F. Weaver, of Reynolds, and Perry, Foy & Monk, of Sylvester, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. A fi. fa. in favor of the Southern Pacific Guano Company against E. C. English was levied upon certain cotton, to which the Reynolds Banking Company interposed a claim. The property levied upon was delivered to the claimant by the sheriff, upon the execution of a forthcoming bond. The proceedings were returned to the superior court for trial, and the claim was dismissed because of a defect in the affidavit. Thereafter the sheriff, suing for the use of the plaintiff in fi. fa., instituted suit upon the forthcoming bond, alleging, amongst other things, that after the judgment dismissing the claim, and ordering the fi. fa. to proceed, he demanded of the claimant the possession of the property so levied upon, which demand was refused, and that prior to the institution of the suit the claimant had appropriated the cotton levied upon, and thus put it out of the claimant's power to deliver it to the sheriff. The claimant filed an answer and a plea in abatement at the appearance term, and at the same time prepared another claim, together with a forthcoming bond, and tendered the same to the sheriff, who refused to receive them. Subsequently the Reynolds Banking Company filed a petition to enjoin the prosecution of the suit, on the grounds that there was no such person, firm, or corporation as the Southern Pacific Guano Company, the alleged plaintiff in the judgment upon which the execution issued; that the Southern Pacific Guano Company was a trade-name used during the year 1879 and prior thereto by J. T. Moody and G. S. Brewster, of the county of Fulton; that Moody and Brewster and all of their assets were placed in the hands of a receiver and trustee in bankruptcy, and all of their assets were taken possession of and administered under that litigation; that the receiver had been discharged; that Moody is dead; that Brewster has moved to Indianapolis, Ind.; that the fi. fa. was based on a note which had never been transferred; that there is now no authority in any one to proceed with the collection of the fi. fa., or to authorize the suit upon the bond; that the issue made by the claim case was not tried upon its merits; and that the refusal of the sheriff to accept a second claim deprives the claimant of the right to establish its title to the property. The sheriff and certain persons purporting to act for the Southern Pacific Guano Company were made parties defendant. The prayer of the petition was to enjoin the suit upon the forthcoming bond, and for a decree that the property levied upon was the property of the Reynolds Banking Company. The petition was dismissed on general demurrer.

[1] 1. The remedy by claim is cumulative. It is an expeditious method provided by statute for determining the right of the plaintiff to have satisfaction from the property levied upon, the ownership of which is claimed by a stranger to the fi. fa. In claim cases, where there is a legal affidavit of claim and also a legal claim bond, a forthcoming bond is not necessary to the hearing of the claim. The forthcoming bond is a privilege to the claimant, but not a requisite with which he must comply. Without it the property, pending the litigation, remains in the possession of the sheriff; by it he has a right to the possession of the property until the sale. Bonner v. Little, 29 Ga. 538. When a claimant gives a forthcoming bond, thereafter he acknowledges that he holds the property for the sheriff, and his failure to deliver the property to the sheriff at the time and place of sale is a breach of the bond. Boebuck v. Thornton, 19 Ga. 151. If the claimant still retains the property in his possession, after a dismissal or withdrawal of the claim, the sheriff must readvertise the property. But if, after taking possession of the property, the claimant disposes of it, the sheriff is not required to readvertise the property, but may sue upon the bond as for a condition broken. Aycock v. Austin, 87 Ga. 566, 18 S. E. 582. The claimant, after disposing of the property, is not entitled to file a second claim thereto, upon the original claim being withdrawn or dismissed (Oatts v. Wilkins, 110 Ga. 319, 35 S. E. 345); and in a suit upon the forthcoming bond it is no defense that, because the property was not readvertised for sale, he had no opportunity of renewing his claim.

As was very pertinently said by Bleckley, C. J., in Anderson v. Banks, 92 Ga. 121, 122, 18 S. E. 364: "If it be said that he had no opportunity of renewing because the property was not readvertised for sale, the answer is that it did not have to be readvertised, for it was disposed of either by the claimant or his surety, so that they could not produce it. Advertising it would be a useless ceremony and needlessly expensive, if the proposed sale would be impossible in consequence of the property having been put out of reach and beyond the control of the makers of the bond. Had it been desired to interpose a second claim, the property should have been kept under their control until they had so done. It is not allowable for a claimant to defeat a sale by interposing a claim and then appropriate the property to his own use, or suffer it to be appropriated by his surety on the claim bond, and then contest, not in the claim case—the very case appointed by law for the purpose—but in a suit on the bond, the right of the plaintiff in execution to sell the property. To allow this would be to overlook and disregard the object of the claim laws, that object being to facilitate the trial of the rights of property seized under execution, by a sort of intervention on the part of strangers to the execution, instead of leaving them to assert their rights in some separate and independent action. If claims are used merely to get or retain possession of property, and not for the trial of rights to it, they cease to be substitutes for other actions, and only give ground or occasion for some other action, which is the very thing the claim laws are designed to prevent. It would be a perversion of these laws not to hold the claimant and his surety estopped by dismissing the claim; the present action being for a breach of a bond to produce the property, and the question of breach not in any way involving the title but only the forthcoming of the property at the time and place of sale."

It follows from these decisions that the claimants had no right in an equitable petition to set up their title to the property levied upon, after having elected to try that title by the remedy of claim. It may be said that the claimants are precluded from ever contesting with their adversary the title to the property as being subject to the fi. fa. To this we reply that they should have left the property in the possession of the sheriff, or, if they took possession of it under a forthcoming bond, they should have retained the property until the final disposition of the claim case. They were allowed by the statute, if the property was in their possession, or in the possession of the sheriff, to have filed a second claim after the dismissal or withdrawal of a first claim. Their inability to file a second claim, or contest with the plaintiff in fi. fa. the title to the property, comes, not from any defect in the law, but from a failure on their part to observe the law, in that they appropriated the property to their own use before the litigation was ended.

[2] 2. The defense that the plaintiffs in the judgment were adjudicated bankrupts, and their property administered in the bankrupt court, or that there are no parties plaintiff for whom the sheriff could recover for their use, even if a good defense (and as to that we express no opinion), could be set up in the suit on the bond; and there is no reason for the intervention of equity to enjoin that suit. McCall v. Fry, 120 Ga. 661, 48 S. E. 200.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices con-

HEYWARD-WILLIAMS CO. v. McCALL.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 18, 1918.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

DEEDS (§ 129*)—TRUSTS (§§ 21, 124*)—VALIDITY—CONSTRUCTION OF DEED—ESTATE CONVEYED—DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

A grantor conveyed land to F., "trustee for her children." The deed contained a covenant denying to the trustee the power to sell or encumber the property, and declaring that the land shall not be subject for any liabilities of the trustee or her successors, either in her or their individual or trust capacity. Power was given to the trustee to use the land for the ordinary purposes of farming. It was further provided: "And should the said [F.], trustee as aforesaid, have no children living at the time of her death, then she may, of her own will and choice, give such land and premises to such person or persons as she may desire." The deed further recited that the grantor and the trustee (who was his daughter) agreed that the land was to be accounted for as an advancement to the daughter in the final distribution of the grantor's estate. At the time of the execution of the deed F. had no children, but subsequently a child was born unto her, who survived her. F. died, leaving a husband and the child. Held, that F. left no inheritable estate in the land which descended to her husband as heir, but that her surviving child under the deed took a fee-simple estate in the land on the death of his mother.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

Action by H. F. McCall, by next friend, against the Heyward-Williams Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

W. R. Hewlett, of Savannah, for plaintiff in error. E. K. Overstreet, of Sylvania, and F. T. Saussy, of Savannah, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. This case comes to us on exception to the grant of an interlocutory injunction, the propriety and correctness of which depends upon the construction of the deed from B. F. Beard to Frances A. McCall, trustee, which is in terms as follows "State of Georgia, Screven County. This indenture, made and entered into this 26th day of April, 1892, between B. F. Beard, of the county aforesaid, and state aforesaid, of the first part, and Frances A. McCall, trustee for her children, of the same place, of the second part, witnesseth: That the said B. F. Beard, for and in consideration of the natural love and affection which he has for his daughter, the said Frances A. McCall, trustee as aforesaid, has given, granted, and delivered, and by these presents does give, grant, and deliver, unto the said Frances A. McCall, trustee as aforesaid, and to her successors in the trust [a described tract of land], to have and to hold the said tract of land and premises unto the said Frances A. McCall, trustee as aforesaid, and to her successors in the trust, for the sole and separate use, benefit, and behoof of the aforesaid beneficiaries of said trust, forever. But said trustee shall not have the right, power, or authority to sell or dispose of said lands or premises in any manner, or to mortgage, pawn, or pledge the same in any manner; nor shall said land be subject or liable to or for the debts, contracts, or liabilities of said trustee or any successors in the trust, either in her or their individual or trust capacity; but said land shall forever remain exempt from any and all such obligations. Such trustee, however, shall have full right, liberty, and power to use said land for the ordinary purposes of farming, either by planting it herself or by renting or leasing it from year to year to other persons for the same purposes. And should the said Frances A. McCall, trustee as aforesaid, have no children living at the time of her death, then she may, of her own will and choice, give said land and premises to such person or persons as she may desire. It is also agreed between the parties of the first and second parts that the aforesaid lands and premises shall be and the same are hereby considered as constituting a part of the said Frances A. McCall share in the estate of the said B. F. Beard, at the final distribution of said estate, so that each child shall receive an equal share. It is further agreed that the schoolhouse on said land, together with one acre of land immediately around said house, shall be and the same is hereby set apart for such purposes, so long as it shall be used for teaching white children; otherwise, to revert to the said Frances A. McCall, trustee as aforesaid. And, lastly, the said B. F. Beard does hereby warrant the said tract of land and premises unto the said Frances A. McCall, trustee as aforesaid, and to her successors in the trust, against himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and against all persons whomsoever." It was admitted that Frances A. McCall had no children at the date of the execution and delivery of the deed, but that subsequently there was born unto her a child, Harry F. McCall. She died in 1897, leaving as her sole heirs at law her son, Harry F. McCall, and her husband, E. C. McCall.

The insistence of the plaintiff in error is that, because there was no child of Frances A. McCall in esse at the time of the delivery of the deed, she took a fee-simple estate, and that her after-born child took nothing under the deed. This is said to result from the application of the rule in Wild's Case, recognized as a rule of construction by the courts of this state. The doctrine of Wild's Case, as stated by Downs, C. J., in Ball & Beatty, 459, is as follows: "Where the devise is in terms immediate, and so intended by the testator, and the description of the persons to take is general, then none that do not fall within the description at the time of the testator's death can take; therefore the after-born must be excluded. But where the enjoyment of the thing devised is, by the testator's expressed intent, not to be immediate by those among whom it is finally to be divided, but is postponed to a particular period, or until a particular event shall happen, then those who answer the general description at that period, or when the event happens on which the distribution is to be made, are entitled to take." The rule in Wild's Case is wholly inapplicable to the case sub judice. If a present estate had been conveyed to Frances A. McCall and her children, she having no children in esse at the time, a fee-simple title would have passed to her. Baird v. Brookin, 86 Ga. 709, 12 S. E. 981, 12 L. R. A. 157; Hollis v. Lawton, 107 Ga. 102, 32 S. E. 846, 73 Am. St. Rep. 114.

But the grantor did not convey the land to his daughter individually, nor did he manifest any intention to convey a present estate to her and her children. At the time of the execution of the deed the daughter had no children, and the grantor was well aware of this fact. At the same time the grantor's deed shows that he appreciated the possibility, or even probability, that she might subsequently have children, and reflects his intention to make her after-born children the beneficiaries of his bounty, in the event they survived their mother. To effectuate this intent he conveyed the property to his daughter in trust, and carefully defined the nature and limitations of the trust. The legal estate was conveyed to Frances A. McCall, not individually, but to her as trustee, for the purpose of executing a specific trust. The trust declared was that the trustee was to use the land for the ordinary purposes of farming, either by planting it herself or by renting or leasing it from year to year to other persons for the same purpose. Whether the grantor intended that the trustee should have the annual profits of the land, or accumulate and hold the same for the benefit of children surviving her, is not a question in the present case. But it is clear that the grantor's intent was to place the title to the land in Frances A. McCall, to hold the same in trust for the benefit of her children living at her death. In the event of the daughter's death without surviving children, and only in that event, she is given the power to dispose of the land. Upon her death leaving a surviving child, such child was the cestui que trust, and became vested with the title to the land.

The point is made that, inasmuch as no cestui que trust were in existence at the time the deed was executed, and it could not be known during the life of the daughter who they might be, and that as she was to have the use of the land during her life, she must be considered as having an interest in the land incompatible with a mere trusteeship, and that therefore she took all of the estate in fee. An important element in the premise for this deduction is that the daughter was given the income of the estate during her life. In the decision of this case it is not essential to determine whether the power given to the trustee to use the land as a farm conveyed to her the right to appropriate the income to her individual use, or whether this power was intended as a means of accumulating a fund to be held by her in trust for such of her children as survived her. In testing the correctness of the proposition that the daughter took a fee in the land, we may admit, for the sake of the argument, that the deed conveyed to the daughter the income of the land during her life. Even with this admission, we cannot agree with counsel for plaintiff in error that the daughter took a fee in the whole estate. Such a result cannot come from the statute of uses, for the reason that there was no cestui que trust in being when the deed was executed, and by the terms of the deed it is clear that the title to the land was conveyed to the daughter in trust for such children as might survive her. Possession and use of the land was given to the daughter as trustee, in order to effectually administer the trust. If it be conceded that this virtually created a life estate in the daughter, then her surviving children would take by way of remainder. On the other hand, if the grant of the possession and use of the land be construed as a part of the trust created for such children as may survive the daughter, and that the grant is to the daughter in trust for accumulation for such of her children as may survive her, such a trust has been held to be good. 1 Perry on Trusts, § 66; Salem Capital Flour Mills Co. v. Stayton Water Ditch & Canal Co. (C. C.) 33 Fed. 146; Levin on Trusts (12th Ed.) 95.

It is no objection to the validity of the trust created by such deed that the cestui que trust cannot be definitely known until the death of the daughter. It is sufficient if they come into being during the life of the trustee and be distinguished at her death. "It is certainly not necessary to the creation of a trust estate," says Kennedy, J., in Ashurst v. Given, 5 Watts & S. (Pa.) 323, 328, "that a cestui que use in being should be named, nor is it requisite that the cestui que use should be known as such before the death of the trustee for life. It is sufficient if the person designated as the cestui que use be in existence, and can be distinguished at the death of the trustee." In all essential respects the trust in that case was similar to that declared by the grantor in the deed we are construing.

In Hollis v. Lawton, supra, the conveyance was to a trustee for "his wife and the children issue of their marriage." There were children in life at the time of the execution of the deed, and others were born thereafter. It was said that the vital question in the case was whether the trust included only children that were in life when the deed was executed, or whether it also included after-born children. The court construed the deed to include only children in esse, as that was the intent of the grantor expressed in the deed, and stated the rule of construction as follows: "The rule, then, governing the construction of such words in a deed or will, is that the intention of the maker of the instrument will be construed to refer only to such persons as are in life, unless there are some words or expressions in the instrument indicating a contrary intention, and showing that the maker also had in mind a certain person, or class of persons, that might thereafter be born." Keeping in mind this rule of construction, we are clear that the grantor's intention was to create a trust for beneficiaries who should come into being, and who were ascertainable at the death of the trustee.

In Davis v. Hollingsworth, 113 Ga. 210, 38 S. E. 827, 84 Am. St. Rep. 233, a deed was made by a father to a married daughter "and her children or child, should any be born to her" (she having no child at that time). In holding that after-born children would not take under that deed, Lewis, J., after reviewing the authorities, was of the opinion that it would have been otherwise, had the conveyance been made to a trustee for after-born children.

The deed as a whole clearly indicates the grantor's intention to convey the land to his daughter in trust for such children as should survive her; and it is permissible to create a trust for a cestui que trust who is not in existence at the time the trust is created, but who can come into being and be distinguished at the death of the trustee. Applying this principle, we hold that upon Frances A. McCall dying, with a child surviving, her husband acquired no interest in the land as her heir at law.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1097*)—SECOND APPEAL—LAW OF THE CASE.

Where a petition has been dismissed in the trial court upon general demurrer, and that judgment has been reviewed by the Court of Appeals, and reversed in a decision holding that the petition sets forth a cause of action, and, subsequently to the rendition of such decision by the Court of Appeals, the Supreme Court renders a decision in another case, the effect of which is to show that the decision of the Court of Appeals is erroneous, and, after the rendition of such decision by the Supreme Court, the case first mentioned again comes before the Court of Appeals upon writ of error, assigning error upon the judgment overruling a motion for new trial filed by the defendant, the Court of Appeals, upon a consideration of the second writ of error, is bound by its own decision in the former case, and should not in that case follow and apply the contrary decision of the Supreme Court, though it should do so in other cases.

Action by J. L. Glawson and others against the Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error to the Court of Appeals, which certifies certain questions to the Supreme Court. Questions answered.

The Court of Appeals certified the following questions:

"Where a petition is dismissed in the trial court upon general demurrer, and that judgment has been reviewed by the Court of Appeals, and reversed, in a decision holding that the petition sets forth a cause of action, and, subsequently to the rendition of such decision by the Court of Appeals, the Supreme Court renders a decision in another case, the effect of which is to show that the decision of the Court of Appeals is erroneous, and, after the rendition of such decision by the Supreme Court, the case first mentioned again comes before the Court of Appeals upon writ of error, assigning error upon the judgment overruling a motion for new trial filed by the defendant, is the Court of Appeals, upon a consideration of the second writ of error, bound by its own decision in the former case, or should it follow and apply the contrary decision of the Supreme Court?"

"In the above-stated case, counsel have attacked the soundness of the following decisions of the Supreme Court, and have asked that this court request the Supreme Court to review and overrule the decisions in these cases: Chapman v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 88 Ga. 763 [15 S. E. 901, 17 L. R. A. 430, 30 Am. St. Rep. 183], Seifert v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 129 Ga. 181 [58 S. E. 699, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1149, 121 Am. LUMPKIN, J. [1] 1. The first question propounded by the Court of Appeals raises an interesting question of practice. It involves what is commonly called the doctrine of "the law of the case." This doctrine is thus stated in 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 184: "The doctrine of 'the law of the case' may be stated thus: A matter decided on one appeal cannot be re-examined on a second appeal in the same case; for the decision of an appellate court, whether right or wrong, in a case before it, is conclusive upon the points presented throughout all the subsequent proceedings in the case, both upon the appellate court itself and upon the trial court. Concisely, it is said that the decision on appeal becomes "the law of the case." In this court the rule is well settled. In Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Third National Bank of Atlanta, 125 Ga. 489, 54 S. E. 621, it was held: "A decision by the Supreme Court is controlling upon the judge of the trial court, as well as upon the Supreme Court when the case reaches that court a second time. The principle in the decision may be reviewed and overruled in another case between different parties, but as between the parties the decision stands as the law of the case, even though the ruling has been disapproved by the Supreme Court in a case decided before the second appearance of the case in that court." See, also, Gilmore v. Johnson, 29 Ga. 67; Ingram v. Trustees of Mercer University, 102 Ga. 226, 29 S. E. 273, and citations; Allen v. Schweigert, 113 Ga. 71, 38 S. E. 397; McLendon v. Macon, Dublin & Savannah R. Co., 128 Ga. 253, 51 S. E. 317.

Had the decision on the demurrer been rendered here, it would stand as the law of the case, although a different ruling might have been made in regard to the principle involved before the case reached this court for the second time. Does it alter the rule that the decision on the demurrer was made by the Court of Appeals, and that the case is in that court for the second time? We think not. It was argued that, as the Constitution declares that "the decisions of the Supreme Court shall bind the Court of Appeals as precedents," this abolished the "law of the case" rule under circumstances like those involved in the question now under consideration, and that the Court of Appeals was bound to follow the later decision of this court on the same principle in a different case, instead of its own former decision in the same case. To this contention there are two replies: The first is that, in the fallibility and imperfection which inheres in all human institutions, lawyers, and even judges, sometimes honestly differ as to the application of a precedent. The Court of Appeals is a court of last resort as to the cases within its jurisdiction (omitting reference to constitutional questions and certified questions). Its decisions, within its jurisdiction, are final. They cannot be treated as nullities. If by any chance the judgment in a particular case should be erroneous, it would still be binding. Saffold v. Mangum, 139 Ga. 119, 76 S. E. 858; Buck v. Duval, 139 Ga. 599, 77 S. E. 809. Any other rule would create utter confusion. It is the duty of the superior courts to follow the decisions of the Supreme Court as precedents. Suppose a superior court should make errors in the effort to do so, but no exception should be taken to the judgment, it could not be disregarded as void. There must be somewhere an end of controversy, and that necessity is what Chief Justice Bleckley doubtless had in mind when in his opinion in Broome v. Davis, 87 Ga. 584, 13 S. E. 749, he humorously referred to "the fallibility which is inherent in all courts except those of last resort."

Again, the declaration that the decisions of the Supreme Court shall be binding on the Court of Appeals as precedents is only a part of a paragraph of the Constitution. The same paragraph also declares that the laws relating to the Supreme Court as to practice and procedure, and in all other respects, except as otherwise provided by the Constitution, shall apply to the Court of Appeals until otherwise provided by law. Civil Code 1910, § 6506. While we cannot agree with counsel for the defendant in error that, relatively to the Court of Appeals, this provision crystallizes into an absolute rule of constitutional law every rule of practice of the Supreme Court, and that, as to the Court of Appeals, it can only be changed by the Legislature, although the Supreme Court may change the rule for itself, yet it does analogize the practice in that court to the practice in this. And, as we have seen, what is known as the doctrine of "the law of the case," arising from a decision therein, is a settled rule in this court.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error relied strongly on the decision in Messenger v. Anderson, 225 U. S. 436, 32 Sup. Ct. 739, 56 L. Ed. 1152. But the statement there made, that the phrase "the law of the case" expresses the practice of the courts generally to refuse to open what has been decided, rather than a limit on their power, does not alter the fact that in courts of last resort the rule is generally followed. We need not distinguish between the propriety of the federal Court of Appeals following a construction of a will by the highest court in the state where it was executed and a court of last resort following its decision in the same case. Illinois v. Illinois Central R. Co., 184 U. S. 77, 22 Sup. Ct. 300, 46 L. Ed. 440; United States v. Camou, 184 U. S. 572, 574, 22 Sup. Ct. 505, 46 L. Ed. 694; Great Western Telegraph Co. v. Burnham, 162 U. S. 343, 344, 16 Sup. Ct. 850, 40 L. Ed. 991.

To the first question propounded we accordingly answer that the former decision of the Court of Appeals has settled the law of the case to the extent to which the decision went; and it should be followed in this case, though in others the subsequent decision of the Supreme Court should be followed.

[2] 2. The next question is whether we will review and reverse the decisions in Chapman v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 88 Ga. 763, 15 S. E. 901, 17 L. R. A. 430, 30 Am. St. Rep. 183, Giddens v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 111 Ga. 824, 35 S. E. 638, Seifert v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 129 Ga. 181, 58 S. E. 699, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1149, 121 Am. St. Rep. 210, and Southern Bell Telephone

Co. v. Reynolds, 189 Ga. 385, 77 S. E. 888. As to the first two cases we are unanimously of the opinion that the decisions were right and should stand. As to the last two decisions, which were concurred in by the entire bench, our statute requires the concurrence of all of the Justices to reverse them. Civil Code 1910, § 6207. The entire bench does not concur in so doing, and they must remain of force.

It may be added that there are a number of authorities adverse to the decisions last cited, but the ruling does not stand unsupported. Lebanon, Louisville, etc., Tel. Co. v. Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Action by the Augusta Land Company against the Augusta Railway & Electric Company and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The Augusta Land Company brought its petition against the Augusta Railway & Electric Company and the Augusta-Aiken Railway & Electric Corporation to recover 10 acres of land known as "Lake View Park," with mesne profits. No equitable relief was prayed. The case came on to be heard before the court upon a general and special demurrer to the petition. The court below sustained the demurrer generally, and dismissed the suit. To this judgment the plaintiff excepted.

The petition alleges substantially:

The Augusta Railway & Electric Company and the Augusta-Aiken Railway & Electric Corporation (as the successor in title of the Augusta Railway & Electric Company) have been in possession of the land since July 17, 1896. On June 29, 1900, the Augusta Land Company executed to the Augusta Railway & Electric Company a warranty deed conveying the 10 acres in controversy in fee simple, without any condition or restriction. An agreement was entered into on August 8, 1895, between these two companies, whereby the railway company agreed to "build, equip, and operate an electric line of street cars from its then terminus, in Harrisburg, out Broad street to High street, thence on High street to Greene street, thence on Greene street to either Milledge street or Crawford avenue, at the election of your petitioner, to Broad street, where it should connect with the street car line thus extended; * * * that cars should be operated on said line (thus to be constructed) at intervals not exceeding 30 minutes, unless prevented by strikes, break-downs, or unavoidable accidents." It was agreed between the parties that, upon completion of the work and commencement of the operation of the cars, the plaintiff would convey the 10 acres of land now in controversy. The agreement also provided that "the conditions in said deed shall be as follows: The said tract of 10 acres shall be conveyed to the party of the second part to be used as a public park for white persons only, and to this end the party of the second part may improve said land in any manner it sees fit by buildings, landscape gardening, etc., and shall have full and entire control over the land and all improvements. The party of the second part shall pay all taxes and assessments of whatever kind upon said property, payable after the delivery of the deed, and shall remain in full control thereof so long as it continues to use and operate the said line of cars as heretofore agreed, or until it ceases to use said tract for the purposes of a public park, in either of which events said land shall at once revert to the party of the first part, and all possession and control of the party of the second part shall cease at once, except that it shall have the right and privilege of entering the same within one year of such reversion for the purpose of removing any building which it may have erected while in possession—such removals to be without injury to the land, and the land to be left in as good condition as when first entered by the party of the second part."

The deed did not contain any of the conditions, but was a warranty, fee-simple deed, without condition. The deed does contain, however, the following reference to the agreement: "Whereas, by agreement between the Augusta Land Company and the Augusta Railway Company, dated August 8, 1895, recorded in the office of the clerk of the superior court of said county, in Book YYYY, folio 552, the Augusta Land Company agreed, upon certain conditions, which have since been complied with, to convey to the said Augusta Railway Company certain land in said agreement described; and whereas, by deed dated March 21, 1896, recorded in said office in Book YYYY, folio 494, the said Augusta Railway Company transferred to Samuel M. Jarvis and Roland R. Conklin all its right, title, and interest in and to all the property mentioned in said agreement; and whereas, all the interest, right, and title of said Samuel M. Jarvis and Roland R. Conklin in and to all the ten lots mentioned in said agreement were duly transferred by Samuel M. Jarvis and Roland R. Conklin to D. B. Dyer, by instrument dated July 23, 1896, and recorded in said office in Book —, folio —; and whereas, to confirm and carry out said agreement, the Augusta Land Company issued a deed conveying the same ten lots to D. B. Dyer, dated February 4, 1899, recorded in Book MMMM, folio 343; and whereas, all the rights, title, and interest of Samuel M. Jarvis and Roland R. Conklin in and to the ten acres of land mentioned in said agreement was duly transferred by said Samuel M. Jarvis and Roland R. Conklin to the Augusta Railway & Electric Company by instrument dated July 23, 1896, and recorded in said office in Book AAAAA, folio 305; and whereas, it is necessary for the said Augusta Land Company to issue a deed to the said Augusta Railway & Electric Company to confirm and perfect the title as aforesaid: Now, therefore, this indenture, made this 29th day of June, 1900, between the Augusta Land Company, a corporation of said county and state, as party of the first part, and the Augusta Railway & Electric Company, of said county and state, party of the second part," etc.

It is alleged in the petition that the railway company constructed the lines as agreed upon, and operated them until the spring of 1902, when, after the deeds had been executed, the railway company tore up the rails and cross-ties, etc., which had been built under the contract of August 3, 1895, and ceased and abandoned the operation of street cars along the line of the streets as stipulated, and no other railroad tracks have been placed or located on the streets, and no cars have been operated at intervals of 30 minutes, or otherwise; that on May 24, 1911, the Augusta Railway & Electric Company entered into a written agreement with the Augusta-Aiken Railway & Electric Corporation, whereby it sold and conveyed to the latter company all of its railroad property, and all of its other property, including the 10 acres of land in controversy; that the property was conveyed subject to all valid liens, debts, obligations and liabilities of the Augusta Railway & Electric Company of every kind; that the tearing up of the tracks, and the discontinuance of the operation of cars, was a breach of the conditions subsequent which under the agreement of 1895 were to be incorporated in the deed, and the failure to do so was a fraud on the part of the defendant against the plaintiff, and by reason of the breach of the conditions in the agreement the land reverted to the plaintiff by the terms of the agreement.

The grounds of demurrer were that the petition does not set forth a cause of action, and that it appears on the face of the petition and exhibits attached thereto that the defendant and its predecessor in title have been in adverse possession of the land sued for under written evidence of title for over 7 years.

E. H. Callaway, of Augusta, for plaintiff in error. Boykin Wright, of Augusta, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above).

[1] 1. The controlling question to be determined is whether the agreement of August 3, 1895, was merged in the deed of June 29, 1900, and became functus officio when the deed was executed, and the rights of the parties are based alone upon the deed. Mr. Devlin, in his work on Real Estate, says: "The rule applicable to all contracts, that prior stipulations are merged in the final and formal contract executed by the parties, applies, of course, to a deed based upon a contract to convey. When a deed is delivered and accepted as performance of a contract to convey, the contract is merged in the deed. Though the terms of the deed may vary from those contained in the contract, still the deed must be looked to alone to determine the rights of the parties." 2 Devlin on Real Est. § 850a. In the case of Slocum v. Bracy, 55 Minn. 252, 56 N. W. 827, 43 Am. St. Rep. 499, 500, Mitchell, J., said: "No rule of law is better settled than that, where a deed has been executed and accepted as performance of an executory contract to convey real estate, the contract is functus officio, and the rights of the parties rest thereafter solely on the deed." The deed of June 29, 1900, purports to be the consummation of the agreement of August 3, 1895, and to convey the absolute title to the 10 acres of land in dispute, and the only reference to any conditions of the agreement is to "certain conditions, which have since been complied with." The deed then conveys the fee simple title to the land in dispute, without reference to any forfeiture or reversion. There is no recital in the deed that it was to be subject to whatever conditions the agreement provided should be incorporated in the deed. "After the execution of the deed, the grantee cannot, in the absence of actual fraud, recover for any misrepresentations relating to the title, not covered by the covenants of the deed, as the deed is considered to be a complete relinquishment of all conflicting claims in the preceding contract of sale." 2 Devlin on Real Estate, § 850a. In the case of Dunbar v. Aldrich, 79 Miss. 698, 31 South. 341, where a deed recited that it was the purpose of the grantor to give a life estate to the grantee, with remainder in fee to his children, but in the granting part of the deed a conveyance is made to the grantee and his heirs in fee simple, it was held that the granting part of the deed controls, and the grantee took an estate in fee simple. The court, speaking through Terral, J., said: "And especially is it a rule of interpretation of a deed that an intention manifested in the recitals of a conveyance will be controlled by the terms of the granting part of the deed."

Where there is a discrepancy between the recitals and the operative part of a deed, the operative part, if clear and unambiguous, must be followed. Elphinstone on the Interpretation of Deeds, *129. In St. Phillips Church v. Zion Church, 23 S. C. 297, the plaintiff had a lease on certain land for 99 years, perpetually renewable, to be used for the purposes of a Presbyterian church, reserving the right to re-enter in case the land was used for any other purpose whatever than the erection of a Presbyterian church. The lessee assigned the lease to the Glebe Street Presbyterian Church. Afterwards this corporation contracted to sell the land to certain trustees of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, and to execute a conveyance thereof on the payment of the purchase money, and in pursuance of which contract the trustees were put into possession. The plaintiff commenced suit to recover the premises, or to enjoin the defendant from executing a conveyance to the African Methodist Episcopal Church contrary to the conditions upon which the defendants held the property. It was held that the lease was merged in the conveyance, and that the grantees held the property freed from the conditions in the lease. The court said: "The recital does not qualify the deed in any particular. Its office was only to trace the history of the transaction, and to describe the relation of the parties in regard to the property and to each other, leading up to the grant, which was absolute in its terms. Deeds are to be taken most strongly against the grantors, and if the form of the conveyance is absolute, as here, nothing is to be taken as intended that is not plainly expressed in the deed."

In Cullen v. Sprigg, 83 Cal. 56, 23 Pac. 222, the trustees of a city adopted a resolution providing that certain lands should be granted upon the condition that the lands should be occupied and improved within 6 months from the date of the certificate; and if within a year therefrom improvements of a certain amount were not made, the lands should revert to the city. The deed to the defendant's grantor recited a sale made to him that day on the conditions of the resolution, and an agreement on his part to make the improvements; but these recitals preceded the granting clause, which together with the habendum, in consideration of the full receipt of the purchase money by the city, purported to vest in the grantee the full title of the city in fee simple, without condition. It was held that the grant was absolute. The court said (83 Cal. 64, 23 Pac. 225): "It is true that in the deeds to Evans which were made on the day of the sale, there is a recital of a sale upon the conditions prescribed in the resolution, and also of an agreement by Evans to complete all improvements required by them; but the granting part and habendum of the deed, in consideration of the full receipt of the purchase money by the city, purports to vest in the grantee the full title of the city, in fee simple absolute, without condition precedent or subsequent. To create a condition in a grant, apt and appropriate words must be appended to the grant, which ex vi termini import that the vesting or continuance of the estate is to depend upon the condition. Craig v. Wells, 11 N. Y. 320; Jackson v. McCallen, 8 Cow. [N. Y.] 296. An estate upon condition cannot be created by deed, except when the terms of the grant will admit of no other reasonable interpretation." In Webb v. Webb's Heirs, 29 Ala. 588, 606, the court said: "The granting clause determines the interest intended to be conveyed, and prevails over the introductory statement. Kershaw v. Boykin, 1 Brev. [S. C.] 301. This is not intended to disturb the well-settled rule that, if two clauses in a deed are so repugnant that they cannot stand together, the first prevails over the last." See Dickson v. Wildman, 183 Fed. 398, 105 C. C. A. 618.

It is a well-settled rule of construction that a deed will not be construed to create an estate upon condition, unless the language of the deed, according to the rules of law, or proprio vigore, imports a condition, or the intent of the grantor to make a conditional estate is otherwise clearly and unequivocally indicated. Thompson v. Hart, 133 Ga. 540, 543, 66 S. E. 270; 2 Devlin on Deeds, § 848. In Nelson v. Atlanta, &c., Ry. Co., 135 Ga. 572, 69 S. E. 1118, it was held: "A railroad company made to an owner of land lying near tracks used by it a written proposition to purchase a strip of such land 'on the following terms, covenants, and conditions,' setting out that the strip was to be used, in connection with other property, in a general plan for railroad terminals, and agreements as to erecting a wall, moving a public street, not using certain land for stated purposes, etc. It provided: 'The covenants and agreements herein stated to be incorporated in the deed to said property, so as to run with the land sold.' The proposition was accepted in writing. Later the purchaser assigned its rights to another company, and the seller on receipt of the purchase price made to such assignee a deed, in which were included the covenants and agreements of the contract. Held, that the contract was merged into the deed, and could not therefore be enforced against the original purchaser as containing personal covenants."

From the authorities, we conclude that the agreement of August 8, 1895, was merged in the deed of June 29, 1900, and became functus officio when the deed was executed, and the rights of the parties are based alone upon the deed.

[2] 2. But it is insisted that the president of the Augusta Land Company was without any corporate authority, or corporate action on the part of the land company, to execute the deed. The petition alleges that on June 29, 1900, "the then president of your petitioner, in the name of your petitioner, executed to said Augusta Railway & Electric Company a deed conveying the said 10 acres of land," etc. A copy of the deed itself is attached to the petition, and it is recited in the deed that the party of the first part (Augusta Land Company) "has caused its corporate seal to be affixed hereto." In Powell on Actions for Land, pp. 273, 274, § 221, the author says: "Wherever a deed purports to have been executed on behalf of a corporation by an official or executive agent of the company, and the corporate seal is affixed, the presumption is that the official or executive agent was authorized to execute the conveyance on behalf of the corporation." To the same effect, see Carr v. Ga. Loan &c. Co., 108 Ga. 757 (3), 33 S. E. 190; Nelson v. Spence, 129 Ga. 36 (5), 58 S. E. 697; Taylor v. Hartsfield, 134 Ga. 479, 68 S. E. 70. There was no effort on the part of the Augusta Land Company to repudiate the act of its president in signing the deed, so far as the record discloses, and the rule is that, if the principal has notice of an unauthorized act of another in his behalf, he must repudiate the act within a reasonable time, or he will be deemed to have ratified it. Mechem on Agency, § 153 et seq.; 31 Cyc. 1275; Whitley v. James, 121 Ga. 521, 49 S. E. 600. And the above rule applies to a case where the principal is a corporation, as well as to a case where the principal is an individual. Gold Mining Co. v. National Bank, 96 U. S. 640, 24 L. Ed. 648; Mechem on Agency, § 158; 2 Thompson on Corp. (2d Ed.) § 2019.

The plaintiff allowed the defendant's predecessor to construct tracks and operate cars through the property, and to remain in possession of the property in dispute for a number of years, without any effort to repudiate the act of the plaintiff's agent in executing the deed, until the commencement of this suit, and received whatever benefits accrued to it by reason of the building and operation of the car lines as set out in the petition. The petition alleges no facts which would excuse the plaintiff for a failure to bring suit earlier. There is no explanation as to why the plaintiff did not know, or could not have known by the exercise of ordinary care, that the deed had been executed. With the deed signed by the president of the company outstanding, and with the defendant company building a line of railroad on and through the property of the plaintiff, it is hardly conceivable that the plaintiff did not know of the existence of the deed and how it was signed. If the plaintiff had knowledge of the execution of the deed, and took no steps to repudiate it, although the defendant was in possession under it, it is bound by it; if it had no knowledge of the execution of it at the time, but since its execution it has by its acts ratified the execution of the deed, it is bound by its terms. The deed was absolute on its face, and no conditions in the agreement were incorporated in the deed; and this being true, there could be no right of reverter in a case of this kind. Whatever conditions were embraced in the agreement were merged in the absolute deed, which contained no conditions.

[3] It follows from what has been said, and from the authorities cited, that the defendant has a good title to the premises in dispute, and the court below did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the petition.

GEORGIA & F. RY. v. NEWTON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 12 1913.)

1. NEGLIGENCE (§ 101*)—TRIAL (§ 253*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where, on the trial of a suit against a railroad company, to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been tortiously committed by the company on the person and property of the plaintiff while crossing the railroad tracks of the former at a public street crossing, there was evidence tending to show that both the plaintiff and the defendant were negligent at the time of the injury, and where it further appears that the court in its general charge failed to instruct the jury relatively to the plaintiff's right to recover where his own negligence equals or exceeds that of the defendant, it was reversible error to refuse a written request to charge the jury as follows: "If, however, you believe that the railroad employes were negligent to some extent, and you also believe that the plaintiff was negligent to an equal or greater extent, the plaintiff cannot recover in this case, and your verdict should be for the defendant."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 85, 163, 164; Dec. Dig. § 101; Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 613-623; Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 261*)—REFUSAL OF INSTRUCTIONS—ERRONEOUS REQUESTS.

It is not error to refuse a request to give to the jury a charge which does not accurately state a correct principle of law.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 170, 179*)—REFUSAL OF INSTRUCTIONS—PRESENTATION BELOW—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTE.

Grounds as to the unconstitutionality of an act of the Legislature, which are the basis of exceptions, must be urged upon the trial, and the court must pass upon them, before error can be assigned and the questions considered by the Supreme Court.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 728*)—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

An assignment of error upon the admission of testimony, which does not state what objection was made thereto when it was offered, nor set out literally or in substance the evidence objected to, will not be considered by the Supreme Court.

5. RAILROADS (§ 817*)—CROSSING ACCIDENT—RIGHT OF RECOVERY.

The petition was sufficient to withstand the demurrer filed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1009; Dec. Dig. § 817.*]

Error from Superior Court, Jenkins County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Action by B. L. Newton against the Georgia & Florida Railway. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Dixon & Dixon, of Millen, F. H. Saffold, of Swainsboro, and W. H. Barrett, of Augusta, for plaintiff in error. E. K. Overstreet, of Sylvania, and A. S. Anderson, of Millen, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. The plaintiff in the court below brought suit against the defendant for damages resulting from injuries alleged to have been sustained by being struck by one of defendant's engines and cars while crossing the railroad tracks of the defendant at a public street crossing in the city of Millen. The petition alleged, among other things, substantially as follows: At and before crossing the railroad tracks of the defendant the plaintiff looked in the direction from which the train of defendant was coming, and could see no light or cars, nor did he hear the bell or whistle. He was riding on the rear of a two-horse wagon drawn by two mules and driven by a negro man. The train which passes the crossing at which the injury occurred was 20 minutes late on the day of the injury, and the plaintiff thought it had gone; but he looked in both directions before going on the track. It was about dark, and he could not see an object at any distance. The train was about a car length from him when he first saw it, and was running at a high rate of speed, which he estimated to be about 25 or 30 miles an hour, and in excess of the rate prescribed by the ordinance of the city of Millen, and it was impossible for him to have avoided being struck by the engine. The mules became frightened, and turned quickly up the track in the direction the train was going. The engine struck the wheels of the wagon and one of the mules. The rear of the wagon in which he was sitting was pulled towards the train, and plaintiff attempted to leap from it, but was jerked under the car behind the engine, which ran over his foot, necessitating its amputation. The defendant filed an answer, denying the allegations of negligence on its part, and averring that the alleged injury to the plaintiff was caused by his own negligence in attempting to cross the railroad track in front of a moving train, which he saw or heard, or by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence could have heard or seen, before attempting to cross. A demurrer to the petition was overruled, and to this ruling the defendant filed exceptions pendente lite. On the trial there was evidence tending to support the respective contentions of the parties. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and, the defendant's motion for a new trial having been overruled, it excepted.

[1] 1. Error is assigned because the court refused a written request to give in charge to the jury the following: "If, however, you believe that the railroad employes were negligent to some extent, and you also believe that the plaintiff was negligent to an equal or greater extent, the plaintiff cannot recover in this case, and your verdict should be for the defendant." The court erred in not giving this instruction. There was evidence tending to show that the defendant was negligent in having no headlight, in not ringing the bell, and in running at a high rate of speed, etc. There was also evidence tending to show that the plaintiff, or his servant, who was driving, was guilty of contributory negligence at the time of the injury. There was nothing in the general charge of the court to cover the request as presented by the defendant. This court has held that, where the injury complained of was the result of mutual negligence by the plaintiff's servant and the defendant, there can be no recovery unless the servant was less in fault than the defendant. Central Railroad Co. v. Newman, 94 Ga. 564, 21 S. E. 219; So. Ry. Co. v. Watson, 104 Ga. 243, 247, 30 S. E. 818. This is the law in this state, as we understand it; and the request to charge being substantially a correct statement of the rule, and being authorized under the facts of this case, it was reversible error to decline to give it, where a proper request therefor had been made. See Civil Code, §§ 2781, 6084.

[2] 2. Complaint is made because of the refusal of the court to give the following instruction to the jury, duly requested in writing: "If you believe that the railroad employes were guilty of negligence caused the injury to plaintiff, and you believe that plaintiff could not have avoided the injury to himself by the exercise of ordinary diligence on his part, and you believe that plaintiff was not guilty of as great amount of diligence as were the employes of the railroad, but you also believe that plaintiff was guilty of some negligence, then it is your duty to decrease the amount of the recovery to which plaintiff in this case would be entitled to by an amount proportionate to the extent which plaintiff's negligence bears to the negligence of the employes of the railroad." We must treat this request as having been presented to the trial judge in the language above quoted, which is copied from the seventh ground of the motion for a new trial. The request is also set out in the brief for plaintiff in error, and there it is repeated: "And you also believe that plaintiff was not guilty of as great an amount of diligence," etc. It may be that counsel intended to use the word "negligence," instead of "diligence"; but there is no suggestion either in the record or the briefs of counsel that the charge as set forth in the motion for a new trial is not in the language requested. It is also confusing in other respects, and, as it stands, of course, does not accurately state a principle of law; and the court was justified in declining to give it in charge to the jury.

[3] 3. Complaint is also made because the court refused a written request to instruct the jury that section 2675 of the Civil Code (commonly known as the blow-post law) was unconstitutional; also, because he declined to instruct them: "I charge you further that the latter part of said section, to wit, 'and to simultaneously check and keep checking the speed thereof, so as to stop in time should any person or thing be crossing the track on said road,' is not the law of Georgia, and is invalid and not binding on said defendant, and that the same is unconstitutional." Several reasons were assigned in the motion for a new trial why the section in question, as a whole, and the portion above quoted, were repugnant to the clause of the federal Constitution giving to Congress the power to regulate commerce. It does not appear from the assignments of error, however, that at the time of tendering the requests to charge, or at any time during the progress of the trial, any reason was urged before the court why the law in question was unconstitutional, or what provision of the Constitution it was contended it was in violation of. The request was for the court to charge broadly that the law was unconstitutional, without giving or urging at the time any reason why it was so. Grounds as to the unconstitutionality of an act of the Legislature, which are the basis of exceptions, must be urged upon the trial, and the court must pass upon them, before error can be assigned and the question considered by the Supreme Court. Brown v. State, 114 Ga. 60 (2), 39 S. E. 873; Griggs v. State, 130 Ga. 16, 60 S. E. 103; Anderson v. State, 2 Ga. App. 1, 58 S. E. 401.

The ruling here made disposes of the tenth and eleventh grounds of the motion for new trial, which complain that the headlight law is not a valid law.

[4] 4. Complaint is made because the court refused "to rule out all of the evidence introduced in reference to an electric headlight or the failure to have an electric headlight on the locomotive." This court has repeatedly ruled that an assignment of error upon the admission of testimony, which does not state what objection was made thereto when offered, nor set out literally or in substance the evidence referred to, is without merit and cannot be considered. Wright v. Roberts, 116 Ga. 194 (4), 42 S. E. 369; Pearson v. Brown, 105 Ga. 802, 31 S. E. 746; Tompkins v. Compton, 97 Ga. 375, 23 S. E. 339; Willingham v. Sterling Cycle Works, 113 Ga. 953, 39 S. E. 314; Somers v. State, 116 Ga. 535, 42 S. E. 779; 1 Mich. Dig. Ga. R. 636, 637; 13 Mich. Dig. Ga. R. 134 (11).

[5] 5. The court did not err in overruling the demurrer to the petition.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

ROWE v. SPENCER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 14, 1918.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

SALES (§ 472*)—CONDITIONAL SALES—PURCHASE FROM BUYER—TITLE ACQUIRED.

Spencer and Humphrey entered into an agreement, by the terms of which Spencer was to sell to Humphrey a certain pair of mules at a given price, a specified part of which Humphrey was to pay in cash, and for the balance he was to give his two promissory notes, with his father as surety, to Spencer in equal amounts, maturing at designated times. The notes were to contain a stipulation that title to the mules was to remain in Spencer until the notes should be fully paid. The notes were prepared in accordance with the agreement; but as no official was present to attest their execution, and as Humphrey's father was not present, it was agreed that Humphrey should take them to the county where he said he resided, and there execute them, with his father as surety, in the presence of an officer, and return them by mail to Spencer. At the time of this transaction Humphrey made the cash payment and Spencer delivered to him the possession of the mules. Subsequently, and on the same day, Humphrey traded the mules to Rowe for a fair consideration, which he received from Rowe at the time, and delivered to him the mules. Rowe at the time had no notice of the agreement between Spencer and Humphrey. The notes were executed by Humphrey the next morning before a notary public, who officially attested them, and they were delivered to Spencer that day; Humphrey's father not having signed them. Three or four days thereafter Spencer informed Rowe of the agreement between Humphrey and Spencer, and of the latter's claim of title to the mules, and Rowe a short time afterwards disposed of them to his own use. The notes were recorded within less than 30 days after their execution. Held, that Rowe, as against Spencer, obtained no title to the mules.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 1366-1376; Dec. Dig. § 472.*]

Lumpkin, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Gwinnett County; Robt. T. Daniel, Judge.

Action by E. A. Spencer against W. H. Rowe. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Spencer brought trover against Rowe. There was a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant was refused a new trial, and he excepted.

The testimony of the plaintiff was as follows: On June 19, 1906, he agreed to sell the mules in controversy to one Humphrey for the price of $450, of which the sum of $100 was to be paid cash, and for the balance Humphrey was to give Spencer two promissory notes, each for $175, payable respectively September 1 and November 1, 1906. Title to the mules was to be retained by Spencer until the entire purchase price should be paid. This agreement was entered into at Flowery Branch, Hall county, this state. At that place and on the day of the agreement two promissory notes were written or filled out, embodying all the terms of the agreement, as to date, times of payment, and amounts to be paid; and each note contained the following stipulation: "This note having been given to said E. A. Spencer, as per contract, for two black mare mules, named Mame and Maud, it is hereby agreed that the ownership of title to said mules shall remain to said E. A. Spencer until this note is fully paid." Humphrey made the cash payment. The notes were written out in accordance with the agreement at Flowery Branch, where the plaintiff was engaged in business, and where the transaction took place. As no officer was there to witness Humphrey's signature to the notes, and as his father lived at Buford, Gwinnett county, where plaintiff was informed by Humphrey he also resided, it was agreed between plaintiff and Humphrey that the latter should take the notes to Buford, where he, and his father, as surety, would execute them in the presence of an officer, and that Humphrey would then return them by mail to plaintiff. In accordance with this agreement, the notes were given to Humphrey for the purpose just stated, and plaintiff also delivered to him the possession of the mules. Humphrey left Flowery Branch, with the notes and the mules in his possession, about noon on June 19, 1906. The next day plaintiff received the notes by mail, which appeared to have been signed by Humphrey in the presence of a notary public, but had not been signed by Humphrey's father. Within two or three days thereafter, the plaintiff went to Buford to investigate the matter, and ascertained that Humphrey had sold the mules to the defendant, Rowe. Plaintiff thereupon exhibited to the defendant Humphrey's notes, and at the same time informed the defendant that title to the mules was in him, the plaintiff. The notes were put in evidence by the plaintiff. They were dated June 19, 1906, and contained a reservation of title to the mules in Spencer. They appeared to have been executed by Humphrey in the presence of a notary public, and were filed for record and recorded in Gwinnett county on July 14, 1906. They were not signed by Humphrey's father.

The notary testified that Humphrey signed the notes in his presence in Buford. He could not remember the date, but did remember that the notes were executed "late one evening or early one morning," as he recalled that he had to take them to the front of the store in order to get sufficient light to write his signature. He further testified: "Charlie Humphrey was driving a pair of gray ponies at the time. Mr. Rowe had previously had these ponies in his possession. * * * I had never seen Humphrey driving these ponies before this time."

The defendant admitted in his answer that he purchased the mules in controversy from Humphrey on June 19, 1906; and his testimony was to the following effect: He gave Humphrey, in exchange for the mules, a pair of ponies, a set of harness, a buggy pole, and $100 in cash, all being of the value of $425. He traded with Humphrey for the mules about 8:20 o'clock p. m., Eastern time, which was an hour, or an hour and a half, before sunset. At the time of this trade, he did not know from whom Humphrey had bought the mules, and had no notice of the contract of sale between Humphrey and Spencer. Humphrey never drove the ponies given him in exchange for the mules until the day following this trade. Witness sold the mules a short time after he learned that plaintiff claimed title to them, and before this action was brought.

J. A. Perry, of Lawrenceville, and J. V. Poole, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. L. L. Okes, of Lawrenceville, and E. O. Dobbs, of Buford, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). "Whenever personal property is sold and delivered with a condition affixed to the sale that the title thereto is to remain in the vendor of such personal property until the purchase price thereof shall have been paid, every such conditional sale, in order for the reservation of title to be valid as against third parties, shall be evidenced in writing, and not otherwise. And the written contract of every such conditional sale shall be executed and attested in the same manner as mortgages on personal property; as between the parties themselves, the contract as made by them shall be valid and may be enforced, whether evidenced in writing or not." Civil Code, § 3318. "Conditional bills of sale must be recorded within thirty days from their date, and in other respects shall be governed by the laws relating to the registration of mortgages." Id. § 3319. Mortgages on personal property must be executed in the presence of, and attested by, or proved before, a notary public or judge of any court in this state, or a clerk of the superior court, and recorded. Id. § 3257. A mortgage on personality must be recorded in the county where the mortgagor resided at the time of its execution, if a resident of this state. Id. § 3259. According to the undisputed evidence, all the requirements of the above-quoted sections of the Code were complied with, relatively to the notes given by Humphrey to the plaintiff for the balance of the purchase price of the mules bought by Humphrey from the plaintiff, there being in the notes a condition that the title to the mules should remain in the plaintiff until the notes should be fully paid. The notes were, of course, in writing; they were executed in the presence of and attested by a notary public, and were recorded within less than 30 days from the date of their execution. There was, moreover, ample evidence to sustain a finding that the notes were recorded in the county where Humphrey resided at the time of their execution, which the jury necessarily found to be true in rendering a verdict for the plaintiff; the court having properly instructed them on this point. There were some circumstances testified to by the defendant himself, which seemingly might have authorized the jury to find that at the time he traded for the mules he had notice sufficient to excite attention, and to put him on inquiry as to Humphrey's title to them, or as to who had legal title, and that such inquiry would probably have developed the fact that the title was in the plaintiff; but in the view we take of the case we have not deemed it necessary to set forth such circumstances.

Aside from the matter just referred to, and considering the evidence from the viewpoint most favorable to the defendant, how stands the case? This way: Defendant traded with Humphrey for the mules on the same day the latter contracted to purchase them from the plaintiff, and within a few hours after that transaction. At the time of his trade with Humphrey the defendant had notice of the plaintiff's title to the mules, and the property given by defendant in exchange for them amounted to a fair price. The agreement between the plaintiff and Humphrey, or rather so much thereof as remained to be executed, had been reduced to writing, in the form of the two notes, which written agreement Humphrey had in his possession at the time he traded the mules to the defendant, which possession was for the purpose, and in pursuance of the agreement with the plaintiff, of executing them before an officer, and thereafter returning them by mail to the plaintiff. At the same time Humphrey had possession of the mules, also with the consent of the plaintiff, as Humphrey was taking the notes for the balance of the purchase price to Gwinnett county to be properly executed by him and his father as surety, and to be returned to the plaintiff. The notes were duly executed by Humphrey alone early the next morning after the trade between defendant and Humphrey, and were received that same day by the plaintiff, and were recorded within less than 30 days after their execution.

Taking all this to be true, did the defendant obtain a valid title to the mules, or one superior to that of the plaintiff? The view of the case just presented does not show a case where a vendor sold and delivered personalty under an agreement, entered into at the time of the sale and delivery of the property, that the vendee would, at a time subsequent to the completion of the sale, execute and deliver to the vendor a note for the purchase price of the personalty with a condition that the title to the personalty should remain in the vendor until the note should be paid. In section 3318 of the Civil Code, where personalty is sold and delivered with a condition affixed to the sale that the title to the property is to remain in the vendor until the purchase price thereof shall have been paid, in order for the reservation of title to be valid against third parties it must be in writing and the contract executed and attested as the statute requires in cases of chattel mortgages, and recorded within 30 days after the date of the sale. This statute contemplates a sale and delivery of the property in pursuance thereof. The general rule is: "Where the buyer is by the contract bound to do anything as a condition, either precedent or concurrent, on which the passing of the property depends, the property will not pass until the condition be fulfilled, even though the goods may have been actually delivered into the possession of the buyer." 1 Benjamin on Sales (6th Am. Ed.) § 366, p. 359.

This principle has been recognized by this court in several cases, wherein it was announced that "if personal chattels be sold upon the express condition that they are to be paid for on delivery, and they are delivered upon the faith that the condition will be immediately performed, and performance is refused upon demand in a reasonable time, no title passes to the buyer." Bergan v. Magnus, 98 Ga. 514, 516, 25 S. E. 570; Wilson v. Comer, 125 Ga. 500, 54 S. E. 355, 114 Am. St. Rep. 245; Susong v. McKenna, 126 Ga. 433, 55 S. E. 236; Starnes v. Roberts, 128 Ga. 718, 58 S. E. 348; Walker v. O'Neill Mfg. Co., 128 Ga. 831, 58 S. E. 475. In these cases, however, the action was by the vendor against the vendee, and the interest of a third person was not involved, except in Bergan v. Magnus, where the contest was between the vendor and an attaching creditor of the vendee, it not appearing, however, that the vendee had obtained possession of the goods with the consent of the vendor, and in Walker v. O'Neill Mfg. Co., where the contest was between two parties each claiming to have purchased the article in controversy from the same vendor. In Wheeler & Wilson Mfg. Co. v. Bank, 105 Ga. 57, 31 S. E. 48, it was held: "Where a purchaser agrees to pay for goods on delivery, either in cash at a named discount or by note due in six months, the contract of sale is conditional, and the payment of the cash or the giving of the note is a condition precedent to the passing of title. Where, however, the goods are delivered by the seller and left for some time in the possession of the purchaser, no steps for their reclamation being taken by the seller, and the purchaser mortgages them to an innocent third party, such conduct may amount to a waiver of the condition and operate to pass the title to the goods into the purchaser." It was there further held: "Even if, in this case, the condition was not waived, still, under the provisions of our Code, the reservation of title was not valid as against a third party without notice; the conditional contract of sale having been neither executed and attested nor recorded as provided by law." In that case the contest was between the vendor and the subsequent innocent mortgagee. In the opinion it was said: "An absolute and unconditional delivery of the goods may waive the reservation of title, and a vendor cannot rely upon his reservation of title as against innocent third persons, where they have been injured by his waiting an unreasonable length of time, after breach of the condition precedent, before taking any steps to reclaim his goods."

It is obvious that the first ruling made in that case necessarily carries with it the implication that, had the vendor taken steps to reclaim his goods within a reasonable time after breach of the condition precedent, there would have been no waiver of his title, even as against an innocent mortgagee to whom the goods may have been mortgaged by the purchaser prior to any move taken by the seller for the reclamation of the goods. The second ruling expressly held that where a purchaser agrees to pay for goods on delivery, either in cash or by note maturing at a given time, such transaction falls within the provisions of Civil Code, § 3318, as to conditional sales. In Penland v. Cathey, 110 Ga. 431, 35 S. E. 659, it was said: "The evidence in the record makes a clear case of such a conditional sale of personal property as is contemplated in section 2776 [now 3318] of the Civil Code. The property sold and the price to be paid were ascertained and determined; there was no act of the vendee to be performed before the sale was completed; and the delivery was unconditional." The language, "there was no act of the vendee to be performed before the sale was completed," implies, of course, that, had there been some act of the vendee to be performed before, then the transaction would not have been such a conditional sale of personal property as is contemplated by the section of the Code referred to.

Even if none of the cases to which we have referred is in principle controlling, when applied to the facts of the case now in hand, under its own facts, the plaintiff's title was superior to any rights of the defendant obtained by the trade he made with Humphrey. This is true, for the reason that at the time the defendant traded with Humphrey the contract between the plaintiff and Humphrey rested in fieri, as one of the essential acts to be done by Humphrey in order to complete the contract between him and the plaintiff remained unperformed; that is, the proper execution of his notes for the balance of the purchase price of the mules and the delivery of the notes to the plaintiff. According to the agreement between plaintiff and Humphrey, this most important act was to be done as a part of the contract for the purchase of the mules by Humphrey, before there should be a complete sale; and under the evidence it was clearly the intention of both Humphrey and the plaintiff that this act should be performed by Humphrey at once or presently. The only reason that it was not done at the time the notes were written, according to the undisputed evidence, was that there was no officer before whom the notes could be executed in accordance with the statute. Moreover, they were executed early the next morning and on the same date returned to the plaintiff. There was no delay in the execution and return of the notes, no laches on the part of the plaintiff, and we are decidedly confident that the defendant did not obtain a valid title to the mules by his trade with Humphrey, made during what we may call the making of the contract for the sale of the mules by the plaintiff to Humphrey, although the latter was in possession of the mules under the circumstances stated at the time he traded them to the defendant.

Counsel for plaintiff in error strongly relies upon the case of Harp v. Patapsco Guano Co., 99 Ga. 752, 27 S. E. 181. That case, however, is not binding authority for anything contrary to what we have here ruled, and for two reasons, namely: (1) Only two justices participated in the decision; and (2) whatever was said in the opinion contrary to our ruling here was purely obiter. Moreover, the facts of that case were essentially different from those in the case now in hand. The judgment there under review by this court was the overruling of a certiorari by the judge of the superior court; the case having been originally tried before a jury in a magistrate's court. We make the following quotations from the opinion in that case: "An execution in favor of the Patapsco Guano Company against Gouch, founded on a judgment rendered February 9, 1895, was, on October 15th of that year, levied upon the mule, which was claimed by Harp. * * * From the evidence as set forth in the magistrate's answer, it appears that Gouch bought the mule from Harp in January, 1895, under a parol contract, by the terms of which the title was to remain in Harp until the mule was paid for, and the mule was immediately delivered to Gouch in pursuance of this contract. So far as can be gathered from the answer to the certiorari [which was not traversed] the trade between Harp and Gouch was complete when the delivery of the mule took place. It does appear, as an independent fact, that Gouch subsequently [May 23, 1895, some four months after his parol contract with Harp] executed and delivered to Harp a promissory note for the purchase money of the mule, reciting that Harp had reserved the title; * * * but the evidence, as reported by the magistrate, contains no intimation that the note and mortgage were given in pursuance of any agreement or stipulation made at the time of the sale, and therefore constituting a part of the original contract. The petition for certiorari does so allege; but, in this respect, it is not verified by the answer. * * * Under the facts set out in the magistrate's answer, which must control our decision in the case, it seems clear that the contract of sale between Harp and Gouch was * * * complete on the day the latter took the mule into his possession, without reference to the subsequent execution and delivery of the note and mortgage. In this view, it is obvious that the parol reservation of title in Harp amounted to nothing, as affecting the rights of third persons." Even on the theory set up in the petition, which was not verified by the answer of the magistrate, there was no written agreement at the time of the transaction between Harp and Gouch that the title to the mule should remain in Harp, and no such agreement was executed for some four months after such transaction, and it does not appear that it was attested by an officer and recorded. In the case at bar, the terms of the contract for sale were reduced to writing, in the form of the two notes, at the time the contract was entered into, and were made an essential part thereof, which notes were to be presently executed, as is necessarily inferable from the undisputed evidence of Spencer.

We have not overlooked the case of Schofield v. Woodward, 137 Ga. 65, 72 S. E. 509, wherein it was held: "Where one sells and delivers personalty to a contractor, and retains title thereto, but before the writing evidencing the contract retaining title in the seller is recorded or executed the contractor uses the personalty in the permanent improvement of the real estate of another, the seller cannot recover such personalty from the latter. This is true, though the contract between the owner of the real estate and the contractor for the improvement of the former's property has not been completed, and though the real estate owner has not paid the contractor the full contract price for the improvement of the property, at the time the contract retaining title to the property in the seller is recorded." This ruling rests upon the principle that the material sold to the contractor was evidently intended by both parties to the sale to be used in the erection of a building, and, after being so used, it became a part of the realty, and could not be recovered as personalty.

This opinion sufficiently covers the grounds of the motion for new trial and renders it unnecessary to specifically deal with them.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except

LUMPKIN, J. (dissenting). I am unable to concur in the decision in this case. By Civil Code, § 3318, it is required that, to render a reservation of title effectual against third persons, the contract must be in writing and properly attested. To hold that a delivery under a sale of personalty could be made by the seller to the purchaser, with an agreement on the part of the latter to go to another town and execute a note and obtain a surety thereon, and that a day's interval could elapse, and the seller could still retain title as against a third party acting in good faith and without notice, would be to destroy the very purpose of the statute. This is not the case of a seller who does not make a complete delivery. He made delivery, not for examination, or the like, or on any agreement that the buyer should hold as a bailee until execution of the written contract, but in pursuance of the contract of sale. The seller merely delivered the property to the purchaser and trusted to the latter to execute and return a proper written contract. If the decision should be rested on the theory of a parol agreement that title should not pass, it would be in the teeth of the statute. If it should be rested on the idea of allowing the purchaser a reasonable time to execute and return the note, what is a reasonable time? Does each case stand on its own facts? Suppose the desired security were out of the way, would the title be in suspense till his return, or a reasonable time to seek to procure his signature? Or if the purchaser should be taken sick, would he have a reasonable time to get well? And in the meantime would the public take the chance, in case of buying the property?

The fact that no security was in fact obtained in this case makes no difference. The purchaser was allowed time in which to endeavor to obtain one. Under the old law, title could be reserved by parol, though the property was delivered to the purchaser. The great frauds and dangers accruing against a purchaser from one clothed with the apparent title caused the enactment of the law embodied in the section of the Code above cited. To hold it subject to parol agreements, or the lapse of a reasonable time after delivery, would soon destroy the purpose of the law. The statute is clear, simple, and imperative. If, instead of following it, a seller delivers possession to the purchaser and allows the latter to carry the property away, on a promise to execute and return a contract later, he takes the chances. His plain right is not to deliver the property until the statutory contract is executed. Whether the reasoning in Harp v. Patapsco Guano Co., 99 Ga. 752, 27 S. E. 181, was absolutely necessary to the decision or not, it is strong, sound, and not easily answered. See, also, Brundage v. Camp, 21 Ill. 330.

The analogy sought to be drawn between this case and those involving sales for cash is not good. The present case rests on a mandatory statute. Where a statute requires a contract to be reduced to writing and executed in a certain way, a parol agreement to do it in that way is not a compliance with the statute. Without our statute, the decision of the majority of the court would be right. With such statute, I think the decision is wrong. An unexecuted writing is no compliance with the statute.

FLEMISTER v. CENTRAL GEORGIA POWER CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 14, 1913.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 302*)—PRESENTATION BELOW—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

Under former rulings of this court, where a ground of a motion for a new trial complains that the court refused to allow a witness for the movant to answer a certain question, this does not raise a question which can be considered by the Supreme Court, unless it appears that counsel for the complaining party stated to the court what answer he expected to elicit from the witness; and it is not alone sufficient to state in the motion for a new trial that he in fact expected to prove certain things by the witness.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 543*)—COMPETENCY OF EXPERT.

Where proceedings were taken by a company for the purpose of condemning land for use as a reservoir in connection with the production and furnishing of electricity to the public, a witness was qualified to be examined as an expert, after testifying that he was in the electric lighting business, and was to some extent acquainted with the operation of an electric plant and the value of water powers, that he had been general manager of a company doing an electric lighting business, having its place of business located on the same river which flowed past the condemnee's land, that he formerly looked after the business, construction, and installation, and was afterward secretary and treasurer of the company, having been connected with it for seven years at the time of the trial, and that he had some familiarity with water powers on the river involved in the case, and had seen the shoals on the land of the condemnee sought to be condemned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2356½-2358; Dec. Dig. § 543.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 543*) — COMPETENCY OF EXPERT.

A witness who testified that he had charge of a city light and water plant, but that he was not familiar with the use of water power for electric purposes, that he had some idea of the method by which water power was utilized, but he knew very little about hydraulic engineering, and that he had never bought or sold a water power, or constructed a power plant or dam, did not thereby qualify himself to testify as an expert in regard to the value of an alleged water power on land sought to be condemned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2356½-2358; Dec. Dig. § 543.*]

4. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 202*) — CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS—EVIDENCE.

The question being as to what was the market value of the property sought to be condemned, including therein any value arising from a water power located upon it, there was no error in rejecting the evidence of a witness that, "assuming a market for that power within three miles of this place, a fair value of that undeveloped water power, with the privilege of raising the water five feet, it ought to pay interest on a valuation of $5,000 or $5,500."

5. EVIDENCE (§ 363*)—ADMISSIBILITY—BOOKS.

Books of science or art are not admissible in evidence to prove the opinions of experts announced in them.

(a) From the meager statements in the grounds of the motion for a new trial in regard to questions put to the witness on cross-examination touching matters contained in a book, it is not clear whether the rulings of the court are so erroneous and injurious as to require a new trial.

6. EVIDENCE (§§ 142, 558*)—EXPERTS—CONDEMNATION—VALUE—OTHER PROPERTY.

On the trial of an appeal from the award of assessors, in determining the value of land sought to be condemned, it is competent to introduce evidence of sales of similar property to that in question, made at or near the time of the taking.

(a) Where, in such a case, a witness had testified that the land sought to be condemned was worth from $100 to $125 per acre, it was too general a question, on cross-examination, to ask him, without more: "You know where this [designated] place is that sold at $4 an acre, right down there next to you?"

7. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 202*)—PROCEEDINGS—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

Where a notice of an intention to condemn certain property showed that it included the right to back water on land on which there was a shoal, and, on the trial in the superior court of the appeal from the award of assessors, the condemnor introduced evidence generally as to the value of the land sought to be condemned, but not referring specially to whether the shoal had any value for furnishing water power, and the condemnee introduced evidence as to general value, and also for the purpose of proving that the shoal was valuable as an undeveloped water power, whereupon the condemnor in rebuttal offered evidence, by depositions previously taken, tending to prove that the shoal had no value for that purpose, there was no error in admitting such evidence.

8. TRIAL (§ 240*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

The elements which are proper for consideration in determining the value of land condemned for use as a reservoir are discussed in Central Georgia Power Co. v. Mays, 137 Ga. 120, 72 S. E. 900, Central Georgia Power Co. v. Preston, 137 Ga. 348, 72 S. E. 505, and Central Georgia Power Co. v. Stone, 139 Ga. 416, 77 S. E. 535.

(a) A request to charge, though based upon a discussion in the opinion of a court of last resort, should not be argumentative.

9. EMINENT DOMAIN (§§ 96, 98, 222*) — INSTRUCTION—SPECIAL DAMAGES.

In a proceeding to condemn land for use as part of a reservoir, if there is evidence tending to show that the property taken would include much of the lowlands and valleys of the condemnee's farm, and that this would destroy the general unity of the farm, and thus depreciate the market value of the part not taken, this would be a legitimate subject for consideration in determining the amount of consequential damages.

(a) Where there is evidence tending to show that the raising of the level of the water in the river alongside the place of the condemnee will prevent the drainage of the part of the bottom lands of the condemnee not taken, and will cause them to be filled with sand, and destroy their value, this furnishes a legitimate subject for consideration by the jury; and a proper requested instruction, based on such evidence, should be given in charge, where the charge as given refers only in general terms to consequential damages to the land not taken, without reference to such specific elements of damages.

(b) The trial court is not required, upon request, to substantially repeat general principles of law already given in charge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 245-249, 252-255, 562-567; Dec. Dig. §§ 96, 98, 222.*]

10. EMINENT DOMAIN (§§ 95, 222*)—CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS—DAMAGES RECOVERABLE—INSTRUCTIONS.

In determining the consequential damages, if any, to parts of the property not taken, the jury are not confined to damages proximately caused by the mere taking; but they should consider any evidence, if there be such, tending to show whether the legitimate use of the property taken, for the purpose for which the condemnation is made, will cause damage to the remainder of the property, lessening its market value.

(a) The charge on the subject of consequential damages was too restricted.

11. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 224*)—NEW TRIAL—GROUND—INVITED ERROR.

In view of the requests to charge tendered by counsel for the condemnee, including one to the effect that as to the property taken the actual cash market value should be allowed, the charge which the court gave on that subject furnishes no ground for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 574-579; Dec. Dig. § 224.*]

12. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 222*) — CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS—INSTRUCTIONS.

In the absence of evidence tending to show that the use of the land condemned and taken as a part of a pond would render the remainder of the land unhealthy and thereby decrease its market value, or of any claim to that effect made before the jury, it would have been better to omit the precautionary charge given on that subject.

13. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

None of the other grounds of the motion for a new trial require a reversal.

Error from Superior Court, Newton County; Price Edwards, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the Central Georgia Power Company against E. O. Flemister. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Hatcher & Smith, of Macon, and Greene F. Johnson, of Monticello, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. The Central Georgia Power Company instituted proceedings to condemn land of Mrs. Flemister. From the award of the assessors an appeal was taken. On the trial a verdict was rendered. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and the condemnee excepted.

[1] 1. Under the rulings in Freeman & Turner News Co. v. Mencken, 115 Ga. 1017, 42 S. E. 369, Grant v. Noel, 118 Ga. 258, 45 S. E. 279, and Leverett v. Bullard, 121 Ga. 535, 49 S. E. 591, the errors assigned in the grounds of the amended motion for a new trial, numbered 3 and 16, on the refusal to permit certain witnesses for the movant to answer stated questions, cannot be considered, because it does not appear that it was stated to the court what answers were expected to be given by the witnesses to the questions propounded. It is not improper, however, to say that the question whether a condemnee on appeal must file an answer or plea, denying a statement in the notice to condemn as to the number of acres contained in the entire tract of land which would be consequentially damaged, was not decided in Central Georgia Power Co. v. Cornwell, 139 Ga. 1, 76 S. E. 387. There a plea was filed alleging that the tract contained more than the notice stated. A motion was made to strike such allegation. The contention was that the only question which could be considered must relate to the land described in the notice of intention to condemn, and that it could not be set up that the tract contained more acres than such notice alleged. This court held that such contention was unsound.

[2] 2. The witness Flake testified that he was in the electric lighting business, and was to some extent acquainted with the operation of an electric plant and the value of the water powers; that he had been general manager of a company doing an electric lighting business, having its place of business located on the same river as that which flowed past the condemnee's land; that he formerly looked after the business, construction, and installation, and was afterward secretary and treasurer of the company, having been connected with it for seven years at the time of the trial; and that he had some familiarity with water powers on the river involved in the case, and had seen the shoal on the land of condemnee; sought to be condemned in connection with the hydro-electric works of the condemnor. Under this evidence, he was qualified as an expert to give an opinion as to the availability and market value of the land for use for a water power, based on facts shown to be within his own knowledge, or on facts proved by others and hypothetically stated to him. His cross-examination went rather to his credit than to his competency. Doster v. Brown, 25 Ga. 25, 71 Am. Dec. 153; White v. Clements, 39 Ga. 232, 242; Macon Ry. & Light Co. v. Mason, 123 Ga. 773, 778, 51 S. E. 569.

[3] 3. The witness Harrison did not qualify as an expert in regard to water powers. He testified that he had charge of a city light and water plant, but that he was not familiar with the use of water power for electrical purposes; that he had some idea of the method by which water power was utilized, but he knew very little about hydraulic engineering; and that he never bought or sold water power, or constructed a power plant or dam. He had never seen the property involved in the controversy. He did not show himself to be expert so far as water powers were concerned, but showed that he was not so.

[4] 4. It was complained that a witness was not allowed to testify that, "assuming a market for that power within three miles of this place, a fair value for that undeveloped water power, with the privilege of raising the water five feet, it ought to pay interest on a valuation of $5,000 or $5,500." This was properly rejected. The question was not on what valuation the witness thought that, under a certain assumption, a water power should pay interest, but what was the market value of the property taken.

[5] 5. It has been held that books of science or art are not admissible in evidence to prove the opinions of experts announced in them. Johnston v. Richmond & Danville R. Co., 95 Ga. 685, 22 S. E. 694; Cook v. Coffey, 103 Ga. 384, 30 S. E. 27; Boswell v. State, 114 Ga. 40, 43, 39 S. E. 397. How far a work of science may be used in cross-examining a witness as to the source of his knowledge on a given subject, and in determining whether, if he relies on a certain book as authority, he correctly states it, is not now before us. Certain tables, such as those of life expectancy, are admissible. We cannot be quite sure, from the meager statements of the grounds of the motion for a new trial in regard to this matter, whether or not the rulings of the court were erroneous and so injurious as to require a new trial.

[6] 6. On a question in regard to the value of land sought to be condemned, it is competent to introduce evidence of sales of property similar to that in question, made at or near the time of the taking. The exact limit either of similarity or difference, or of nearness or remoteness in point of time, is difficult, if not impossible, to prescribe by any arbitrary rule, but must to a large extent depend on the location and the character of the property and the circumstances of the case. It is to be considered with reference to throwing light on the issue, and not as a mere method of raising a legal puzzle. 2 Lewis, Em. Dom. (3d Ed.) § 662; City of Columbus v. McDaniel, 117 Ga. 823, 45 S. E. 59. Where a witness had testified that the land sought to be condemned was worth $100 to $125 per acre, it was too general a question, though on cross-examination, to ask him: "You know where this Lumus place is that sold at $4 an acre, right down there next to you?" This assumed the location and sale at a stated price, without regard to time, and left to the witness only to answer "Yes," if he knew the place. Had he testified that he never knew of any land in that vicinity being sold at such a price, or at less than a certain price, it would have been competent, on cross-examination, to inquire as to a particular sale in the neighborhood at a less price, or his knowledge of values could be tested by appropriate questions; but, as the case stood, the question allowed to be asked and answered was too sweeping even for cross-examination.

[7] 7. The notice of condemnation showed that it included the right to back water on certain land, on which there was a shoal. On the trial of the appeal, the condemnor introduced evidence as to the value of the land sought to be condemned, but which made no special reference to the question whether the shoal had any special value for furnishing water power. The condemnee introduced evidence as to general value, and also tending to prove that the shoal was valuable as an undeveloped water power. In rebuttal, the condemnor offered evidence, by depositions previously taken, tending to show that the shoal had no value for that purpose. This was admitted over objection, based on the ground that the evidence should have been offered in chief and not in rebuttal. In this ruling there was no error. Southern Railway Co. v. Clay, 130 Ga. 563 (4), 61 S. E. 226. The statement of the presiding judge to the effect that he was inclined to sustain the objection, but, as he might be affected by a desire to get through, he thought it best to overrule the objection, was not a very good reason; but the ruling was not a very bad ruling, certainly not so bad as to furnish any ground for a reversal.

[8] 8. The elements which are for consideration in determining the value of land condemned have so recently been considered in Central Georgia Power Co. v. Mays, 137 Ga. 120, 72 S. E. 900, Central Georgia Power Co. v. Preston, 137 Ga. 348, 73 S. E. 505, and Central Georgia Power Co. v. Stone, 139 Ga. 416, 77 S. E. 565, that it would seem to be unnecessary to repeat what was there said. See, also, Harrison v. Young, 9 Ga. 359. The request to charge embodied in the twenty-fifth ground was generally in the right direction, and was doubtless taken largely from Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 403, 25 L. Ed. 206. It is, however, argumentative in form, which may be meritorious in an opinion of a court of last resort, where a proposition is being supported by reason and authority, but is not desirable when a trial judge is charging a jury, and, under the practice in this state, may amount to a positive error.

[9] 9. The request to charge set out in the twenty-seventh ground of the motion for a new trial called attention to the fact that the condemnee contended that the property taken would include much of the lowlands and valleys of her farm, and that this would destroy the general unity of the farm, and thus depreciate the market value of the part not taken. The request to charge set out in the twenty-eighth ground sought to call attention of the jury to the contention of the condemnee that the raising of the water in the river alongside her place would prevent the drainage of the part of her bottom lands not taken, and would cause them to be filled with sand, and would destroy their value. These were legitimate subjects for the consideration of the jury, and the charge in general terms as to consequential damages to the lands not taken did not render the requests valueless. Lewis, Em. Dom. (3d Ed.) § 710; Savannah, etc., Ry. Co. v. Williams, 133 Ga. 679, 68 S. E. 942.

The requests embodied in the twenty-sixth and twenty-ninth grounds of the motion were substantial repetitions of general principles contained in the charge; and the law does not require emphasis by repetition, on request.

[10] 10. Where a part of a tract of land is condemned for use as a reservoir by a hydro-electric company, the owner is entitled to be paid the value of the land taken; and if there are consequential damages to the balance of the land, they should also be allowed. In determining the amount of the latter, they include, not only damages directly arising from the taking of a part of the land, but also from the legitimate use thereof for the purpose for which it is taken, if the evidence shows that such use will cause damage. Consequential benefits, if any, can be set up to reduce consequential damages, or to prevent their allowance. The charge on this subject was too restricted, in repeating several times that the consequential damages recoverable were only such as were proximately caused by the taking.

[11] 11. We cannot say that the charges complained of in the thirtieth, thirty-first, and thirty-second grounds of the motion furnish any ground for reversal. Counsel conceded in requests to charge that the amount to be allowed for the market value of the property taken should be on a cash basis; and one court at least has declared that such is the law. Brown v. Calumet River Ry. Co., 125 Ill. 600, 18 N. E. 283. The decision in Cincinnati & Georgia Railroad v. Mims, 71 Ga. 240 (3), did not hold that the market value to be determined is not on a cash basis, but simply dealt with the form of the question put to a witness.

[12] 12. As there was no evidence of sickness produced by the use of the land taken for a pond, and it does not appear that any claim was made before the jury for damages on that account, it would have been better not to make the precautionary charge referring to such sickness. If there had been evidence that the use of the land taken for a pond affected the rest of the place for a residence, and thus diminished its market value, that might have been a circumstance for consideration by the jury. Had there been such evidence, involving the rendering of the place unhealthy, and thus reducing its market value, the court might well have cautioned the jury that no recovery could be had on account of any particular sickness, but that the effect of the pond on the market value of the rest of the land, if any, could be considered.

[13] 13. None of the other grounds of the motion for a new trial show error for the reasons assigned in them; nor would they require a reversal.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

BROWN et al. v. SOUTHERN RY. CO. et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 14, 1913.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. ASSIGNMENTS (§ 50*)—EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENTS.

The following order was issued to cover the price of certain cross-ties furnished to the Wooley Tie Company, and by that company sold to the Southern Railway Company: "Atlanta, Ga., August 25, 1910. Southern Railway Company. Mr. W. F. H. Finke, Tie and Timber Agt., Southern Rwy. Co.—Dear Sir: Please prepare voucher favor Mr. M. J. Head, of Tallapoosa, Ga., for nine hundred thirty-six and <sup>24</sup>/<sub>100</sub> dollars, in payment following the accounts, deducting the amount from amount you owe us for cross-ties. O. H. Yours very truly, Wooley Tie Company, P. L. Wooley." At the time the order was delivered the Southern Railway Company owed the Wooley Tie Company for cross-ties an amount exceeding that specified in the order. M. J. Head was attorney at law for the persons named in the order as owners of the tie accounts. Held, while the written order in question was not an assignment of the legal title to that portion of the fund therein specified, it was an equitable assignment. *Fidelity Co. v. In an equitable proceeding instituted by the Southern Railway Company against the persons in whose favor the order was issued, and numerous other persons, in which they were required to interplead for the purpose of determining their rights in the fund held by the Southern Railway Company as due to the Wooley Tie Company, the order was enforceable as an equitable assignment. *Rivers v. ATKINSON, J. Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

FISH, C. J., and LUMPKIN, J. (concurring specially). The Southern Railway Company filed an equitable petition, which was substantially a bill of interpleader, except that it prayed a decree that it only owed its original creditor, and also prayed for general relief. The auditor found in favor of the plaintiffs in error. So far as the present record shows, no party filed exceptions to such report, except the Southern Railway Company, which admitted owing the indebtedness, and which had filed an equitable petition calling the various claimants in to contest over it. There is no brief of evidence in the record, and the exceptions of fact cannot be noticed. The exceptions of law merely state in general terms that the auditor erred in finding that there was an equitable assignment, and also in finding that the railway owed nobody but the original debtor. No specific reason is stated why the instrument set out in the headnotes by the majority of the court did not constitute an equitable assignment. The only reason urged before this court was that it did not sufficiently identify the fund out of which payment was made to operate as such. We concur in holding that it did sufficiently describe or specify the fund, and that it was not amenable to that objection. Whether or not contestants for this fund might have had any valid grounds for exception to the auditor's report is immaterial. As against the Southern Railway Company, which owes the money, and after having called the various parties into equity to contest over the ownership of the fund, now attacks the instrument under which the plaintiffs in error claim as an equitable assignment, it is good.

We concur in the judgment of reversal for these reasons.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; N. E. Harris, Judge.

Action by Fanny Anchors against the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Fanny Anchors brought suit against the railroad company for damages from the homicide of her husband, Samuel Anchors, who was a section foreman for the railroad. While in charge of a hand car carrying a gang of workmen to their work on the 31st of January, 1911, the car was derailed, and Anchors received injuries which resulted in his death. Among other allegations of negligence, it was averred that the hand car was defective in certain specified particulars, and that the track was defective where the derailment occurred. The material allegations of the petition were denied in the answer. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled, and exception was taken.

In one ground of the motion complaint is made of the admission of the following testimony of the witness W. S. Anchors: "I saw a hand car at Pike's Peak on Sunday, February 28th, where I went with Mr. Maynard and Mr. Defore, on information from Mr. Langston as to where the car was. I found a red lever car; lost motion and lateral motion; lateral motion three-quarters of an inch. I measured the car and distance between the wheel. The journal boxes had been bolted for some time underneath the beam. I measured on both sides of the car the distance from the center of the front and back. They did not measure the same. The journal boxes on that car are to hold the wheel, journal, and axles. I noticed lateral motion in the car. It would swing, and the wheels on the left hand were three-quarters of an inch closer than they were on the right. I noticed a beam broken on the right-hand side. The bolt was also out. It appeared to be an old break. The bolt was gone from the oil cellars. I saw no bolt on the car, no new hole bored in the journal boxes, no signs of new repairs, nor new iron in the car, nor in the journal boxes. The car was painted, and no paint rubbed off. If new holes had been bored for the journal boxes, I would have known it. I would have known if the journal boxes had been moved from one place to another. The purpose of the journal box was to hold the axle. The journal box was closer on the left than on the right; bolted together that way. The journal boxes had not been moved." This testimony was admitted, over the objection that it was irrelevant, as showing what was the condition of the car at the time of the injury.

The following testimony of the witness Walter Defore was admitted over a similar objection: "I went to Pike's Peak, some time about the first of the year, with Mr. Maynard and Mr. Anchors, and saw a hand car. I have been a machinist, having had 13 years' experience. I examined that car down there. We measured the distance from the axle with a small reed, and the axles at one end about five-eighths of an inch wider than the other. My recollection is the left side was the short side; I am not sure. It was an accurate measurement. Being shorter on one side than the other means the wheels don't tram. The journal boxes are small cases of iron, boxed, inverted, and bolted under the beam of the sill, which has Babbitt metal, and the journal and the axles rotating on the boxes. These wheels and axles did not have an appearance of having been moved, as far as I saw. They were bolted when I saw them. They could not be brought closer together, except by striking a bolt, or bending the bolt, or a very great bend in the center of the axle. I mean, spring the axle; that answer is taking into consideration the amount of the wheels out of tram. If the axles were sprained five-eighths of an inch, I don't think the car would run, if it was sprung enough to throw the axle five-eighths of an inch out of tram. The hole is usually one-sixteenth of an inch larger than the bolt. The boxes had no appearance of having been moved on the sill; if not, necessarily they must have been bolted out of the tram. This car on a straight track, out of tram three-quarters of an inch, would cause the flanges to tend to mount the rail. If the car were going in this direction, and the rails come together like that, and the car ran over them, there would be more tendency to mount the rail in a joint of that character, if the mismatched rail was on the side of which the flange of the wheel was hugging the rail. If the flange mounted the rail, it would cause the car to run off the track."

Substantially the same objection was urged to the following testimony of the witness W. R. Goodyear: "I had occasion to go to Fitzpatrick, about March or April of last year, with Mr. Jones, Mr. Anchors, and Mr. Maynard, and examine the hand car, which we found out of tram three-quarters of an inch, and a half inch, and three-quarters lateral between the hub of the wheel and box, some of the bolts out of the oil cellars, and one of the beams broken. We examined the journal box, and I do not remember that there was any appearance of its having been recently moved. They were bolted on the frame of the car. The wheel was out of tram three-quarters of an inch. In reference to the bolting of the journal boxes, they were not put on in line. This car running on the track this side of Swift Creek three quarters of an inch out of tram, from four to six miles an hour, in reference to the flanges on the other side, would have the effect of running it to the rail. If there was a bad joint in the track, it would be more than apt to mount; more so than if it was not out of plumb. I was present at Swift Creek when Mr. Jones made the measurements."

Similar objection was urged to the testimony of B. Jones as follows: "My occupation is railroading as track foreman, of 21 years and 7 months experience with Southern, Central, A. B. & A., and A. & P. I have worked for the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad, and I, with Mr. Anchors and Mr. Maynard, examined hand car on the 5th of March, 1911, at Fitzpatrick. I found the car to be out of line; a difference in the sides of the measurement. One side of the wheels were not on the square on the frame. There was about three-quarters of an inch difference between the two sides, and something like three-quarters of an inch loose motion in the frame. It was a mighty shakilty car to be used. The speed wheel was loose on the axle; it didn't run true; the wheels on one side were nearer the gauge than the other side and lateral. The running gear doesn't come straight together; it is not square; and I found some bolts out on the seat of the car. There was a beam broken on the car. I saw no evidence of recent repairs on the car. The car is held in place by some small bolts and cups underneath, that come up through the frame. Where I was, we had to have cars run plumb. I could not look at that car and see the defect."

Like objection was urged to the following testimony of the same witness: "I saw the track where the car was derailed on the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad, on the other side of a branch down by Fitzpatrick. I saw where a car ran off on the track. I have passed Swift Creek station several times. Cannot say how far this was from Swift Creek. Mr. Goodyear, Anchors, and yourself were with me. I saw where there had been a car off the cross-ties, and 45 or 50 feet west the track was out of gauge. Working standard track is 4½ feet, and that was 4 feet 9, because I measured it with a rule. It looked like the car struck the ground not very far from the place I saw a mismatched joint; that is, the rails were not evenly spaced. The southern rail went out. There was a high place on the rail that went over the trestle near there, which would throw one side of the car up and the other down. On other railroads where I have worked, it would have been considered unsafe to use a car in that condition."

In another ground of the motion the following charge of the court was complained of: "If you should believe in this case that the railroad company have not exercised that degree of diligence I have charged you, either in reference to the car furnished, or with reference to the condition of the track, and that that constitutes negligence upon their part, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, provided that he was not killed, and his death was not brought about by circumstances which he could have avoided, in which he could have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence." It was contended that this charge is error, "because it incorrectly stated the law and was inapplicable to the facts of the case, and because it was confusing by referring to the plaintiff as being not killed and to his death in the same sentence."

Minter Wimberly, Jesse Harris, and Chas. Akerman, all of Macon, for plaintiff in error. Napier, Maynard & Plunkett, of Macon, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts as above).

[1] 1. In the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error it is contended that the judge below "did not approve the finding of the jury, and failed to exercise the discretion which the law contemplates he should exercise in overruling a motion for a new trial, and that where a first application for a new trial is made on discretionary grounds, the trial judge must exercise his discretion in approval or disapproval of the verdict; that the order overruling the motion for a new trial in this case shows on its face that the judge did not exercise the discretion which the law vested in him." The failure of the judge below to exercise his discretion was not averred in the bill of exceptions, nor made the subject of a special exception, and is urged for the first time in the brief and argument of counsel before this court. But under the ruling made in the case of McIntyre v. McIntyre, 120 Ga. 67, 47 S. E. 501, 102 Am. St. Rep. 71, 1 Ann. Cas. 606, it is the duty of this court to pass upon the question thus raised.

Upon hearing the motion the judge passed the following order: "June 4, 1912. The within motion for new trial and the amended motion for new trial coming on to be heard, and the original and the amended motion are hereby overruled on all grounds therein stated. The motion was held up after argument till this day by the court. N. E. Harris, Judge S. C. M. C." Following the order just quoted, overruling the motion for a new trial, we find in the record the following: "Anchors v. M. D. & S. R. R. Co. Not having presided on the trial of this case, I have not felt that my discretion is quite as broad as that of the trial judge. I did not see the witnesses, nor hear the evidence delivered. While I think the verdict may be against the weight of the evidence to sustain it, the jury had the right to believe the plaintiff's evidence, and I refuse to disturb the verdict. N. E. Harris, J. S. C. M. C." Immediately following this last-recited part of the record appears the following entry: "Filed in office, June 13, 1912. R. F. Hunter, Dep. Clerk."

Premitting all discussion as to whether or not the supplementary order or opinion filed by the court below as a part of the record in a case should be considered as a part of the order of the judge overruling the motion for a new trial, we are of the opinion that, when that order and the original order are considered together, it does not appear that the judge failed to exercise the discretion vested in him by law in passing upon the motion for a new trial. A very similar question to the one presented here was considered and discussed in the case of Martin v. Bank of Leesburg, 187 Ga. 290, 73 S. E. 387.

[2] 2. The testimony of certain witnesses, and the objection raised thereto by the movant at the time of the trial, is set out in the statement of facts. Where testimony is objected to in bulk, and upon examination it appears that a part of it was admissible, the order of the court overruling the objection will not be reversed, if any part of the evidence was not open to the objection made. In the testimony of each of the witnesses there is some evidence from which the jury might have found that there were structural defects in the car which was derailed, or in the track at the place where the derailment occurred; and such evidence tending to show these structural defects was admissible, though the witnesses did not see the car or the track until 30 days or more after the occurrence which it is alleged resulted in the death of the plaintiff's husband. Southern Ry. Co. v. Hill, 139 Ga. 549, 77 S. E. 803.

[3] 3. While the excerpt from the charge which is excepted to by plaintiff in error was not entirely faultless and accurate, we do not think, after reading the entire charge, that it is cause for a new trial. In the first place, we do not think the jury would have been at all confused by "referring to the plaintiff as being not killed and to his death in the same sentence." The charge as a whole clearly and fully states the case, and there cannot be the slightest doubt that the jury distinctly understood that the plaintiff was the wife of the decedent, and was suing to recover damages for his death, alleged to have been caused by certain acts of negligence on the part of the defendant. And while in the excerpt from the charge quoted the law would have been more completely stated as applicable to the hypothesis contained in the first part of the excerpt, in reference to the negligence of the defendant company, if the court had added that before the plaintiff could recover it should appear that the death of the plaintiff's husband was caused by the negligence of the defendant, or it should be made to appear that the negligence was the proximate cause of the death of the plaintiff's husband, yet such an omission as this is not cause for a new trial, where it is disclosed that in a preceding part of the charge the court made the right of the plaintiff to recover dependent upon a showing that the death of her husband was the result of the negligence of the defendant, and had properly instructed them that the plaintiff could not recover if the decedent had been "killed by his own carelessness, amounting to a failure to exercise ordinary care," nor, although there was negligence upon the part of the defendant company, if the decedent could "by the exercise of ordinary care have avoided the consequences of the negligence of the defendant company."

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. v. FITTS. (No. 4,877.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 25, 1913.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 54*)—CLAIM FOR DAMAGES—WAIVER OF CONDITIONS.

The evidence was sufficient to show a waiver of the condition of the contract, printed upon the telegraph blank, which required the claim for damages to be presented in writing. The testimony that the telegraph company received an oral demand, and, within a week after the message was sent, acted upon it and investigated the claim, is undisputed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. §§ 39-47; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

2. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 54*)—CLAIM FOR DAMAGES—WAIVER OF WRITTEN DEMAND.

"Where a rule of a foreign telegraph company doing business in Georgia required persons damaged by failure to properly transmit messages to present their claim for damage within 60 days thereafter to some agent of the company authorized to exercise its corporate powers in relation to the subject-matter of the claim, a presentation of such a claim to the resident agent who made the contract and transmitted the message was sufficient." Western Union Telegraph Company v. Blanchard, 68 Ga. 300 (4), 45 Am. Rep. 480. And though the agent is not bound to recognize an oral demand, if he does so, making no objection upon the ground that it is not in writing, a waiver of the written demand will result.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. §§ 39-47; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 136*)—WAIVER OF KNOWN RIGHT—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether a known right was or was not waived is a question of fact, to be determined by the jury on consideration of all of the proofs submitted upon that point.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 318, 320, 321, 323-327; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

4. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 54*)—CLAIM FOR DAMAGES—WAIVER OF WRITTEN DEMAND—EFFECT.

Where, within 60 days after a message was filed with a telegraph company for transmission, the sender presented to the company's agent, with whom the message was filed, an oral claim for damages because of its non-transmission or delay, and from the action of the company upon the oral demand a waiver of the requirement that the claim be presented in writing within 60 days must be implied, the company was not restored to its original right to insist upon a written claim for damages merely because, after the expiration of the 60 days, the sender's attorney transmitted to the telegraph company a claim in writing, in which the damages were specifically set forth and enumerated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. §§ 39-47; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

5. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence authorized the finding of the jury, and there was no error in overruling the certiorari.

Error from Superior Court, Carroll County; R. W. Freeman, Judge.

Action by J. W. Fitts against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

S. Holderness, of Carrollton, and Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. C. E. Roop, of Carrollton, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Fitts sued the Western Union Telegraph Company in a justice's court for damages on account of the nondelivery of a message which he had delivered to the agent of that company at Carrollton, Ga., to be transmitted to one Cobb at Brookhaven, Miss. Upon the trial the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant sued out a certiorari, which was overruled by the judge of the superior court. There are various assignments of error in relation to the judgment of the trial court, but all of them were abandoned upon the hearing in the superior court except two: (1) That the verdict is contrary to the evidence and without evidence to support it; and (2) that the verdict is contrary to evidence, in that it was not shown that within 60 days from the date when the message was filed for transmission the plaintiff had presented in writing his claim for damages.

We shall consider these propositions in reverse order, because unless the requisite notice of the claim was given in writing, or the requirement that the claim should be in writing was waived, the plaintiff would have had no right of action, and it would not be necessary to determine whether the verdict was authorized upon other grounds. A condition upon the blank, upon which the plaintiff's message was presented for transmission, is as follows: "(6) The company will not be liable for damages or statutory penalties in any case where the claim is not presented in writing within 60 days after the message was filed with the company for transmission." In Hill v. Western Union Telegraph Company, 85 Ga. 425, 11 S. E. 874, 21 Am. St. Rep. 186, it was held that a like stipulation was both reasonable and obligatory, and that when the plaintiff used for his message the blank containing the stipulation he thereby agreed to it and it became a part of his contract. See, also, Western Union Telegraph Company v. James, 90 Ga. 254, 16 S. E. 83; Stamey v. Western Union Telegraph Company, 92 Ga. 613, 18 S. E. 1008, 44 Am. St. Rep. 95; Western Union Telegraph Company v. Waxlebaum, 113 Ga. 1017, 39 S. E. 443, 56 L. R. A. 741. It was admitted upon the trial that no written claim was presented within the 60 days stipulated in the contract. The only question is whether any agent of the company waived the requirement that the claim should be in writing, and, if so, whether the agent was authorized to bind the company by this waiver.

[1-3] We do not concur in the views of the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error that it was held in the Hill Case, supra, that an agent of the telegraph company cannot waive the time and accept a notice of a claim for damages after the expiration of 60 days. On the contrary, we think that if the agent is authorized to waive at all, and to bind his principal by the waiver, the time within which the claim for damage may be presented can as well be waived as the mode of its presentation. There is nothing to the contrary in the ruling of Chief Justice Bleckley in the Hill Case. He was dealing with a case like the one now before us, in which the claim for damages, though presented within 60 days, was not in writing; but the question of a waiver of the time was not before the court, and the learned Chief Justice did not rule upon this point. In discussing the case he merely alludes (in confining his ruling to the proper limits) to the fact that a waiver of the time was not involved. After stating that the "telegraph company was entitled to have a claim for damages presented in writing within 60 days after the message was sent," he proceeded to say: "We think that right could be waived, and that the evidence in the record tended to prove that it was waived, not indeed as to the time, but as to the mode of making the demand."

The waiver insisted upon in the case at bar must, for the same reason, be confined to the "mode of making the demand," because there is in the record no evidence of a waiver of the condition that the demand should be presented within 60 days. The evidence shows that within a week after the message was filed for transmission Fitts orally presented his claim for damages to the operator of the company with whom he had filed the message. The operator accepted this as a sufficient demand for damages, and so treated it. Without requiring that the claim should be made in writing, he took the matter of adjusting the claim up with the superintendent of the company, and repeatedly informed Fitts that the claim was being investigated, and was only delayed on account of change of superintendents of the company. The first time that the plaintiff made a claim for damages, the agent of the company offered to return to the plaintiff the amount he had paid for sending the message; but, as he could not pay more than this, he stated that he would at once take the matter up with the superintendent. Upon several occasions, about every week thereafter, the plaintiff approached the agent of the telegraph company and inquired if he had received instructions from the superintendent. And while he was told that the agent as yet received no instructions, he was informed each time that the matter was up for investigation, and that as soon as the investigation was completed he would notify the plaintiff. According to the plaintiff's testimony, the agent several times informed him that his claim was being investigated, and that the only cause of the delay was the change in superintendents. It appears from the record that the agent of the company had in fact informed the superintendent, by letter, of the plaintiff's claim for damages. We think that under this evidence the jury was clearly authorized to infer a waiver of the requirement that the claim for damages should be put in writing.

The local agent could waive the stipulation as to writing. The Supreme Court had ruled in Western Union Telegraph Company v. Blanchard, 68 Ga. 299, 45 Am. Rep. 480, that the demand for damages could be made upon the agent of the company on duty at the place from which the telegram was sent; and this ruling was reiterated in Hill v. Western Union Telegraph Co., supra. Chief Justice Bleckley, in the Hill Case, supra, said: "The agent was not bound to recognize an oral demand. But, if he did so, making no objection to it on the ground that it was not in writing, we think it was sufficient." Counsel for the plaintiff in error attempted to draw a distinction between the Hill Case and the case at bar, because in the Hill Case there was, after the investigation, a refusal to pay. The fact that the plaintiff in the present case was compelled to bring suit upon the claim for damages now before us would seem to indicate that there was in this case a refusal to pay. But whether there was or not is immaterial. If an agent upon whom the claim could properly be made recognized the oral demand as sufficient, and followed this up by informing his superintendent of the claim, so that the superintendent could or did make an investigation into the merits of the claim, with a full understanding of the nature of the claim upon which it was insisted that the company was liable, a waiver of the condition that the claim should be in writing might be implied. The officers properly charged with the settlement of claims had received notice of this particular claim, and all had been accomplished by the oral notice that could have obtained in case the claim had been put in writing.

The assumption that a waiver results only in case the company refuses to pay the claim is wholly foreign to the rule of reason upon which the waiver rests. The purpose of having the claim in writing is to bring notice to the proper officers of the company of the existence of the claim, so that they can investigate and determine whether they will pay the claim or resist its collection. Proof of a refusal to pay a claim is admissible as a circumstance from which knowledge of the claim may be implied; but if it appears aliunde in any case that a telegraph company accepted notice of a claim for damages which was not in writing, and (thereby waiving written notice) actually investigated the merits of the claim, the question of a refusal to pay, or as to the company's reason for refusing the claim might be irrelevant. Proof that the telegraph company offered to pay a part of a particular claim would as much imply a waiver of the requirement that the claim should be presented in writing as would proof of refusal to pay at all; but even if such testimony should be objectionable, as being evidence of a compromise, still the fact that the company had investigated the claim after oral notice might authorize the inference that the stipulation that notice of the claim should be in writing had been waived. As was held in Carter v. Southern Railway Company, 3 Ga. App. 42, 59 S. E. 212: "The purpose of the written notice is to advise the carrier and inform him of the nature of the demand against him. Such a stipulation of the contract may be waived; and if the carrier's agent, without objection to the form of the notice, receives and acts upon an oral notice, a waiver as to the requirement of its being in writing results."

The facts of the present case distinguish it from those in Postal Telegraph Cable Company v. Moss, 5 Ga. App. 503, 63 S. E. 590, cited by counsel. In that case the claim for damages, if made at all, was in writing; but in the telegram sent by Moss & Co. for that purpose the statement was made that the senders of the message would later make claim for the loss occasioned them. Furthermore, there was evidence that the plaintiffs in that case daily transmitted numerous telegrams over the lines of the defendant company. The message, which the plaintiffs in that case later insisted was a claim for damages, itself referred to several transactions and to more than one message, which was not identified otherwise than as being the occasion of loss. It was impossible for the telegraph company to know upon which one of these messages the claim for damages was based. Upon such a state of facts this court held that the claim presented, whether in writing or orally (if the writing be waived), should not only identify the message, but should also set forth the nature and extent of the plaintiff's demand so clearly as to enable the telegraph company to ascertain whether it is liable and the extent of its liability. No point is made in the present case upon these features of the notice. So far as appears from the record, the plaintiff has never sent but one message; and it is not disputed that he stated to the agent the nature and amount of his claim just as fully as it is set forth in the declaration.

[4, 5] The other points raised in the record are ruled in the headnotes. The plaintiff established the amount of his damages as returned by the jury; and there was no error in overruling the certiorari. The insistence that under the terms of the contract no agent of the telegraph company could waive the stipulation as to the written presentation of the claim for damages was not sufficiently specifically presented, in the assignments of error in the petition for certiorari, to call for an adjudication upon the point in the lower court, and therefore cannot be considered here.

Judgment affirmed.

LUMPKIN v. CITY OF ROME. (No. 4884.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 25, 1913.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 185*)—POLICE—AUTHORITY TO REMOVE.

By section 11 of the act approved August 11, 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 909), the mayor and council of Rome were given plenary authority over the police force of the city, with power to appoint policemen and to fix salaries and terms of office, and to remove at pleasure any policeman whose services were in their judgment no longer needed by the city. By virtue of the provisions of this act the mayor and council had authority to remove a policeman previously appointed for a fixed term by the board of police commissioners under authority of the act of August 20, 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 1022).

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 184*)—POLICE—AUTHORITY TO REMOVE.

The amendatory act of 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 904) did not have the effect of reviving section 77 of the act of 1883 (Acts 1883, p. 443), creating a new charter for the city of Rome, because the broad provisions of the amendatory act are inconsistent with the limitation of power prescribed in section 77 of the original act.

Error from City Court of Floyd County; J. H. Reece, Judge.

Action by H. B. Lumpkin against the City of Rome. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Maddox & Doyal, of Rome, for plaintiff in error. Max Meyerhardt, of Rome, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. This was an action against the city of Rome to recover a sum alleged to be due for salary of the plaintiff as a policeman for the year 1908. On April 14, 1908, the plaintiff and 14 others were elected by the board of police commissioners of Rome as policemen of that city, but the term of office was not fixed by the board. The salary of a policeman had been fixed by the mayor and council at $720 per annum. The plaintiff entered upon the discharge of his duties on April 14, 1908, and served as policeman until August 7, 1908. On that date the mayor and council of the city met and adopted a resolution reducing the number of policemen from 15 to 11, and 11 policemen were elected. The plaintiff was not elected. On August 12, 1908, at another meeting of the mayor and council, the action of August 7th was ratified and confirmed. The plaintiff sued for salary from September 1, 1908, to April 1, 1909, at $60 per month. The trial judge sustained a motion for a nonsuit, and the plaintiff excepted.

[1] The evidence showed that no charges had been preferred against the plaintiff, and that he was not dismissed for inefficiency or misconduct after a trial in accordance with the rules of the board of police commissioners or otherwise. The question of the right of the mayor and council to dismiss the plaintiff summarily without cause depends upon the construction of the city's charter and certain amendments thereto. By section 77 of the act approved September 25, 1883, creating a new charter for the city of Rome, it was provided: "The police force of the city of Rome shall consist of as many officers and men as the mayor and council may determine, and shall be elected at the same time the clerk is elected. They shall take an oath to faithfully and impartially discharge the duties imposed upon them by the laws and the city ordinances. Their several terms of office shall be two years, or until their successors are elected and qualified, unless removed for cause to be judged by the mayor and council." By the act of August 20, 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 1014), the charter of Rome was amended. By the amendment a board of police commissioners was created. The authority of the board over the police of the city is set forth in section 24 of the amendment, which is as follows: "On the first Monday in April of each year, or as soon thereafter as practicable, the mayor and council of the city of Rome shall, by resolution or ordinance, fix the number of officers and men to compose the police force of the city of Rome for the ensuing twelve months, at the same time fixing their compensation, and shall transmit a certified copy of their action to said board of police commissioners. Upon receipt of the same, at their first regular meeting thereafter, the said board shall proceed to elect by viva voce vote the number of officers and men provided for by the mayor and council of Rome, all of whom shall be bona fide citizens of the city of Rome. All of said officers and men so elected shall, before entering upon the discharge of their duties, take the same oath now provided for the police of said city, and shall hold office for twelve months from the date of their qualification, unless sooner removed by said board." By an act approved August 11, 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 904), the charter of the city was again amended. By section 11 of the act of 1908, all of the sections of the act of 1906 relating to the board of police commissioners were repealed, "and the appointment and control of all policemen, marshals and deputies vested in the mayor and council of the city of Rome."

[2] If the effect of the amendment of 1908 was either to directly legislate the plaintiff out of office or to authorize the municipal authorities to discharge him without cause, the nonsuit was properly granted, since any office created under authority of a legislative enactment may be abolished at the will of the creator. Butner v. Boifeuillet, 100 Ga. 743, 28 S. E. 464; Waters v. McDowell, 126 Ga. 307, 56 S. E. 95; Drake v. Beck, 129 Ga. 466, 59 S. E. 306. If, on the other hand, the effect of the amendment was not to abolish the plaintiff's office, or to authorize his discharge without cause, the nonsuit should not have been granted. By the act of 1883 the term of office of a policeman was two years, "unless removed for cause to be judged by the mayor and council." The amendment of 1906 did not repeal the new charter granted by the act of 1883, but merely made certain changes and additions, leaving all of the provisions of the act of 1883 to stand, except those repealed expressly or by necessary implication. Section 77 of the act of 1883 was repealed by necessary implication, because it was wholly inconsistent with the amendment of 1906, vesting the appointment of policeman in a board of police commissioners and fixing their term of office at one year, "unless sooner removed by said board." Apparently this authorized the board of police commissioners to remove a policeman at any time, even without cause. We need not inquire whether section 77 of the act of 1883 would have been revived if the act of 1908 had merely, without more, repealed the amendatory act of 1906. On this subject see Butner v. Boifeuillet, 100 Ga. 743, 749, 28 S. E. 464. The act of 1908 does something more than merely repeal the portions of the act of 1906 therein referred to. Its language is broad. By it "the appointment and control of all policemen, marshals and deputies [are] vested in the mayor and council of the city of Rome."

Counsel for the plaintiff insists that this language must be construed in connection with section 77 of the act of 1883, and was designed merely to vest in the mayor and council authority to appoint policemen for a term of two years, and that when so appointed they could not be removed except for cause. We think, however, that under the broad language of the amendment of 1908 the mayor and council were vested with plenary power over the police force of the city, with authority to elect, to fix their terms of office and salaries, to prescribe their duties, and to remove them from office at pleasure. Under the act of 1883 the General Assembly undertook to prescribe what should be the term of office of policemen, and how they should be removed. Under the amendment of 1908 the whole matter was left to the local authorities, to be regulated by ordinance or resolution. It is not claimed that since the passage of the act of 1908 the city has, by ordinances or otherwise, entered into a contract with the plaintiff for a fixed term. It is true the plaintiff was regularly and lawfully elected by the police commissioners for a term of 12 months; and while the act of 1908 did not in terms remove him from office, it did provide in effect that the mayor and council should have such plenary control over the matter of local police as to authorize them to abolish the office of any policeman whose services were, in their judgment, no longer needed. In this state no one has any property right in a public office, and the authority which creates it may abolish it at pleasure, unless in so doing some contract right is violated. The plaintiff had no vested right in the office which could not be taken away from him. The matter of continuing him in office was, under the act of 1908, wholly within the discretion of the mayor and council.

Judgment affirmed.

BROOKS v. TINSLEY et al. (No. 4,798.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 25, 1913.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 503*)—COLLATERAL ATTACK—HOMESTEAD.

A judgment of the ordinary setting apart a homestead exemption allowed under the Constitution of 1877 cannot be attacked in a collateral proceeding for mere irregularities in the application for the homestead, which are amendable, and cured by the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 943; Dec. Dig. § 503.*]

2. JUDGMENT (§ 506*)—COLLATERAL ATTACK—HOMESTEAD.

The wife and children for whose benefit a homestead was set apart, and who have enjoyed the benefit of the homestead for years, cannot, after the death of the husband and father, on whose application it was set apart, be heard to attack its validity because of merely formal defects in the application or in the judgment setting apart the homestead.

3. HOMESTEAD (§ 120*)—RIGHT TO SELL.

Where real estate has been set apart as a homestead exemption, it cannot be legally sold, except by an order of the superior court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 215; Dec. Dig. § 120.*]

4. HOMESTEAD (§ 131*)—ACTION ON PURCHASE-MONEY NOTE—DEFENSE—EVIDENCE.

Where one buys real estate in ignorance of the fact that it has been set apart as a homestead exemption, and gives his note for the purchase money to the vendors, who are the beneficiaries of the homestead, and afterwards discovers that the real estate is a homestead, and no order of court had been obtained from the superior court for the sale thereof, he can set up these facts as a defense, when sued on the note by the payees; especially is this so when the homestead property is still in the possession of the vendors. No valid conveyance having been made, the note was without consideration.

Error from City Court of Newnan; W. A. Post, Judge.

Action by O. G. Tinsley and others against T. F. Brooks. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

A. H. Freeman, of Newnan, for plaintiff in error. H. A. Allen, of Senola, and W. C. Wright, of Newnan, for defendants in error.

HILL, C. J. Tinsley and others brought suit against Brooks in the city court of Newnan as the maker of a promissory note alleged to have been given to the plaintiffs as the purchase price of certain described real estate. Brooks filed a plea alleging that the consideration of the note had entirely failed, because the land for which the note was given had been set apart to the father of the payees of the note as a homestead under the Constitution of 1877, and that no order of the superior court had been granted authorizing the sale of the property, and the plaintiffs therefore could not make to him a valid title to this real estate. The case was tried by the judge without the intervention of a jury and at the conclusion of the evidence he rendered a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, to which the defendant excepted.

On the trial of the case the defendant offered in evidence a certified copy of proceedings of the court of ordinary, showing that the land for which the note was given had been set apart as a homestead as stated. This exemplification was objected to on the following grounds: That the application for homestead was addressed to the court of ordinary, and not to the ordinary, and the court of ordinary had no jurisdiction to entertain such an application, since, under the law, an application for homestead must be made to the ordinary, and the ordinary and the court of ordinary are different in law, and, as thus addressed, the petition did not give the ordinary any jurisdiction to set apart the homestead; that the ages of the beneficiaries were not set out in the petition for the homestead; that the applicant "prayed the court not to set up the homestead to him," the language as shown being that he "makes application to the court that by said court there may not be set up to said family a homestead out of petitioner's property"; that the petition made no reference to any schedule showing the names of the applicants' creditors; that the property out of which the homestead was desired was not sufficiently described in the application; that there was no evidence that the land had been surveyed; that a notice of the application for homestead was not published as required by law, in that it was published only one time; that the application was for a "pony" homestead, and the ordinary, therefore, had no authority to set apart the $1,600 homestead under the Constitution; and for these reasons no valid homestead was set apart to the applicant as the head of the family. The court sustained these objections, or some of them; it not appearing from the record which ones.

[1,4] We think the judge erred. These objections were all formal, and mere irregularities, and were amendable. Presumably they were amended before the judgment of the ordinary was finally rendered. We do not think the judgment of the ordinary setting aside the homestead is subject to collateral attack on account of these irregularities. In the case of Dunagan v. Stadler, 101 Ga. 480, 29 S. E. 442, it was held: "This application for homestead having been made to a court having original and exclusive jurisdiction of the person and subject-matter, the papers showing the service legally required, the judgment of the ordinary setting aside the homestead will be taken and accepted as regular and valid, and the plaintiff in execution will not be heard to attack it for any irregularity. It is not a void judgment, if it be voidable." If the judgment setting apart the homestead should for any reason be subsequently attacked by creditors of the applicant, the attack should be made in the court in which it was granted. The law favors the granting of homesteads, and attacks on the homestead for mere amendable irregularities should not be allowed. Illustrating this point, it is said in the case of Redding v. Lennon, 112 Ga. 493, 37 S. E. 712, that under the decisions of the Supreme Court these exemption laws must be construed liberally in favor of the applicant. "It would be a great hardship upon the family of a claimant if they were to be turned out of house and home because the original schedule, through the ignorance or mistake of the person making it, fails to describe the land definitely and exactly." What is here said applies forcibly to all the objections urged to the admission of the exemplification, showing the setting apart of the homestead in the present case.

[2] In the next place, it was admitted that the husband and father and the beneficiaries of the homestead had been in possession of and enjoying it and its exemptions for a period of 19 years. Having originally, through the head of the family, invoked a judgment of the court of ordinary setting apart this homestead, the beneficiaries should be estopped from objecting to its validity on any merely technical grounds. It does not appear in the present case that there were any creditors of the applicant who made any objection to the setting apart of the homestead, or that there were any creditors interested in the matter. The wife, who is still living, had notice of her husband's application for the homestead for her benefit and that of her minor children. She should not now be heard, after 19 years of possession of this homestead by herself and her family, to complain that the original proceedings for her and her children were void. If her husband were in life, after having acquired the homestead for himself and family, and after his having enjoyed the benefit of the homestead which he had asked the ordinary to set apart, he certainly could not be heard to attack the validity of the homestead, and if he would be estopped, it would seem that his wife, who was privy with him in the application, should likewise be estopped. In Dunagan v. Stadler, supra, it is said: "Now, in the matter of homesteads, their allowance and disallowance, the ordinary has original and exclusive jurisdiction; an appeal from his decision is allowed."

* * * We are bound as a matter of law to give to his judgment in these matters not only the force and effect to which the judgments of other courts of original jurisdiction are entitled, but the same incidents and presumptions." For the purposes of this case, these are that it cannot be set aside in a collateral proceeding, and though the existence of any jurisdictional fact may not be affirmed upon the record [as in the instant case the petition being addressed to the 'court of ordinary,' instead of the ordinary], it will be presumed upon a collateral attack that the court acted correctly, with due authority, and its judgment will be as valid as though every fact necessary to jurisdiction affirmatively appeared." This decision would seem to cover every one of the objections made to the homestead in the present case. It goes to the extent of holding that all formal or amendable defects were cured by the judgment of the ordinary in setting apart the homestead. Civil Code 1910, § 5960; Reid v. Hearn, 127 Ga. 117, 56 S. E. 129.

But the Supreme Court has specifically held that some of the objections made to this homestead are entirely without merit. In Roberts v. Cook, 68 Ga. 324, it was held that failure to allege the ages of the children will not render the homestead void. In McWilliams v. McWilliams, 68 Ga. 459, it was held that failure to allege out of whose property the homestead was to be carved was not such a fatal defect as would render the proceedings void. In Bartlett v. Russell, 41 Ga. 196, it was said: "The schedule filed by the applicant for homestead and exemption should describe the personal property with reasonable certainty; but if the creditor failed to appear and object, on the ground that the schedule was insufficient, and it gives a general description of the property, * * * the creditor will not be permitted to attack the judgment of the ordinary setting it apart, collaterally, in a claim case, on the ground that the schedule was not sufficiently descriptive."

The objection made that the application made by the applicant originally was for a "pony" homestead under the Code, and not for the constitutional homestead of $1,600, appears not to be well taken. The application for homestead very clearly shows that the applicant wanted a constitutional homestead of $1,600, and this character of a homestead was set apart by the ordinary. The citation of the Code section relating to a pony homestead in the application seems to have been merely a clerical mistake. But this is immaterial, in that the application as a whole shows beyond a doubt that the constitutional homestead was desired, and this character of a homestead was set apart to the applicant as the head of his family, and from that time until now seems to have been possessed and enjoyed by its beneficiaries. We think, therefore, that the judge erred in excluding from evidence the certified copy of the homestead exemption.

[3] The next question is: Could the widow of the applicant for homestead and his children make a valid sale of the property set aside as a homestead to them? It is admitted that no order of the superior court was granted authorizing the sale of the homestead property; and without such authority from the court no valid sale could have been made. Hart v. Evans, 80 Ga. 330, 5 S. E. 99; Constitution of Georgia, art. 9, § 3, par. 1; Civil Code 1910, § 6584. This being true, it follows that the note sued on was without consideration, and the setting apart of the homestead exemption in the property for which the note was given was properly set up as a defense to the payment of the note. See McManus v. Cook, 59 Ga. 485; Sizemore v. Pinkston, 51 Ga. 398.

Entertaining the foregoing views, any decision of the other questions made in the bill of exceptions is unnecessary. In our opinion the certified copy of the homestead exemption should not have been rejected for any of the reasons of the objectors, and after its admission, with the other evidence in the case, a finding should have been made by the court in favor of the defendant.

Error from City Court of Nashville; W. D. Buile, Judge.

Action by S. F. Guthrie against the Great Southern Accident & Fidelity Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendant named brings error. Reversed.

Jones & Chambers, of Atlanta, and Hendricks & Christian, of Nashville, for plaintiff in error. Wm. R. Smith, of Nashville, and Chastain & Henson, of Douglas, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. This was an action in assumpsit for money had and received, brought against the Great Southern Accident & Fidelity Company, a corporation, and R. E. Cantrell, W. G. Chipley, and Lockridge & Tanner, a firm composed of J. D. Lockridge and E. L. Tanner. The corporation was alleged to have an agency and place of business in Berrien county, where the suit was brought. Cantrell and Chipley were alleged to be residents of Fulton county, and Lockridge and Tanner to be residents of Coffee county. Neither Cantrell nor Chipley was served or filed a defense. The other defendants pleaded to the merits, without demurring or objecting to the jurisdiction of the court. A verdict was directed against the corporation and in favor of Lockridge & Tanner. The corporation excepted to the direction of a verdict against it, and complains also of numerous rulings upon the admission of evidence.

[1] 1. A motion is made to dismiss the writ of error, upon the ground that the only remedy of the losing party was a motion for a new trial, and a direct bill of exceptions would not lie. This point of practice has been settled against the defendant in error. Haskins v. Throne, 101 Ga. 126, 28 S. E. 611.

[2] 2. It is also suggested that we ought not to review the evidence, because the brief thereof set out in the bill of exceptions is not a compliance with the rule of practice as announced in previous decisions of this court.

As to this point it is sufficient to say that, while the brief is not as succinct a compendium of the material facts as might have been prepared, it does not show such a flagrant disregard of the rule of practice as to justify the conclusion that the plaintiff in error has made no bona fide attempt to brief the evidence.

[3] 3. Cantrell and Chipley organized the defendant corporation and acted as its fiscal agents in disposing of its stock. In pursuance of the plan agreed on, these agents subscribed for all of the stock except 5 shares; but this was done to facilitate the same, and they were not expected to pay for the stock until they sold it. They were authorized to sell only for cash or its equivalent, which was understood to be a time interest-bearing certificate in some solvent bank or New York exchange. The fiscal agents were to pay for the stock as sold, at $110 per share. The selling price was $200 per share. The plaintiff subscribed for 5 shares through Lockridge & Tanner, who were representing Cantrell and Chipley in making the sale, and gave his note for $1,000, payable to Lockridge & Tanner. The certificate of stock was issued and attached to the note, which was forwarded to a bank for collection. The note was not paid at maturity, and it and the stock were returned to the company. Thereupon the stock was canceled and the note returned to Lockridge & Tanner. Subsequently the plaintiff paid the amount to Lockridge & Tanner. After deducting the amount to which they were entitled under their contract for making the sale, the balance was forwarded to Cantrell and Chipley. None of the money was paid to the corporation; Cantrell and Chipley claiming that the company owed them more on other transactions than the sum which came into their hands from plaintiff's subscription. The company refused to reissue the stock, upon the ground that it had not been paid therefor, and the plaintiff contends that the corporation and Lockridge & Tanner are indebted to him jointly in the amount paid for the stock.

The action for money had and received lies against one who holds the money of another which he ought in equity and good conscience to refund. Where more than one person is sued, a joint recovery for the whole amount against all will not be authorized, unless it appears that all received the money jointly. If it was not so received, the plaintiff can only recover from each defendant separately the amount shown to have come into his hands. In such an action, where the tort is waived, conspiracy and fraud may be proved merely for the purpose of showing that those who received the money are not entitled to keep it, and not for the purpose of recovering from one of the conspirators the whole amount received by all, unless it actually came into his hands. All this is settled by the Supreme Court in Cowart v. Fender, 137 Ga. 586, 73 S. E. 822, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 932, where the nature of the action is discussed, and the distinction between it and an action sounding in tort is shown.

[4] 4. Presumptively an agent to sell can sell only for cash. 31 Cyc. 1357. The authority of Cantrell and Chipley as agents for the corporation was limited to a sale of the stock for cash or its equivalent, as explained in the evidence. Hence the title to the stock did not pass into the plaintiff upon the execution of the note. This is true, without reference to whether the plaintiff had knowledge of the terms of the contract between the corporation and its agents.

[5] 5. It is contended that when the plaintiff did not pay his note at maturity, and the company canceled the stock and returned the note, the transaction was ended so far as the company was concerned, and the subsequent payment of the money by the plaintiff did not bind the company to issue the stock, or render it liable to return the money received by its agents. Cantrell and Chipley were, under the evidence, general agents of the company, to dispose of stock in its behalf. The only limitation upon their authority was that the sale should be for cash. If, after the cancellation of the stock, the company had returned to the plaintiff his note, and notified him that the sale of stock had been canceled and the agency of Cantrell and Chipley revoked, a different question would arise. The plaintiff's subscription was still outstanding. Certainly, in the absence of notice to the contrary, he had a right to assume that he was being held liable on his subscription and the note given therefor, and had the right, upon payment of his note, to demand the issuance of the stock. The agency of Cantrell and Chipley to sell the stock had not been revoked, and, even if it had, the plaintiff had no notice of it. He had, therefore, a right to continue to treat these parties as the duly authorized agents of the company to receive the money. Whatever money Cantrell and Chipley received as agents for the company is deemed in law to have been received by the corporation itself, and, as to the amount so received, the plaintiff was clearly entitled to recover against the corporation.

[6] 6. The evidence discloses, however, that Cantrell and Chipley did not receive the whole amount paid by the plaintiff to Lockridge & Tanner, but that some amount, not disclosed by the evidence, was deducted by these parties, and the balance paid over to Cantrell and Chipley. If Lockridge & Tanner were also the agents of the corporation, this would make no difference; but if they were merely the agents of Cantrell and Chipley, the company would not be bound to refund to plaintiff the money which they received, but did not pay over to any agent of the corporation authorized to receive it. We can find no evidence which would have authorized, certainly none which required, a finding that Lockridge & Tanner were agents of the corporation. They so described themselves, but their conclusion is not supported by the evidence. They were employed by Cantrell and Chipley to sell stock for them. They had no contract with the corporation, were not liable to it in any way, and were not authorized by it to bind it by any sale of stock or collection of money therefor.

[7] Cantrell and Chipley had no authority from the corporation to appoint other agents for the corporation. Cantrell was vice president of the company when it was organized, and afterwards president; but this did not give him authority to appoint agents to sell stock for the corporation. Minnesota Lumber Co. v. Hobbs, 122 Ga. 25, 49 S. E. 783; Swindell & Co. v. Bainbridge Bank, 8 Ga. App. 364, 60 S. E. 13. Lockridge & Tanner not being agents of the corporation, nor authorized to collect money in its behalf, there is no reason in equity or good conscience why the corporation should be made to pay back money which they have appropriated to their own use. Cantrell and Chipley would be bound to do so, but not the corporation. The company is bound to account to the plaintiff for the money received by Cantrell and Chipley, although they retained it, and without reference to their right to withhold it from the corporation. Having received the money for the corporation and by its authority, it is responsible to the same extent as if the money had been paid into its treasury. The minutes of the corporation introduced in evidence, together with the other evidence, demanded a finding that Cantrell and Chipley were mere trustees for the corporation to sell its stock and not the owners of the stock itself. Neither the testimony of Lockridge & Tanner, nor the correspondence introduced in evidence, authorized a finding that they were agents of the corporation. They were not so appointed by any one having authority to bind the corporation, nor were they held out by the company to the plaintiff as its agents in such a way as to estop the corporation from pleading the contrary.

[8] 7. The numerous objections to testimony need not be considered in detail. Neither the stock certificate nor the correspondence was essential to the plaintiff's case, and their admission in evidence, even if erroneous, was harmless. All of the direct evidence of the witness Cantrell was objected to in solido, on numerous grounds. Some of it was clearly admissible, and the objection to the whole of it was properly overruled. Ray v. Camp, 110 Ga. 818, 36 S. E. 242; Harris v. Amoskeag Lumber Co., 97 Ga. 465, 25 S. E. 519; American Insurance Co. v. Bailey, 6 Ga. App. 424, 425, 65 S. E. 160; Walker v. Riley, 6 Ga. App. 519, 65 S. E. 801; Thompson v. Carter, 6 Ga. App. 604, 65 S. E. 599.

[9] It is competent for a person to testify that he acted as agent for another, though mere hearsay evidence of declarations of agency is inadmissible. No demand on the company for the stock was necessary, and hence testimony as to such demand was immaterial. Testimony of Lockridge and Tanner and Moore that Lockridge & Tanner were agents of the corporation stated a mere conclusion, not supported by the proven facts. Standing alone, it would be the statement of a fact; but, other facts having been proved, which show that in law there was no such agency, the statement became merely an erroneous conclusion. The contract between Lockridge & Tanner and their agent Moore was not binding on the corporation, but was admissible against Moore's principals to show his agency. The expenses of litigation were not recoverable against the corporation, and evidence thereof was inadmissible. In the light of the judge's note to the bill of exceptions, there was no error in admitting the extract from the minutes of the corporation.

Upon another trial, if the evidence is substantially the same, the defendant corporation will be liable for the amount which its agents, Cantrell and Chipley, may have received, and Lockridge & Tanner will be liable for the sum which they and their agent Moore retained. The relative rights of the corporation and Cantrell and Chipley, as between themselves, must be settled between them; no such issue being germane in the present suit. The case must be again tried in the light of the rulings herein made.

COOK v. HIGHTOWER & CO. (No. 4,999.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 25, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. VERDICT SUSTAINED.

The evidence adduced in support of the defendants' pleas, which were held sufficient by this court, would have authorized a verdict in her favor, but did not demand such a finding. The issue was one purely of fact, it was fairly presented by the trial judge, and the verdict is supported by evidence.

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 154*)—LIABILITY OF WIFE—DEBT CONTRACTED JOINTLY WITH HUSBAND.

Even though the plaintiff, at the beginning of the transaction, made a contract with the defendant and her husband jointly, and took their joint note, and though the subsequent note to the wife, sued upon in the present case, may be a renewal by the wife of the former obligation, a recovery against her was authorized, because there was evidence that the husband acted as her agent and that she received the consideration of the note. To allow husband and wife to unite their joint credit in procuring the means of supplying the joint resources is not contrary to public policy, and the power of the wife to join her husband in contracting a debt exists, where it appears that the debt contracted is not one assumed for the purpose of paying the husband's debt, or of becoming his surety.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 604; Dec. Dig. § 154.*]

3. INSTRUCTIONS—NO ERROR.

The complaints as to expressions or intimations of opinion by the court upon the evidence in charging the jury, are not well founded; and the instructions upon which error is assigned were pertinent to the evidence.

4. TRIAL (§ 256*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

The trial court, in the absence of an appropriate and timely request to that effect, is not required to specifically instruct the jury as to which party carries the burden of proof on a particular point or issue. It is enough in such a case that the court correctly informs the jury upon which party lies the burden of proof in the case as a whole.

5. COSTS (§ 41*)—NOTICE (§ 13*)—ATTORNEY'S FEES—SUFFICIENCY OF PLEADING.

The court did not err in overruling the demurrer, in which the complaint is made that the allegations of the petition are insufficient to bind the defendant for liability for attorney's fees. The notice by letter of the claim for attorney's fees is sufficient, provided the letter conveys such notice as is required by law and is timely received by the defendant. It is not necessary to state in a petition how the notice was served, if it be alleged that it was served.

Error from City Court of Miller County; R. D. Bush, Judge.

Action by Hightower & Co. against Zenie Cook. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

B. W. Fortson, of Arlington, and W. I. Geer, of Colquitt, for plaintiff in error. Bush & Stapleton, of Colquitt, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. This is the second appearance of this case before this court. The issues are specifically set out in the statement of facts in Cook v. Hightower, 11 Ga. App. 657, 75 S. E. 1058.

[1] 1. On the trial now under review there was no effort to curtail the rights of the defendant in introducing testimony in support of the pleas, which were heretofore held to be proper and sufficiently pleaded. The issue presented was purely one of fact. From the evidence adduced the jury might have found for the defendant, but they were authorized to find that the note, which was the basis of the suit, was not obtained by duress, and that Mrs. Zenie Cook, though a married woman, received the consideration of the note which was the basis of this suit.

[2] 2. As was held by Judge Jackson in King v. Thompson, 59 Ga. 380: "Whether or not a married woman, who signs a note with her husband, is responsible out of her separate estate therefor, turns upon the question whether she signed to raise money on her own account, or as surety, or to assume a debt of her husband. If the note was given in regard to her own business, conducted by her husband for her, she is bound; if as surety for him in his business, or to pay his debts, her separate estate is not bound." Judge Bleckley, in Scofield v. Jones, 85 Ga.

824, 11 S. E. 1034, puts the point more sentimentally by saying: "The true test of the real debtor or debtors is: To whom did the consideration pass?" If the note here involved represents a valid debt at all, it is practically undisputed that it represents the purchase price of a tract of land which is in the possession of Mrs. Cook and over which she has exercised dominion for several years. It matters not that at the beginning of the transaction Hightower made a contract with Mrs. Cook and her husband jointly, and originally took their joint note for the money which he had advanced to pay for the land. In Amos v. Cosby, 74 Ga. 793, land had been set apart as a homestead to the husband as head of the family, consisting of his wife and minor children. The husband and wife, by a joint deed, conveyed it with warranty of title. The purchaser sold it with warranty to a second purchaser, and afterward a lien superior to the homestead was enforced against it, causing a loss to the second purchaser of over $400. An action against the husband and the wife upon their warranty, to make good this loss, was sustained, although the wife set up her coverture in bar of the same. The court said: "Nor is Mrs. Amos relieved by reason of her being a married woman. She had the right to make the deed with her husband. There having been a homestead set apart to her husband, under the act of 1868, she was a usee, and was not a surety of her husband, and is equally bound with him." In Runnals v. Aycock, 78 Ga. 556, 3 S. E. 657, an action on a joint note was defended by the wife, and resulted in a judgment against her, which was upheld. In Francis v. Dickel, 68 Ga. 255, the suit was on an account against the husband and wife as partners. A recovery against the wife alone was had, the jury having found that there was no partnership.

That a debt can be created, which in contemplation of law would be a debt of the wife, as well as the debt of her husband, has been frequently recognized by the Supreme Court. It is so recognized as to joint notes in Mashburn v. Gouge, 61 Ga. 513, in Wingfield v. Rhea, 73 Ga. 477, and in Harrold v. Westbrook, 78 Ga. 5, 2 S. E. 695. In the much earlier case of Skinner v. Allen, 49 Ga. 557, the verdict was upheld against the wife because it appeared that she was the beneficiary of some of the transactions of which the draft which was the basis of the suit formed a part. The fact that the transaction may have been carried on by the husband as agent for his wife would not affect the rule. This was held in King v. Thompson, supra. In Scofield v. Jones, supra, Chief Justice Bleckley said that the joining with the husband in contracting a debt is not an assumption by the wife of his debt, for he has no debt existing to be assumed, and the debt created is her own from the beginning. "Moreover, there is nothing contrary to public policy in allowing husband and wife to unite their joint credit in procuring the means of supplying joint resources in the shape of a home, or a place of business from which to derive an income for the support of a family. Very often it would contribute to the well-being and prosperity of both, and to the permanent good of the family. No doubt such a power can be abused and misapplied; but this is no reason for not recognizing its existence, or why the law should not tolerate it, if on the whole its results are beneficial, rather than pernicious. At all events, we think the power exists at present under our law."

Though the defendant in the present case adduced testimony which would have authorized a finding in her favor, there was sufficient evidence in conflict therewith to warrant the verdict; and no material error appears in any of the rulings upon the admissibility of the testimony.

[3] 3. The complaints as to expressions or intimations of opinion by the court upon the evidence are not well founded, and the instructions were pertinent to the evidence.

[4] 4. Under a well-settled rule, the court was not required to specifically instruct the jury as to the burden of proof upon a particular point in evidence, in the absence of a request to that effect. It is complained that "the court erred in not giving in charge to the jury, even without a written request to do so, a charge in substance as follows: That if it should appear to them from the evidence in the case that any part of the note sued on was the debt of the defendant's husband, before the jury would be authorized to find a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, the burden would be upon the plaintiff to point out by evidence that for which the defendant was liable as security, and that for which she was liable as original maker, and that unless the plaintiff could point out by evidence which part of the note was the original obligation of the defendant, and which part of the note was the original debt of her husband, if any part should appear to be the debt of her husband, the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover in the case." It is also complained that "the court erred in not charging the jury, even without a written request to do so, that if it should appear to them from the evidence that the note sued on embraced indebtedness which was originally the debt of the defendant, as well as an indebtedness which was originally the debt of the defendant's husband, the burden would be upon the plaintiff to point out by evidence that for which the defendant was liable as the original promisor, and that for which she was liable as surety only, and that for which she was liable by way of assuming her husband's debt, provided the evidence showed that she had assumed her husband's debt, or any part of the same, and provided, further, that they should believe, from the evidence, that any part of the note sued on was originally the debt of her husband, and provided, further, that it should appear that any part of the note sued on was originally the debt of her husband, and that she stood his security. Movant contends that a charge of this character or substance should have been given to the jury, because it is her contention that the note sued on embraced a note which had been given by her husband for the purchase of the Mason land, and that she stood her husband's security for the purchase money of the Mason land." The omission to give these instructions, in the absence of a request, was not error.

[5] The court did not err in overruling the demurrer to the fourth paragraph of the plaintiff's petition, in which it is insisted that the allegation of the petition is insufficient to bind the defendant to liability for attorney's fees. The paragraph of the petition referred to is as follows: "Petitioner shows that they have served said defendant with written notice of their intention to bring this suit to December term, 1910, of the city court of Miller county, ten days prior to the filing of this suit, in order to bind for attorney's fees. Copy of this notice is hereby attached, marked 'Exhibit A.'" The notice attached to the petition is in the form of a letter, in which it is specifically stated that, "if the claim is not paid by the 18th day of November, 1910, we will institute suit on the same in the city court of Miller county, returnable to the December term, 1910." We think this notice by letter fully meets the point made by the demurrer. Where it is averred that the notice required by law, in order to bind the defendant with liability for attorney's fees, has been served, it is not necessary for it to appear how it was served. This the proof must disclose, and in the present instance we think that testimony to the effect that in response to this notice the defendant called to see the plaintiff's attorney, prior to the return day of the term to which the suit was filed, and stated her inability to pay the claim, in response to the notice, would authorize the jury to find that the requisite notice had been given the defendant in time. Judgment affirmed.

1. APPEARANCE (§§ 17, 19*)—ATTACHMENT (§ 241*)—REPLEVY BOND—JURISDICTION—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

The giving of a replevy bond does not preclude a defendant in attachment from objecting to the jurisdiction of the court over his person. Appearance and pleading to the merits amount to a waiver of the want of jurisdiction; but as defenses in attachment cases may be made at any time before final judgment, it is no ground for overruling a motion to dismiss a declaration in attachment because of a failure to allege jurisdiction of the defendant that the motion was not filed at the appearance term, or that it was filed simultaneously with a plea to the merits. The failure of a petition to show jurisdiction of the person is an amendable defect; but in attachment cases such a defect may be taken advantage of by motion made at the trial term, and unless cured by amendment the declaration should be dismissed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appearance, Cent. Dig. §§ 70-75, 79-82, 84-90; Dec. Dig. §§ 17, 19; * Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 829-838; Dec. Dig. § 241.*]

2. ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL (§ 85*)—PLEADING—JURISDICTION—WAIVER OF PLEA.

Under the practice in this state, all of a defendant's pleadings may be filed simultaneously, and, when so filed, should be disposed of in logical order. A defendant does not waive a plea to the jurisdiction by filing simultaneously therewith a plea to the merits, either upon the same or upon a separate paper. If upon the same paper, it is immaterial which plea is first in sequence, if the defendant first presents and insists upon a disposition of the plea to the jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Abatement and Revival, Cent. Dig. §§ 156, 508-510; Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

3. ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL (§ 5*)—ANOTHER ACTION PENDING.

The pendency of an attachment proceeding upon which no declaration was filed at the first term will not abate a second attachment between the same parties under which the same property was seized and upon which a declaration was duly filed.

Error from City Court of Blakely; R. H. Sheffield, Judge.

Action by C. M. Lewis against J. W. Drake. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error, and plaintiff assigns cross-error. Judgment on both main and cross bill of exceptions reversed.

W. I. Geer, of Colquitt, and B. W. Fortson, of Arlington, for plaintiff in error. Glessner & Park, of Blakely, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. On November 13, 1912, an attachment was sued out by Lewis against Drake. The ground of attachment was not set forth in the affidavit, but in all other respects the proceedings were regular. Bond was given, and the attachment was issued and made returnable to the January term of the City Court of Blakely. Apparently upon the assumption that the attachment was void, Lewis, on November 28, 1912, sued out another attachment, upon the ground that Drake was causing his property to be moved beyond the limits of the state, and caused a levy to be made upon the same property which had been seized by the sheriff under the first attachment. Drake gave bond and replevied the property. While the first attachment was pending, declaration upon the second attachment was filed to the return term on January 11, 1913, alleging an indebtedness upon a promissory note. On December 16, 1912, prior to the filing of the declaration, Drake filed a plea consisting of two paragraphs. In the first paragraph it was averred that the second attachment should be abated and dismissed because of the pendency of the first proceeding. The second paragraph contained a plea to the jurisdiction of the court; it being averred that, when the attachment issued, Drake was a resident of Decatur county. On February 24th Drake filed another plea to the jurisdiction, and at the same time moved to dismiss the declaration, because it failed to allege the residence of the defendant. On the same day, and subject to the motion to dismiss, the defendant filed a plea denying indebtedness, and averring that the consideration of the note had failed by reason of certain facts alleged in the plea. The court overruled the motion to dismiss the declaration, struck the plea to the jurisdiction and the plea of former suit pending, and overruled a demurrer to the plea to the merits of the action. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled. He has excepted to the several judgments adverse to him, and the plaintiff by cross-bill complains of the refusal to strike the plea to the merits.

[1] 1. The correctness of the action of the court in overruling the motion to dismiss the declaration and in striking the plea to the jurisdiction depends upon whether the defendant had in any way waived his right to object to the jurisdiction of the court. Giving the replevy bond did not amount to a waiver. Cincinnati Ry. Co. v. Pless, 3 Ga. App. 400, 60 S. E. 8. Appearance and pleading to the merits is a waiver, and if counsel for Lewis is correct in his contention that the filing of the first plea submitted the defendant to the jurisdiction of the court, the court was right in striking the plea to the jurisdiction and overruling the motion to dismiss the declaration. If this premise is wrong, then both of these rulings were erroneous. Defenses in attachment cases may be made at any time before final judgment. Civil Code, § 5104. It was not too late at the trial term to object to the petition because of failure to show jurisdiction of the defendant; for, while this defect was amendable (Civil Code, § 5691), the defendant was not precluded from attacking the petition on this ground, unless he had previously appeared and pleaded to the merits. Hall v. Mobley, 13 Ga. 318. The motion to dismiss having been filed simultaneously with the so-called plea of failure of consideration, the filing of this plea did not preclude a consideration of the motion, and Richmond & Danville Railroad Co. v. Mitchell, 95 Ga. 78, 22 S. E. 124, has no application.

[2] 2. The correctness of the court's rulings upon the question of jurisdiction turns, therefore, upon whether the filing of the first plea amounted to a waiver of the defendant's right to object to the jurisdiction. The plea is rather anomalous, in that, before challenging the jurisdiction of the court, the defendant urged that the attachment proceeding should be abated because of the pendency of a former attachment. Counsel for Lewis is doubtless correct in assuming that a plea of former suit pending is such a plea that the filing thereof without a protestation would have the effect of submitting the defendant to the jurisdiction of the court; but we cannot agree with them in the further contention that the defendant waived his right to have his plea to the jurisdiction determined merely because it followed, instead of preceding, the paragraph of the plea setting up the pendency of the first attachment. The strict rules of common-law pleading do not prevail in this state. It is common practice to file special demurrers going merely to form simultaneously with a general demurrer attacking the substance of a pleading, and no one would contend now that so doing would be a waiver of the right to insist upon the special demurrers.

A petition may be attacked at the same time both in form and substance, either in the same demurrer or in a separate pleading. When this is done, the correct practice is to have the pleading first perfected in form, and then determine the question of its sufficiency in substance. And so where a defendant files simultaneously a plea to the jurisdiction and a plea to the merits, even though the latter does not contain an express protestation, the plea to the jurisdiction should be considered and disposed of. The filing of such a plea simultaneously with the plea to the merits is itself a protestation against the jurisdiction of the court, and the plea to the merits must be treated as having been interposed subject to this protestation. Nor does it make any difference that the two pleas are in the same paper, nor which of them precedes the other. The logical order, of course, would be to set forth the objection to the jurisdiction first; but this is immaterial if at the trial the defendant presents and insists upon a disposition of the objection to the jurisdiction before insisting upon the other plea. Any other rule would be too technical and out of harmony with the liberality of pleading prevailing in this state. "Pleading to the merits, without more, is a waiver of jurisdiction." Bunting v. Hutchinson, 5 Ga. App. 194, 63 S. E. 49. But pleading to the merits at the same time with a plea to the jurisdiction is not. Cox v. Adams, 5 Ga. App. 296, 63 S. E. 60; Stallings v. Stallings, 127 Ga. 464, 56 S. E. 469, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 593; Civil Code, § 5684. The court erred in striking the plea to the jurisdiction, and, no offer to amend the declaration having been made, the motion to dismiss it should have been sustained.

[3] 3. It was not erroneous to strike the plea of former suit pending. While the first attachment was not void on its face (Penn v. McGhee, 6 Ga. App. 631, 65 S. E. 686), as no declaration on it was filed and the proceeding was in rem, it was not such a suit as would abate the second attachment and the declaration filed thereon. Weston v. Beverly, 10 Ga. App. 261, 73 S. E. 404; Lane v. Brinson, 12 Ga. App. 760, 78 S. E. 725.

[4] 4. Since the case must be tried again, it becomes necessary to dispose of the question raised by the cross-bill. The suit was upon a promissory note. The defendant pleaded that the note was given for the balance due on the purchase price of certain timber suitable for manufacture into cross-ties of specified dimensions; that the plaintiff refused to permit the defendant to cut and remove the timber, and has taken possession thereof and ousted the defendant; that the plaintiff has converted to his own use 600 cross-ties cut from the timber and lying on the land; that the defendant "has already paid to plaintiff balance of said purchase money and that he has not cut and removed from said land enough cross-ties to pay him for the amount of cash that he has already paid to plaintiff; that there has been a total failure of consideration of said note." The plaintiff demurred to the plea, upon the ground that it attempted to set off a claim arising ex delicto against a cause of action arising ex contractu, and that the city court was without jurisdiction to entertain such a plea. The demurrer was well taken and should have been sustained. The facts pleaded do not show a failure of consideration, but show merely an actionable tort, consisting of an unlawful interference with the defendant's right to cut the timber and a wrongful conversion of cross-ties which had been cut from the timber. Such a defense is forbidden by our Code, except in a court having equitable jurisdiction, and it is allowed then only upon equitable grounds, such as insolvency and nonresidence. Civil Code, 5521; McLendon Bros. v. Finch, 2 Ga. App. 421, 58 S. E. 690; Hecht v. Snook, 114 Ga. 921, 41 S. E. 74. The rulings above announced render unnecessary a determination of the motion for a new trial.

Judgment on both main and cross bills of exceptions reversed.

DUNN v. STATE. (No. 5,010.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 25, 1913.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 62*)—INSOLVENCY—INDICTMENT OF DIRECTOR—SUFFICIENCY.

An indictment based upon section 204 of the Penal Code of 1910, which alleges that a named trust company is "a corporation duly incorporated and chartered under the laws of Georgia, and doing and carrying on a banking business, and was a bank," sufficiently avers that the institution named is "a chartered bank," within the meaning of that section of the Code.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. §§ 122-124; Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

2. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 61*)—CHARTERED BANK—INSOLVENCY.

A company incorporated mainly for the purpose of exercising, and vested with, the powers usually conferred upon companies authorized to act as guardian, receiver, or other trustee, is not a "chartered bank," within the purview of a penal law, merely because it may be empowered to exercise, as a mere incident to the main object of incorporation, some of the functions of a bank.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. § 121; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

3. BANKS AND BANKING (§§ 2, 61*)—"CHARTERED BANK"—"BANK"—INSOLVENCY.

The words "chartered bank," as used in section 204 of the Penal Code of 1910, refer to a corporation having the powers, and exercising as the main object of its creation all or some of the functions, of a "bank" prescribed in section 2266 of the Civil Code of 1910.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 682-689; vol. 8, p. 7587.]

4. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 61*)—CHARTERED BANK—TRUST COMPANY.

There is nothing in the decision in Mulherin v. Kennedy, 120 Ga. 1080, 48 S. E. 437, which requires a ruling that a trust company, incorporated merely as such under the provisions of section 2815 et seq. of the Civil Code of 1910, is a "chartered bank," within the meaning of the penal laws of this state relating only to such banks.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. § 121; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

5. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 61*)—CHARTERED BANK—TRUST COMPANY.

A company, incorporated merely as a trust company, under the provisions of the act of 1898 (Civil Code 1910, § 2815 et seq.), is not a chartered bank, though it exercises, as an incident to the main object of its creation, the power to receive trust funds on deposit and the power to lend money.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. § 121; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

6. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 61*)—TRUST COMPANY.

Under the act of 1898 (Civil Code, § 2815 et seq.) trust companies incorporated under its provisions "may acquire and exercise all the rights and privileges, and be subject to the same liabilities and restrictions, as apply to banks, upon compliance with the laws of this state providing for the incorporation and regulating the business of banks."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. § 121; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

7. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 61*)—TRUST COMPANY.

The provisions quoted in the preceding headnote mean simply that a trust company may obtain a charter as a bank, and, after having done so, may exercise, in addition to its other powers, all the functions of a bank. If a trust company incorporated under the act should avail itself of this provision, and thus acquire the privileges of a bank, it would be a chartered bank, within the meaning of the penal laws of this state, though exercising the dual functions of a trust company and a bank.

8. JUDICIAL NOTICE OF CORPORATE CHARTER.

Whether the courts know judicially without proof that a trust company incorporated under the act of 1898 (Civil Code 1910, § 2815 et seq.) has or has not obtained a charter conferring upon it banking privileges as authorized by that act, is not involved in the present case, and for that reason is not decided.

9. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 62*)—INSOLVENCY—PRESUMPTIONS—PROSECUTION OF DIRECTOR—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Upon the trial of the present indictment the state carries the burden of proving that the trust company named in the indictment is a chartered bank. This burden cannot be successfully carried, unless it appears that the company has obtained a charter authorizing it to exercise the privileges of a bank.

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

B. S. Dunn was convicted under Pen. Code 1910, § 204, as director of an insolvent bank, and brings error. Affirmed.

C. A. Picquet, of Augusta, J. P. K. Bryan, of Charleston, S. C., and Gunter & Gyles, of Aiken, S. C., for plaintiff in error. A. L. Franklin, Sol. Gen., of Augusta, and John M. Graham, of Atlanta, for the State.

POTTE, J. The plaintiff in error was indicted for violating the provisions of the act of 1838, codified in section 204 of the Penal Code. The indictment (omitting formal parts) was in the following words: "For that the said B. Sherwood Dunn, in the county aforesaid, on the 19th day of July, 1912, with force and arms and unlawfully, being then and there a director of the Citizens' Trust Company, a corporation duly incorporated and chartered under the laws of Georgia, and doing and carrying on a banking business, and was a bank in said state and county, and city of Augusta, Georgia, and as such officer and director of said corporation and bank being by law charged with the fair and legal administration of its affairs, the said Citizens' Trust Company, then and there pending, and during the said official charge and responsibility of the said B. Sherwood Dunn, did then and there be and become fraudulently insolvent, contrary to the laws of said state, the good order, peace, and dignity thereof." The accused demurred, upon the ground that no criminal offense was charged, because the statute under which the indictment was framed applies only to officers of a chartered bank, and the indictment shows on its face that the accused was not an officer of a chartered bank, and because the officers of a chartered trust company are not punishable for its insolvency, whether fraudulent or not. The demurrer was overruled, and the accused excepted.

[1] 1. Under section 204 of the Penal Code "every insolvency of a chartered bank" "shall be deemed fraudulent," and the president and directors punished therefor, unless they can show that the affairs of the bank have been fairly and legally administered. In Youmans v. State, 7 Ga. App. 101, 66 S. E. 383, the act of 1833 was discussed at length. It was there held that, notwithstanding we now have no state banks of issue, the act has not become obsolete, but is applicable to any chartered bank. It was further held in that case that it was competent for the General Assembly to prescribe, as a rule of evidence, as was done in the act under consideration, that mere proof of the insolvency of a chartered bank raises a presumption against the officers named in the act that the insolvency was fraudulent and that the officers thus named participated in the fraud. By the very letter of the statute it applies only to chartered banks, and therefore, unless the indictment sufficiently charges that the corporation of which the plaintiff in error was a director was a chartered bank, the indictment is fatally defective. His contention is that the allegations of the indictment show that the company in which he was director was not a chartered bank, but a trust company organized under the provisions of the act of 1898 (Acts 1898, p. 78), codified in article 8 of the Civil Code, section 2815 et seq.

The indictment charges that the Citizens' Trust Company "was a corporation duly chartered under the laws of Georgia." So there can be no question that it is sufficiently alleged that the company was duly chartered. It is further averred that the company "was doing and carrying on a banking business and was a bank." Having alleged in one place that the company was duly chartered and in another that it was a bank, it is clear that it sufficiently appears in the indictment that the corporation was "a chartered bank." It is contended that the very name of the corporation shows it was a trust company, and not a bank; but there is no statute in this state, like there is in some others, requiring that the word "bank" shall appear in the name of every corporation clothed with banking powers. Certainly it was not essential that the word "incorporated," or "chartered," and the word "bank" should have appeared in the indictment in juxtaposition. It is enough if it appears from the indictment as a whole that the institution was a chartered bank; that is to say, a corporation clothed with the powers usually exercised by banking institutions. Since the Citizens' Trust Company may be a bank, and as it is alleged to be a bank duly chartered under the laws of this state and engaged in the banking business, the indictment was not subject to the demurrer.

[2] 2. It seems to have been conceded, however, that the Citizens' Trust Company was organized under the act of 1898, appearing in Civil Code, § 2815 et seq., and as the point can be made upon the trial, we deem it proper to express our views upon the main question sought to be raised by the demurrer, viz., whether an institution incorporated under the act of 1898 is a "chartered bank," within the meaning of the provisions of the act of 1833, codified in section 204 of the Penal Code. The mere fact that a company organized under the act of 1898 may exercise some of the functions of a bank would not make it a bank within the meaning of a penal law, subject to a strict construction in favor of one charged with its violation. Mercantile National Bank v. New York, 121 U. S. 138, 7 Sup. Ct. 826, 30 L. Ed. 895; State v. Reid, 125 Mo. 43, 28 S. W. 172; Wells Fargo Co. v. Northern Pacific Railway Co. (C. C.) 23 Fed. 469; Nash v. Brown, 165 Mass. 384, 43 N. E. 180; Jenkins v. Neff, 163 N. Y. 320, 57 N. E. 408; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 791. In the Youmans Case, supra, this court held that section 204 would not be so strictly construed as to exclude all banks save banks of issue, such as were in existence when the act of 1833 was passed, but that the section, having been re-enacted in the several Codes, would now apply to all corporations clothed with the functions and carrying on the business of banks. Assuming that the Citizens' Trust Company was incorporated under the act of 1898, the question is, Is it a "chartered bank?" or, to state the question somewhat differently, Does the act of 1898 confer upon persons incorporated under its provisions the powers and functions usually exercised by banks?

[3] 3. Banks are of three kinds: Banks of deposit, which include savings banks and all others which receive money on deposit; banks of discount, being those which lend money on collateral or by means of discounts of commercial paper; and banks of circulation, which issue bank notes payable to bearer. Rapalje & L. Law Dict. tit. "Bank." "A bank is an institution for the custody and loan of money, the exchange and transmission of the same by means of bills and drafts, and the issuance of its own promissory notes, payable to bearer, as currency, or for the exercise of one or more of these functions." 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 789. A bank is "an institution usually incorporated, with power to issue its promissory notes, intended to circulate as money (known as bank notes), or to receive the money of others, on general deposit, to form a joint fund that shall be used by the institution for its own benefit, for one or more of the purposes of making temporary loans and discounts, of dealing in foreign and domestic bills of exchange, coin, bullion, credits, and the remission of money, or with both these powers, and with privileges, in addition to these basic powers, of receiving deposits and making collections for the holders of negotiable paper, if the institution sees fit to engage in such business." See, also, Boone on Banking, § 3, p. 6; Bolles on Banking, 2; 1 Morse on Banks and Banking (4th Ed.) § 2, p. 6.

When the General Assembly re-enacted the act of 1833 as found in the Code, the term "bank," as therein used, must have been understood in the sense in which it is commonly accepted; that is, to apply only to an institution exercising the main functions of a bank, such as receiving money on general or special deposit, discounting commercial paper in the usual course of trade, and lending money on approved collateral. The functions of a bank in this state are prescribed by statute and are limited. In addition to the usual powers of corporations, a bank is authorized "to hold, purchase, dispose of, and convey such real and personal property as may be necessary for its uses and business; to discount bills, notes, or other evidences of debt; to receive and pay out deposits, with or without interest; to receive, on special deposit, money or bullion, or foreign coins, or stock, or bonds, or other securities; to buy or sell foreign or domestic exchange, or other negotiable paper; to lend money upon personal security, or upon pledges of bonds, stocks, or negotiable securities; to take and receive security, by mortgage or otherwise, on property real or personal; to increase or decrease the capital stock in the manner hereinafter provided." Civil Code, § 2266 (6), (7), (8). The words "chartered bank," as used in section 204 of the Penal Code, refer to a corporation having the powers, and exercising in whole or in part, as the main object of its creation, the functions, prescribed by section 2266 of the Civil Code. In other words, if a chartered institution has for its primary object the exercise of all or some of the principal functions prescribed by this statute, it is a chartered bank. If such was not the main purpose of its organization, it is not a chartered bank within the meaning of the penal law under which the indictment was framed.

[4] 4. Under the Constitution of this state all charters to "banking" companies shall be issued and granted by the Secretary of State. Civil Code, § 6446. It has been held that the act of 1898, "authorizing the Secretary of State to grant charters to trust companies with banking privileges," is not violative of this provision of the Constitution. Mulherin v. Kennedy, 120 Ga. 1080, 48 S. E. 437. The precise question now being dealt with was not involved in that decision. The General Assembly may constitutionally authorize the Secretary of State to incorporate a trust company, with some of the incidental powers usually exercised by banks; but this does not mean that such an institution would be a chartered bank within the meaning of the Penal Code. At least prior to the act of 1898 the superior courts could grant charters to companies to perform many, if not all, of the functions exercised by trust companies under the act of 1898. The act of August 13, 1910, is a recognition of this. Acts 1910, p. 98. But a company so incorporated, no matter what its powers, could not be said to be a "chartered bank," for banks, since the Constitution of 1877, can only be incorporated by the Secretary of State.

[5] 5. The powers of a trust company incorporated under the act of 1898 are set forth in section 2817 of the Civil Code. In general, these powers are those which are necessary or proper to be exercised by one performing the functions of a trustee for an individual or a body corporate, or of a legal representative of an estate, or as guardian, receiver, and the like. They bear little or no similarity to the powers usually conferred upon banking institutions. It is true a trust company under the act has power "to receive deposits of trust moneys, securities and other personal property from any person or corporation and to loan money on real estate or personal securities." But it does not, like a bank, receive money on deposit subject to check, or engage in the business of discounting commercial paper in the usual course of business, as a bank does. The lending of money is one of the functions of a bank, but this does not make every money lender a banker. Receiving money or securities on special deposit for safe-keeping is another function of a bank, but it does not follow that every such fiduciary is engaged in the business of banking. These powers conferred under the act of 1898 are merely incidental to the main object of the enactment, which is to authorize bodies corporate under the statute to act as guardian, executor, receiver, or other trustee, and as such (but not as a bank) to exercise certain incidental powers, some of which are also performed by banks. It seems clear that a company which is incorporated merely as a trust company under the act of 1898 is not a chartered bank.

[6] 6. The foregoing discussion has proceeded upon the assumption that the corporation has acquired only the special powers conferred by the act of 1898, and has not availed itself of the privilege granted in paragraph 12 of section 2817, which provides that any company incorporated under the act "may acquire and exercise all the rights and privileges and be subject to the same liabilities and restrictions as apply to banks, upon compliance with the laws of this state providing for the incorporation and regulating the business of banks." This provision is itself a legislative declaration that a company organized under the act is not to be regarded as a bank unless it "complies with the laws of this state providing for the incorporation and regulating the business of banks"; that is to say, unless it applies for and has granted to it a charter as a bank under the provisions of section 2262 of the Civil Code. In this connection it is also significant that under section 2821 any savings bank, or trust, security, or guarantee company, incorporated before the act of 1898, and having a paid-up capital of not less than $100,000, may obtain the privileges conferred by the act upon complying with certain specified conditions. It is manifest that the General Assembly intended to put companies incorporated under the act in a class by themselves, having only the powers conferred, and subject alone to the liabilities and restrictions imposed, by the act and by such general laws as apply to all corporate bodies.

[7] 7. If, however, a trust company incorporated under the act of 1898 should apply for and obtain a charter as a bank, then it would be "subject to the same liabilities and restrictions as apply to banks," civil as well as penal. It would then become a chartered bank. It would be both a trust company and a bank. There is no constitutional objection to the General Assembly conferring upon trust companies banking privileges, nor upon banks the functions of a trust company. If the latter should be done, the institution would not cease to be a bank; and if the former, it would become a bank, though retaining, in addition to its banking privileges, the functions of a trust company. If this should be done, the company would be invested with all the functions of a bank, and not with some of them merely, and hence the authorities cited above and relied on by counsel for plaintiff in error would not be applicable.

[8] 8. There is nothing in the indictment to indicate whether the Citizens' Trust Company was incorporated under the act of 1898, or whether, if so, it has availed itself of the privilege conferred by that act and obtained a charter as a bank. There is some doubt whether we ought to take judicial cognizance of the company's charter, and we prefer to leave this an open question. See Atlanta & West Point R. Co. v. Atlanta Railroad Co., 124 Ga. 125, 52 S. E. 320; Atlanta Terra Cotta Co. v. Georgia Railway Co., 132 Ga. 537, 64 S. E. 563; White v. Atlanta Railroad Co., 5 Ga. App. 308, 63 S. E. 234; Hartwell Ry. Co. v. Kidd, 10 Ga. App. 771, 74 S. E. 310. If the courts can take judicial cognizance of what appears on the executive minutes or files of the government (Ragland v. Barringer, 41 Ga. 114), there would seem to be no good reason why they ought not to notice judicially any matter of public record in any of the departments of the government, such as charters in the office of the Secretary of State, or the rules and regulations of the Railroad Commission, and the like.

[9] 9. Upon the trial of the present case the burden will be upon the state to show that the Citizens' Trust Company is a chartered bank. If it should appear that the company was incorporated under the act of 1898, and given only the powers conferred by that act, then, under the view we take of the law, the defendant cannot be convicted under the indictment. On the other hand, if it should appear that, in addition to having been incorporated under that act, the company has applied for and obtained a charter as a bank, as provided in paragraph 12 of section 2817 of the act, the company is to be regarded as a chartered bank, within the meaning of section 204 of the Penal Code. Judgment affirmed.

BLACK v. STATE. (No. 4,405.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PERJURY (§ 25*)—INDICTMENT—EVIDENCE. "An indictment for perjury should specifically allege, and the proof should show, how and wherein the testimony upon which the perjury is assigned was material to the issue in the trial in which the alleged false testimony was delivered." Askew v. State, 3 Ga. App. 79 (1), 59 S. E. 311.

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 125*)—PERJURY—SEPARATE STATEMENTS.

"In a prosecution for perjury, it is permissible to join in a single count * * * a number of separate and distinct material statements alleged to have been falsely sworn to by the defendant in the same legal investigation." McLaren v. State, 4 Ga. App. 643, 62 S. E. 138. And if perjury is established as to any one of the material statements, a conviction will be upheld.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 334-400; Dec. Dig. § 125.*]

3. PERJURY (§ 11*)—INDICTMENT—MATERIALITY OF EVIDENCE.

"The question whether or not a particular statement is material depends upon the nature of the proceedings and the matters at issue, and can be determined in each case for that case only." A test of materiality is whether the alleged false statement could have influenced the decision as to the question at issue in the judicial proceeding in which the perjury is alleged to have been committed. If the statement influenced the decision of the tribunal to which it was made, it was material to the investigation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perjury, Cent. Dig. §§ 38-54; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

4. PERJURY (§ 1*)—WHAT CONSTITUTES—SEVERAL FALSE STATEMENTS.

Perjury consists of willfully, knowingly, absolutely, and falsely testifying in a matter material to the issue under investigation in a judicial proceeding; and the design of the statute is to punish the false witness and prevent this detestable offense, which is subversive of justice; but the punishment is directed against the moral obloquy of the witness as a whole, and consequently, though more than one false statement be willfully made by the witness on the same trial, he does not thereby become guilty of more than one offense of perjury. The gist of the offense of perjury is the disregard and corrupt violation of the oath which the witness has taken, and the offense is complete if there be one false statement willfully, knowingly, and absolutely made with intent to obscure or conceal the truth. The fact that the witness has made other knowingly false statements under the same oath does not create new offenses, for the sanctity of the oath has already been violated by him, though the concurrence of other similarly false statements may supply ground for the imposition of a heavier penalty than would otherwise have been imposed. It is proper, too, where a witness has willfully, knowingly, absolutely, and falsely testified as to more than one matter material to the issue, to allege each of the false statements, because proof that the alleged perjurer has in the same judicial investigation made other false statements may tend to illustrate the motive with which each statement was made.

Error from Superior Court, Whitfield County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

George Black was convicted of perjury, and brings error. Reversed.

Maddox, McCamy & Shumate, of Dalton, for plaintiff in error. T. C. Milner, Sol. Gen., of Cartersville, and Geo. W. Stevens, of Atlanta, for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The defendant was indicted for the offense of perjury. He filed a plea of former jeopardy, attaching thereto a copy of another indictment for perjury against him and a copy of the record of his acquittal upon that charge. The plea of autrefois acquit and the issue formed upon the defendant's plea of not guilty in the present case were, by consent of counsel, tried together, and the jury found against the plea in bar and returned a verdict of guilty. The defendant moved for a new trial, and excepts to the judgment overruling the motion.

[4] The question presented is whether one who has taken a lawful oath as a witness in a judicial investigation, and who as such witness, knowingly and willfully makes more than one absolutely false statement as to more than one matter material to the issue, can more than once commit the offense of perjury in the same investigation and under the sanctity of the same oath. We are of the opinion that the identity of the proceeding and of the oath administered the witness excludes the possibility that the witness is guilty of more than one perjury in the particular investigation. There is but one violation of the oath.

The offense of perjury is most detestable. The perjurer should be most severely punished, for the administration of justice depends upon the truth, and perjury would undermine and destroy the administration of justice; and yet, to our mind, the matter is not unlike a case of murder, in which the murderer may have poisoned, stabbed, and shot the deceased, and thereafter, before life had become completely extinct, cast his victim into the sea, where, in his helpless condition, he must necessarily be drowned. Though evidence might show that any one of the instrumentalities which the murderer set in motion would, in a very short time, have produced the desired result of killing the person assaulted, there could not be more than one case of murder. Evidence might show that the deceased would have died from poison if he had not been shot, and that he would have died from the shot if he had neither been poisoned nor stabbed, and that he would have bled to death from the stabbing if he had neither been shot nor poisoned, and that he would certainly have died from one or all three attacks made upon him if he had not been cast into the sea; and yet it cannot be held that there could be four cases of murder growing out of the death of the deceased.

And so we apprehend the rule to be in regard to perjury. The witness binds himself by the sanctity of his oath, and calls upon God to witness that in the particular legal investigation in which he is sworn he will tell only the truth. If, as to any matter material to the issue, he willfully, knowingly, absolutely, and falsely violates this oath, intentionally testifying that which he knows to be untrue, he is guilty of perjury; but the repetition of other falsehoods under the same oath and in the same investigation cannot make new and additional cases of perjury, because his oath has already been violated, its sanctity has been destroyed, and the vital force of his self-assumed obligation has been extinguished. The oath remains; the judicial proceeding is still continuing, but the sanctity of his obligation has been destroyed by the first willful falsehood, and it cannot be restored by any act within his power on the one hand, nor is an additional offense committed by any repetition of any number of false statements upon his part on the other. The administration of the oath and voluntary subjection to its binding authority is exhausted, so far as the particular investigation is concerned, when the witness has willfully, knowingly, absolutely, and falsely testified as to one material matter.

[2] Subsequent falsehoods under the same oath do not make new perjuries, but only exhibit additional ways in which the perjury was committed, and therefore, as was held in the McLaren Case, 4 Ga. App. 643, 62 S. E. 138, a number of separate and distinct material statements, alleged to have been falsely sworn to, may be joined in the same count. If the defendant is guilty as to any one of them, he is guilty of perjury; and if the evidence shows he is guilty of more than one false statement, either may illustrate the defendant's knowledge that he was swearing falsely, and illustrate as well the fact that the false statement was intentionally and willfully made.

[1] The question, then, is presented as to whether the alleged false statement in the indictment, on which the defendant had previously been tried, was material. If it was, the acquittal of the accused upon that indictment would bar any further prosecution for perjury alleged to have been committed in the particular judicial investigation. If the statements alleged to have been knowingly, willfully, and falsely made in the indictment upon which the accused had been tried were not material to the issue, then the plea in bar would be worthless. In the former case in which the defendant in this case was tried it was alleged in the indictment that he willfully, knowingly, absolutely, and falsely swore that he was a single man, when in truth and in fact he was not a single man, but was a married man, and an investigation of the testimony in the record shows that, while this testimony was apparently irrelevant and immaterial, it was, in the case in which the defendant was testifying, a material matter, because it was the statement of a fact which, if true, would very likely have influenced the jury in the case then pending, and in which the defendant was a witness.

The case in which Black was a witness was that of Mrs. Maynard against the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company, an action for damages alleged to have been caused by the railroad company's negligence in setting out fire by sparks, which burned her two-story frame storehouse. The material question in that case was the extent of Black's knowledge as to the origin of the fire. He testified in that trial that he was at the store about ten minutes before the fire, and that the fire caught near the stove flue. If the defendant had testified truthfully that he was a married man, the jury might have doubted his statement that he was at Mrs. Maynard's house at a late hour of the night on which the fire occurred. He swore he was a single man, which would naturally cause the jury to give credence to the statement that he was visiting there at a late hour at night and that he saw the fire start—that it started from the stove flue, and not from sparks thrown out from the railroad company's train. And while it was not at first apparent that his false statement that he was a single man would or could be material, an investigation of the record as a whole shows that it was necessarily material, because, if the jury believed it to be true, it tended to supply a reason for his absence from home and his presence at Mrs. Maynard's storehouse on the night of the fire, and thus corroborated other testimony tending to show that the railroad company was not liable in the proceeding then pending.

It is true that under the ruling in the Askew Case, 3 Ga. App. 79, 59 S. E. 811, the indictment under which the accused was previously tried may have been subject to demurrer, in that it did not allege how or why the alleged false testimony was material in the trial of the case of Mrs. Maynard against the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company; but since that point is not involved, it merely becomes a question as to whether or not the fact of Black's marriage was material. If this was material, as we think it was, then his acquittal upon the charge of perjury, as to any matter he may have testified to in the trial of the case of Mrs. Maynard against the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company, is a bar to any further trial for any other false statement made by him under the same oath and in the course of the same judicial investigation.

[8] The test which has uniformly been applied in determining whether a former prosecution is a bar to another is the solution of the question as to whether the two accusations refer to the same transaction, or, in other words, whether, under the two different charges, it is sought to punish the accused more than once for the same criminal act. If the two offenses spring out of the same transaction, an acquittal or conviction in one is a bar to any further prosecution. Ingram v. State, 124 Ga. 449, 52 S. E. 759, and citations; Gully v. State, 116 Ga. 527, 42 S. E. 790; Burch v. State, 4 Ga. App. 384, 61 S. E. 503; Whitaker v. State, 9 Ga. App. 213, 70 S. E. 990. The defendant having been acquitted of perjury in swearing falsely in the case of Mrs. Maynard against the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company, he cannot again be tried for an alleged perjury which he is charged to have committed in the same case and under the same oath alleged in the former indictment. Burch v. State, 4 Ga. App. 384, 61 S. E. 503; People v. Stephens, 79 Cal. 423, 21 Pac. 356, 4 L. R. A. 845; Triplett v. Commonwealth, 84 Ky. 193, 1 S. W. 84; U. S. v. Lee, 4 Cranch, C. C. 446, Fed. Cas. No. 15,586; Jackson v. State, 14 Ind. 327; State v. Egglest, 41 Iowa, 574, 20 Am. Rep. 612.

In the first indictment for perjury the state was required to prove that Black was lawfully sworn; that he consciously assumed the obligation of the oath, with an understanding of its purpose and obligation; that after being so sworn he willfully and knowingly testified absolutely falsely as to a matter which was of sufficient materiality as to influence the finding of the jury in the case then pending. If the state failed to prove any of these material essentials of the crime of perjury, and an acquittal resulted, the defendant is none the less protected by his plea of former jeopardy; for the plea of former adjudication extends, not only to what was proved on the former trial, but also to everything that could properly have been proved.

For another reason it would seem that the plea of former jeopardy would be good, if we are right in holding that there can only be one indictment predicated upon false testimony under the same oath, because the verdict acquitting Black would be conclusive upon the state, and constitute an estoppel by judgment upon the point that Black was not sworn as a witness in the case of Mrs. Maynard against the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company. An inspection of the record in the former trial of Black for perjury shows that the defendant at that time admitted that he had testified as stated in the bill of indictment. The court charged the jury that the facts testified to by him were material to the issue in the case of Mrs. Maynard against the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company, and thus the only defense left open to Black was whether or not a lawful oath was administered. This issue the jury found against the state, and the finding of the jury in that case is conclusive in this. We think, therefore, that the trial judge erred in refusing to grant a motion for new trial.

Judgment reversed.

HANSON v. STATE. (No. 5,044.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 30, 1913.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

LARCENY (§ 32*)—THEFT OF PAPERS—INDICTMENT.

An indictment framed under section 163 of the Penal Code of 1910 need not allege ownership of the paper taken and carried away.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Cent. Dig. §§ 81-92, 99; Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

J. B. Hanson was convicted of larceny, and brings error. Affirmed.

Green, Tilson & McKinney, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Hugh M. Dorsey, Sol. Gen., El. A. Stephens, and Alonso Field, all of Atlanta, for the State.

POTTLE, J. The accused was convicted under an indictment charging a violation of section 163 of the Penal Code, which is as follows: "If any person shall take and carry away any paper, document, deed, will, or other writing relating to real or personal estate, with an intention to impair, prevent, or render difficult the establishment of a title to real or personal estate, or mutilate, cancel, burn, or otherwise destroy said paper, document, deed, will, or other writing, with the intention aforesaid, he shall be guilty of simple larceny, and be punished by imprisonment and labor in the penitentiary for not less than one year nor longer than three years." The indictment charged the wrongful and fraudulent taking and carrying away of the deed from J. B. Hanson to J. M. Casey to certain real estate. It also averred that Hanson obtained the deed from Casey upon false and fraudulent representations, for the alleged purpose of placing the deed in a safety deposit box in a bank which had been rented for Casey; that the deed was never in fact placed in the safety deposit box, but was carried away and retained by the accused, with the intention to impair, prevent, and render difficult the establishment of the title to the tract of land described in the deed. The accused made a motion in arrest of judgment, upon the ground that the indictment failed to allege to whom the deed belonged. The motion was overruled, and he excepted.

It is contended that since the section of the Code under which the indictment was framed designates the offense as simple larceny, and as in an indictment for simple larceny it is necessary to allege ownership of the property, the indictment is fatally defective. The question as to whether it is necessary to allege ownership depends, not upon what the offense is designated, but upon the language of the statute. It is not essential in every form of larceny under the statutes of this state that ownership of the property taken shall be alleged. For example, under section 172 of the Penal Code, larceny from the person is defined to be "the wrongful and fraudulent taking of money, goods, chattels, or effects, or any article of value, from the person of another, privately without his knowledge, in any place whatever, with intent to steal the same." It has been held that under this statute it is not necessary to allege ownership of the property stolen. Hugo v. State, 110 Ga. 768, 36 S. E. 60. In that case it is pointed out that in the definition of simple larceny the property taken is described as "the personal goods of another," and hence that an indictment under that section must allege that the goods taken belonged to some person and identify the owner; whereas, under the language of the statute defining larceny from the person, it is only necessary to allege that the property was taken from the person of another in the manner described in the statute, that proof of that person's possession of the property would raise a presumption of ownership, and in the absence of anything to the contrary the presumption would become conclusive.

The gist of the offense defined in section 163 is the taking and carrying away of any paper described in that section, with intent to impair, prevent, or render difficult the establishment of "a title" to real or personal estate, or the destruction of such paper with the intention aforesaid. The deed described in the indictment bears on its face evidence of a title. It is not necessary to allege whose title, nor to whom the deed belonged; such allegations being merely matters of description, and not elements in the offense. The indictment alleges that the deed was taken from the possession of one Casey, with intention to impair, prevent, or render difficult the establishment of the title to Casey. It was taken from his possession, and was presumptively his deed. It is immaterial, however, under the statute, whose deed it was, because, if it was taken away from Casey with the intention to impair the title of anybody, an offense was committed under the statute. This case differs from Norfleet v. State, 9 Ga. App. 853, 72 S. E. 447, which was reaffirmed in Guyton v. State, 12 Ga. App. 562, 77 S. E. 830. In those cases it was held that it is necessary to allege ownership in an indictment framed under sections 192, 194 of the Penal Code, charging larceny after a trust. These decisions were placed upon the construction given by the court of those sections, and particularly upon the language therein making it a necessary element of the crime that the property shall have been intrusted for the use or benefit of the owner or other person delivering it. It was held merely that, where the violation of the trust is a failure to apply the property to the use and benefit of some person other than the person delivering it, the indictment must allege that the other is the owner of the property.

Without deciding whether a demurrer would have been good, we hold that the motion in arrest of judgment was properly overruled. Judgment affirmed.

BROWN v. STATE. (No. 4,951.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 30, 1913.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. RULINGS ON EVIDENCE.

The objections to the admissibility of testimony are without merit.

2. INSTRUCTIONS.

The charge of the court correctly states the law applicable to the issues made by the evidence, and the assignments of error as to excerpts from the charge are not well founded.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 762*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EXPRESSION OF OPINION.

Where the evidence showed that the accused was drunk at the time he committed the offense, an instruction to the jury that "voluntary drunkenness is no excuse for crime" is not subject to exception on the ground that it was an expression of opinion on the facts.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 942*)—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

The alleged newly discovered evidence was merely impeaching in character and there was no abuse of discretion in overruling this ground of the motion for a new trial.

5. VOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER.

The evidence presented the theory of voluntary manslaughter, and the judge properly charged the law on that subject.

Error from Superior Court, Meriwether County; R. W. Freeman, Judge.

Andrew J. (alias Bud) Brown was convicted of crime, and brings error. Affirmed.

McLaughlin & Jones, of Greenville, for plaintiff in error. J. R. Terrell, Sol. Gen., of Greenville, for the State.

HILL, C. J. Judgment affirmed.

ALEXANDER v. CITY OF ATLANTA.

(No. 4,555.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 30, 1913.)

1. GAMING (§ 75*)—KEEPING GAMING HOUSE—EVIDENCE.

The agreed statement of facts discloses a very plain violation of the law of this state which forbids keeping a gaming house. Pen. Code, 1910, § 389. One who permits others to assemble in a house or room which is in his control and play game of chance in which anything of value is hazarded is guilty of keeping a gaming house, regardless of his purpose in permitting the game.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Gaming, Cent. Dig. §§ 189, 190-201; Dec. Dig. § 75.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 592*)—ORDINANCES—VALIDITY.

In the absence of express statutory authorization to the municipality, a municipal ordinance which attempts to punish for an act which has been penalized by a law of the state is void. When the state prescribes a punishment for an act as a crime, its jurisdiction to punish for that act is exclusive, unless the right to punish for it has been expressly delegated to a subordinate department of the government.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1811-1814; Dec. Dig. § 592.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

T. C. Alexander was convicted of violating an ordinance of the City of Atlanta. On certiorari, the judgment of conviction was affirmed, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Moore & Branch, of Atlanta, for plaintiff in error. Jos. L. Mayson and W. D. Ellis, Jr., both of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff in error was tried before the recorder of the city of Atlanta, charged with a violation of a municipal ordinance under which it was made unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to conduct or carry on any business in the city of Atlanta by means of any wheel or similar device in which the elements of chance are used for the purpose of attracting trade. The case was tried before the recorder upon an agreed statement of facts, and resulted in the conviction of the accused. Upon certiorari to the superior court, the certiorari was overruled, and the judgment of the recorder thereby affirmed.

Two defenses are presented by the writ of error: (1) That the evidence does not show that the accused was guilty of any offense; and (2) that it was not within the power of the municipal court to punish the accused, for the reason that the ordinance is void, because it is covered by the state law, and attempts to punish for the same acts for which provision is made by the state law.

[1] 1. In view of what we shall hold as to the second contention of the plaintiff in error, it would seem unnecessary to rule upon the first point, were it not for the fact that the determination of the question as to whether the accused was shown to have been guilty of a violation of a state law renders plain our duty under the law in ruling upon the second point. According to the agreed statement of facts, the accused had in charge in his place of business a species of slot machine, in which, if one deposited a nickel, he was certain to receive in return a package of chewing gum, with the chance of winning with the next nickel 20 trade checks, which could be exchanged for 20 drinks of beer. The instrument itself developed the occasion when this profitable return for the investment of a nickel could be received, but naturally there was always in the mind of the player the expectation, when he deposited his nickel, that the next turn of the wheel would bring the indication or announcement of the coveted 20 trade checks. We agree with counsel for defendant in error that "the machine described in the agreed statement of facts is a perfection of invention in concealing its true purpose. As described, it might be mistaken for an alms box beside a church door, but it has its fangs."

According to the evidence, one of the results of this fascinating game was that on Saturdays the machine would sell from 75 to 100 packages of gum, and would attract crowds of spectators; as well as participants, while it was being operated. There can be no doubt that the agreed statement of facts showed the defendant to be guilty of a violation of the state law as to the offense of keeping a gaming house. Penal Code, § 389. The contention is made that the operation of the machine cannot be considered as a game of chance, for in any event, and for every nickel deposited, the player received the value of his money. This is true, and if this were the whole truth the statute would not be violated. But the player stands a chance to get 20 times the value of his deposit in the slot, and it is the pressure of this chance that continues the progress of the game and makes it a game of chance. Meyer v. State, 112 Ga. 20, 37 S. E. 96, 51 L. R. A. 496, 81 Am. St. Rep. 17; Whitley v. McConnell, 133 Ga. 788, 66 S. E. 933, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 287, 134 Am. St. Rep. 223.

In order to commit the offense of gaming it is not necessary that money be the stake; the statute penalizes also playing for anything of value. The 20 trade checks, according to the statement of facts, have a value of $1; and as gaming does not necessarily consist in playing for money, it is not necessary for a violation of the law against keeping a gaming house, that money shall be hazarded. One who permits others, with his knowledge, to come together and play in a house or room, which is under his control, for articles of value other than money, is just as guilty as if money alone was at stake.

[2] 2. Having reached the conclusion that the defendant is guilty of keeping a gaming house, it is of course clear that it is not within the power of the city of Atlanta to punish for this offense. The ordinance attempts to avoid the effect of the usual rule upon this subject by penalizing only such gaming as may be done in the conduct or carrying on of other business, and for the purpose of attracting trade. The statute of the state forbids the keeping of a gaming house, no matter what may be the purpose with which it is kept, and as much denounces the offense if the purpose is to attract trade on the part of those who are engaged in a business as it does in a case where such a consideration is wholly foreign to the intentions of the keeper of the gaming house. When the state assumes to punish for the commission of an act which it has denounced as a crime, its reservation of jurisdiction is absolutely exclusive. It reserves to itself the sole right to punish the offender, not only in the maintenance of its own dignity, and with a view to uniformity of procedure and penalty, but also in order to protect the citizen from being twice placed in jeopardy, or from being twice punished for the same offense. There is no exception to this rule, save where the state expressly delegates to some subordinate department of the government the right, in its stead, to punish for the particular act forbidden by the state law.

The enactment by a municipality of an ordinance against the keeping of a gaming house by one who is carrying on a business, and whose purpose in keeping the gaming house or gambling device in a house under his control is merely to attract trade, is absolutely futile, because the statute of the state forbids the keeping of a gaming house by any person, and does not permit it for any purpose, and the addition in the ordinance of descriptive terms applicable to only one class of persons who might keep gaming houses does not add a single additional element to the constituents of the state offense, or subtract a single ingredient therefrom.

The decision of this case is practically controlled by the ruling of this court in Cotton v. Atlanta, 10 Ga. App. 897, 73 S. E. 683. This case differs from that of Athens v. Atlanta, 6 Ga. App. 244, 64 S. E. 711, and other similar cases which are cited, and the rulings in those cases will not be extended. This court, recognizing the extreme difficulty attending the enforcement of the regulations prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating liquors, went to the extreme limit allowable under the peculiar circumstances of those cases.

Nothing is better settled than that a municipal ordinance which attempts to interfere in the enforcement of a state statute, or attempts to assume jurisdiction of offenses which are cognizable alone under the laws of the state, is absolutely void. For this reason, in the absence of any express grant to the city of Atlanta in its charter, the ordinance under which the accused was convicted is void, his conviction was unauthorized, and the judge of the superior court erred in not sustaining the certiorari.

Judgment reversed.

This is a certiorari case involving $25. On appeal to a jury in the justice's court a verdict was directed for the plaintiff. While a justice of the peace has no authority to direct a verdict, yet, where the evidence shows that the verdict as directed was demanded, this court will not reverse the judgment of the superior court, refusing to sustain the certiorari, on the sole ground that the verdict was directed by the justice. *Meeks v. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§§ 224, 236*)—ILLEGAL SALE—EVIDENCE.

This case falls within the well-settled rule that on a trial for selling intoxicating liquor a prima facie case is made out for the state by proof of a delivery of the whisky by the accused and payment to him of money or other thing of value by the purchaser. If the accused defends upon the ground that he was acting solely as agent for the purchaser, the burden is upon the accused to show that he was not interested in the sale, received no benefit therefrom, and acted solely as agent for the buyer. McGovern v. State, 11 Ga. App. 267, 74 S. E. 1101. In the present case the accused did not carry this burden; nor was there any evidence which authorized an instruction upon this theory. None of the assignments of error are meritorious.

However, we decline to consider this point, because the question as to constitutionality of the statute is not presented in the specific mode required by law, and was not raised in the lower court. *First National Bank of Senoia v. Exceptions to the answer to a petition for certiorari must be filed in writing, and notice thereof given to the opposite party before the case is called in its order for hearing. Exceptions to the answer, and traverse of the answer are both means for perfecting it, and of presenting to the reviewing court what actually transpired upon the trial in the lower court. But, if both exception and traverse are filed in the same case, the court should act on the exception before disposing of the traverse. Civ. Code 1910, § 5196; Thomas v. State, 7 Ga. App. 638, 67 S. E. 894.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Certiorari, Cent. Dig. § 138; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

2. CERTIORARI (§ 54*)—EXCEPTIONS TO ANSWER.

If no notice of the exceptions is given the opposite party until after the trial upon the traverse, the exceptions are too late, and may properly be stricken.

3. CERTIORARI (§ 56*)—TRAVERSE TO ANSWER—SUFFICIENCY.

A traverse to the answer to a petition for certiorari is sufficiently definite when the particular portion of the answer which it is sought to contradict and disprove is specifically referred to and denied, and it is positively stated that a specific portion of the petition, identified by reference thereto, relates the truth with regard to the point at issue. Civ. Code 1910, § 5200.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 117*)—MATTERS REVIEWABLE—REFUSAL TO APPROVE BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

The refusal of a trial judge to approve a certain portion of a brief of evidence is not proper subject-matter of review by means of a motion for a new trial, nor can such refusal be reviewed by direct exception. The remedy, if any, is to be found in a petition for mandamus.

5. CERTIORARI (§ 62*)—DETERMINATION OF MERITS.

A final determination of the merits of a certiorari cannot be had until the issue formed upon the traverse to the answer of the inferior tribunal, whose judgment is under review, has been correctly adjudicated. The office of the traverse to the answer of an inferior judicatory is to contradict the statements of the lower court as to what actually transpired upon the trial, and if the facts in dispute are material to the issue the reviewing court cannot properly pass upon the merits of the case until it has ascertained what is the truth in relation to these facts in dispute.

6. CERTIORARI (§ 70*)—REVIEW—RULINGS ON TRAVERSE.

The court erred in striking the traverse to the eighth and ninth paragraphs of the answer of the chairman of the board of county commissioners, but exceptions to this ruling were not preserved by filing exceptions pendente lite, and the ruling is not reviewable by a motion for a new trial.

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 534*)—ACTION ON NOTE—ATTORNEY'S FEES.

A contract may be in part conditional and in part unconditional. A note, such as that which is the basis of this suit, may be unconditional, in so far as it relates to the payment of the principal and interest; but the stipulation under which the maker agrees to pay 10 per cent. on the amount of the note as attorney's fees is by law conditioned upon proof that the maker was served with the 10 days' notice required by law (Civ. Code 1910, § 4252); and for that reason attorney's fees cannot be recovered unless it appears from the answer of the defendant, or from testimony introduced upon the trial, that he was notified as required by law.

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 534*)—ACTION ON NOTE—ATTORNEY'S FEES.

Even though the suit be in default, it is error, in the absence of proof that the defendant was notified of the claim for attorney's fees as required by law, to enter judgment for attorney's fees in a suit upon a promissory note containing a stipulation for the payment of such fees.

Error from City Court of Jefferson; G. A. Johns, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Maysville against J. H. Turner and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed, with directions.

J. S. Ayers, of Jefferson, for plaintiffs in error. A. C. Brown, of Jefferson, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The Bank of Maysville brought suit upon a note, against Turner as principal and Holder as indorser, or guarantor. In the note the maker promised to pay all costs of collection, including 10 per cent. attorney's fees. The defendants filed no answer, and the judge entered judgment against them by default, as upon an unconditional contract in writing, for the amount of the note and for attorney's fees of 10 per cent. of the amount of the principal and interest. It appears from the record that there was no evidence that the notice required in section 4252 of the Civil Code had been given.

[1] This judgment was erroneous. Under the provisions of Civil Code, §§ 5660, 6295, 6296, 6516, the trial court is authorized to render judgment in all cases founded upon unconditional contracts in writing when no issuable defense is filed under oath. But since a contract may be in part conditional and in part unconditional, it is plainly to be seen that the stipulation as to attorney's fees is a conditional contract, and therefore the allegation upon the point of the notice of claim of attorney's fees must be supported by proof. If the holder of a note should settle or compromise with his debtor, he might abandon his claim for attorney's fees; and whether this happened or not, the notice required by law, and which is necessary to bind the maker of the note for the payment of attorney's fees, must be proved to have been given. The fact that the case is in default does not relieve the plaintiff from the necessity of proving that the defendant was notified, at least ten days before the return day at which suit was brought, to the effect that he expected to claim attorney's fees. A note such as that which is the basis of the pending suit may be unconditional, in so far as it relates to the payment of the principal and interest; but the stipulation under which the maker of the note agrees to pay 10 per cent. as attorney's fees is by law conditioned upon proof that the maker of the note was served with the 10 days' notice required by law (Civil Code, § 4252); and for that reason attorney's fees cannot be recovered, unless it appears from the admissions of the defendant in his answer, or from testimony introduced upon the trial, that he was notified as required by law.

[2] In the present case no effort was made to prove that the defendant was notified, and therefore the judgment against him for attorney's fees is without evidence to support it. The court entered the judgment for attorney's fees without giving the defendant an opportunity to discharge his obligation free from this burden. Mt. Vernon Bank v. Gibbs, 1 Ga. App. 662, 58 S. E. 269. In this we think the court erred; and for this reason we order that the plaintiff write off the attorney's fees which were awarded to him, as well as the sum of $37.31 excess of interest, which was included in the judgment by mistake in the calculation of the interest, and that the costs be taxed against the defendant in error.

Judgment affirmed, with direction.

1. RULINGS ON EVIDENCE.

The several assignments of error to rulings upon evidence are wholly without merit.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1163*)—HOMICIDE (§ 339*) — APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—STATEMENT OF ACCUSED.

A verdict of guilty of assault with intent to murder would have been authorized; and the evidence as a whole so demanded at least the verdict of guilty of stabbing, which was returned by the jury, that the errors in rulings as to the defendant's statement on the trial as presented in the record, are immaterial. The right of a defendant in a criminal trial "to make to the court and jury such statement in the case as he may deem proper in his defense" (Pen. Code 1910, § 1036) should not be abridged in any case. However, upon a review of the defendant's statement in the present record, it is palpably plain that this right was substantially accorded him. There was nothing in the language of the judge in his colloquy with counsel which could by any possibility have prejudiced the defendant's case; and though it is not proper practice for the court to interrupt the defendant's statement, or to attempt to direct it conformably with the rules of evidence, the matter omitted from the defendant's statement in this case, due to the rulings of the court (as appears from the statement of defendant's counsel in the record), was so trivial and inconsequential that the omission can in no view of the case be presumed to have been harmful to the accused.

1. PROCESS (§ 163*)—AMENDMENT.

The court did not err in permitting the process to be amended, so that it would bear test in the name of the presiding judge of the court, and thereafter ordering service to be perfected, returnable to a later term of the court. Upon this point the decision is controlled by the ruling of this court in Beach Lumber Company v. Baxley Banking Company, 8 Ga. App. 251-253, 68 S. E. 946. There is "no time limit by law when the amendment to writs shall be made." White v. Hart, 35 Ga. 269.

2. RAILROADS (§ 394*)—PLEADING (§ 216*)—DEMURRER—INJURY TO PERSON ON TRACK—PETITION.

There was no error in overruling the special demurrers to the plaintiff's petition, and the petition as a whole was sufficient to withstand the general demurrer. It was for the jury to say whether the wire which caused the fall of the plaintiff was the efficient proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury, or whether her injury was due to the acts of negligence alleged against the defendant; and the question could not be settled in a ruling upon demurrer. The ruling upon this point is controlled by the decision of this court in Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company v. Daniels, 8 Ga. App. 775, 70 S. E. 203.

(a) In an allegation charging that the agents of the railroad company had knowledge of a custom on the part of the public of using a portion of its tracks as a pathway, and that this portion of the track was used with the permission of those officers having charge of the tracks at that point, it is not necessary to allege by name the particular officers or employees therein referred to. The statement that the name of these agents of the company is unknown to the petitioner is sufficient designation.

(b) Construed in connection with other portions of the petition, the eighteenth paragraph, which alleged that the defendant was bound to anticipate the presence of the plaintiff upon the track, was not demurrable.

(c) The allegation of the petition in reference to the wantonness and willfulness with which the alleged injury was inflicted may be demurrable; but the demurrer itself was defective and insufficient, in that it was not specific enough to point out the defect, so as to require the judgment of the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1331-1338; Dec. Dig. § 394; *Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 535-539; Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

3. VERDICT—INSTRUCTIONS—DENIAL OF NEW TRIAL.

The evidence authorized the finding of the jury, the verdict was not excessive, the charge of the court was a full, fair, and complete presentation of the law applicable to the issues involved, and there was no error in refusing a new trial.

1. EVIDENCE (§ 434*)—FAILURE TO PERFORM—PRESUMPTION OF FRAUD.

A promise to do certain acts or perform certain services, made to induce the execution of a promissory note, though made with no intention of performance, is not such a fraud as will authorize the admission of parol evidence thereof to vary the terms of a note which contains no such stipulation.

2. EVIDENCE (§§ 429, 434*)—PAROL CONTRACTS—CONSIDERATION.

The consideration of a note is always the legitimate subject of inquiry; but where it is insisted that part of the consideration was a verbal promise, and the evidence as to such promise would completely defeat and void the written instrument by proof of negotiations and agreements which could and should properly have been included in the writing, and there is no contention that the omission of these stipulations from the contract was due to either fraud, accident, or mistake, parol evidence upon the subject should not be admitted.

3. INSURANCE (§ 184*)—PREMIUM NOTES—REBATE.

An agreement between insured and an agent of the insurer that, if the insured will take the local agency of the company, the agent will write other insurance locally without the aid of insured, and divide his commissions on same with insured, so as to provide for the payment of his premium notes, is a mere subterfuge, amounting to an illegal rebate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 184.*]

4. FRAUD (§ 20*)—WHAT CONSTITUTES—FALSE STATEMENT.

A false statement is not fraudulent, when there is no reason why it should be believed and acted upon.

Error from City Court of Madison; K. S. Anderson, Judge.

Action by J. E. McLaughlin against W. G. Thomson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Williford & Lambert, of Madison, and Saml. H. Sibley, of Union Point, for plaintiff in error. Middlebrooks & Burrus, of Madison, and Payne & Jones, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. McLaughlin sued Thomson on a promissory note for $101.19 principal. The defendant filed a plea in which he attempted to set up that he was induced by fraud to sign the note. The fraud as alleged consisted in promises by McLaughlin to Thomson to the effect that, if Thomson would take certain insurance policies from the company of which McLaughlin was agent and give notes for the premium, he would assist Thomson to write certain insurance, from which Thomson would earn more than enough commissions to pay the premium notes. It was alleged that these promises were fraudulent, because McLaughlin, at the time he made them, had no intention of complying with them. McLaughlin's promise, it was alleged, was accompanied by the statement that he would guarantee that Thomson would earn a sufficient amount in commissions, upon business which McLaughlin would help Thomson to write, to pay the note. Two notes were given; one for $151.80, and one for $101.19. Thomson paid the first note at maturity, and in his plea he asked for a recovery against McLaughlin for the amount of the paid note. The note sued on was given in renewal of the second note; and in his plea he asked that he be relieved from payment of the note sued upon, because it was fraudulent and illegally obtained, and was without consideration. The court overruled a demurrer to this plea, and, as the plaintiff did not except to this ruling, it became the law of the case, and the court was bound to adhere to it in the subsequent conduct of the trial. Georgia Northern Railway v. Hutchins, 119 Ga. 504, 46 S. E. 659; Hawkins v. Studdard, 132 Ga. 266, 68 S. E. 852, 131 Am. St. Rep. 190. Upon the trial of the case, however, the testimony developed that the representations and promises made by McLaughlin to Thomson did not amount to a fraud, and thereupon the court, as we think, correctly excluded all of the testimony which had been introduced, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff.

[2] The testimony adduced not only sought to void the note, because of fraud in procuring its execution, but it tended to vary the terms of this unconditional contract in writing, and, but for the ruling of the court upon the demurrer, none of it would have been admissible. But, conceding for the purposes of the case, and in view of the court's ruling that the testimony adduced is legally admissible, it failed to show fraud.

The history of the transaction as related by Thomson himself is that McLaughlin, as agent of the Equitable Life Assurance Society, came to Madison and induced him to take a $10,000 policy of term insurance, upon which the annual premium was $145. Subsequently McLaughlin returned to Madison and persuaded Thomson to take, instead of the $10,000 of term insurance, $9,000 of ordinary life insurance, upon which the annual premium amounted to $252.99, instead of $145, which was the premium upon the term insurance. The premium upon the $9,000 policy of insurance was divided into two notes, one for $151.80 and the other for $101.19, due upon different dates. Thomson testified that he paid the first note, upon McLaughlin's assurance that he would come to Madison and assist him in writing enough business to pay the entire premium. As a result of correspondence between the parties before the second note became due, and of McLaughlin's renewed assurance that Thomson could write enough insurance to pay the premiums, and that he was ready, at any time Thomson would designate, to go to Madison and help Thomson, the note sued on was given by Thomson to McLaughlin to cover the amount of the second note; McLaughlin paying the second note (which had been made payable to Burr, manager of insurance company).

The statements of McLaughlin, subsequent to the time when the original notes were executed, are of but little materiality, and the inquiry as to whether he was guilty of a fraud should properly be confined to what transpired prior to and at the time the first notes were executed, because Thomson is not in any worse condition by reason of renewing the note than he was when he originally gave it, and there can be no fraud unless injury of some kind results. The only purpose for which the subsequent oral and written communications could be admissible would be to illustrate the motive of McLaughlin in the representations made by him at the time that the first notes were given. McLaughlin gave Thomson the agency of the insurance company at Madison. He told him he could easily get enough business to earn therefrom a sufficient amount in commissions on premiums to pay the two premium notes which he had given. Certainly this was not such a statement as would amount to a fraud, for it related to a matter as to which Thomson's opportunity for knowledge was equal to McLaughlin's. Presumably Thomson would know better than McLaughlin how many probable insurers lived within the territory, because the evidence disclosed that McLaughlin did not live in that vicinity. McLaughlin told Thomson, and he afterward wrote to him, that he would come to Madison and lend his assistance in procuring insurance for which Thomson would be entitled to a commission on the premiums. Upon a former occasion Thomson had carried McLaughlin around Madison and introduced him to a few probable insurers. Thomson admits that he was to lend assistance, in a way, to secure names and prospects. It does not appear that he complied even with this undertaking.

Thomson further testified: "After he began to talk to me, and I had sufficient confidence in him to believe him, he assured me that I would never have it to pay; and I told him then that I was signing the note, but it was up to him to get it paid. He assured me again I would never have it to pay. I told him I did not have time to devote to the work. I signed two notes, payable to Burr, manager of the Equitable at Atlanta." He also testified: "Right at that time he asked me to take the agency for the company. He said: 'I want to get somebody here to act as agent and I want you to take the agency.' I told him I didn't have time. He said all he wanted was to have a man here, and he would come down and write the business." It is apparent from this testimony that the statement did not amount in law to a fraud, because there was no reason why Thomson should have reposed any confidence in McLaughlin, no reason why he should have believed his statement, and especially no reason why he should sign a note upon McLaughlin's assurance that he would pay it.

[1, 3] The law does not assume that one can be defrauded by such circumstances as these; for there is no reason why one should permit himself to be so defrauded. The act done is a voluntary act, with full knowledge of the law and all the probable consequences. Furthermore, the statement that McLaughlin was to do all of the work and divide his commissions with Thomson, so as to provide for the payment of Thomson's two notes, would have amounted to nothing more than a subterfuge by which Thomson would have been given the first two premiums, and this would have been a rebate, which is contrary to law. It is very apparent from the record that the court refused to strike the plea in order to enable the court to determine, from the evidence, whether the note had in fact been procured by fraud. The court may possibly have erred in not striking the plea. Upon this we are not required to rule, for there was no exception to the ruling on the demurrer. But the court did not err in ruling out all of the testimony after it was introduced, because it is very apparent that it did not support such a plea of fraud as is required by law. It is perhaps true that a fraud might have its inception in a promise made with such apparent sincerity as to deceive the promisee, but which the promisor had no intention whatever of fulfilling. In such a case the making of the promise, if there were any special reason why the promisee should have reposed confidence in the promisor, might amount to a fraud.

We do not think this case is similar in principle to a violation of the labor contract law as embodied in section 715 of the Penal Code, because a statutory rule of evidence gives vitality to the penal statute. But even if the rule applicable to that criminal statute were applied to the facts of this case, there could not be a conviction, because, under the rulings in Mulkey v. State, 1 Ga. App. 521, 57 S. E. 1022, Patterson v. State, 1 Ga. App. 782, 58 S. E. 284, and numerous succeeding cases, it must have appeared that McLaughlin entertained the intent to defraud at the time he procured the notes; and the testimony as to his subsequent conduct, as well as the letter which was introduced in evidence wholly rebuts such an inference. The evidence of Thomson himself, who was the only witness in the case, failed to establish that the notes were procured by fraud; and, regardless of the ruling of the court upon the answer, this testimony was properly ruled out.

[4] The case could have no other proper conclusion, because a false statement is not fraudulent, when there is no reason why the statement should be believed and acted upon. Branan v. Warfield & Lee, 3 Ga. App. 586, 60 S. E. 325. It must also be borne in mind that there is no contention that Thomson did not receive the policy for which he had contracted, nor that the company in which he is insured is not thoroughly solvent and able to comply with its contract of insurance. Thomson, therefore, has been as fully protected by the contract of insurance which he received in return for his notes as an insured person who paid the entire premium in cash.

Judgment affirmed.

WRIGHT v. BANK OF SOUTHWESTERN GEORGIA. (No. 4,429.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 30, 1913.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MOTION TO SET ASIDE JUDGMENT.

The ruling in this case is controlled by the decision of this court in Benford v. Shiver, 13 Ga. App.—, 78 S. E. 860.

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 27*)—JUDGMENT (§ 384*)—MOTION TO SET ASIDE—GROUND FOR NEW TRIAL.

The ground of the motion for a new trial, which asks that the judgment be set aside upon the showing made for a continuance, is in effect a motion to set aside judgment, made at the term at which the judgment was rendered; and since it was shown to the court that the defendant was providentially prevented from attending court by an illness which rendered it impossible for her to be at court, and that she had previously filed a meritorious defense, which, if supported by evidence, would have relieved her from any liability upon the notes which were the basis of the suit, the judgment should have been set aside, in order that the defendant might be heard on the substantial issue raised by the pleadings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 40, 41; Dec. Dig. § 27; **Judgment*, Cent. Dig. §§ 727-732; Dec. Dig. § 384.*]

3. CONTINUANCE (§ 47*)—HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 25*)—JUDGMENT (§ 385*)—MOTION TO SET ASIDE—PROCUREMENT OF CONTINUANCE—EVIDENCE—DUTY OF HUSBAND.

Proof that the defendant was a married woman, who was not separated from her husband, was, without more, not sufficient to disprove and impeach a defendant, who testified, on a showing for a continuance, that she had no one by whom she could send a physician's certificate or otherwise notify her counsel that she was physically unable to attend the court. Even if there be a presumption that every husband does his duty, the duty of making a showing for a continuance for his wife in a suit upon a note, evidencing a debt which was originally the debt of the defendant's first husband, is not imposed by law upon the second husband as the successor to the marital offices of his predecessor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Continuance, Cent. Dig. § 147; Dec. Dig. § 47; **Husband and Wife*, Cent. Dig. §§ 148-151, 153, 154, 525; Dec. Dig. § 25; **Judgment*, Cent. Dig. § 707; Dec. Dig. § 385.*]

4. WORDS AND PHRASES—"LIVING TOGETHER."

As applied to husband and wife, the phrase "living together" does not always import that they are living in the same place. The expression merely implies that there has been no separation, voluntary or legal, which can legally be said to have released either from their duties to the other under the strict letter of the law. Error from City Court of Leesburg; H. L. Long, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Southwestern Georgia against C. S. Wright. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

R. L. Maynard, of Americus, and Ware G. Martin, of Leesburg, for plaintiff in error. Ellis, Webb & Ellis, of Americus, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The Bank of Southwestern Georgia brought suit against Cynthia Styles Wright on two promissory notes, one dated April 25, 1903, and the other February 18, 1905. The defendant filed an answer, in which she averred that the notes were without consideration as far as she was concerned, for the reason that they were given for the debt of her former husband, Jesse Styles, and that her assumption of his debt was null and void. When the case was called for trial the defendant was absent. Her counsel stated to the court that they did not know why she was not present, and for that reason they were unable to make a showing for continuance. In the absence of a legal showing for a continuance, the trial judge very properly proceeded with the trial; and upon the introduction of testimony in behalf of the plaintiff, judgment was rendered in its favor (the case being, by consent of counsel, tried by the court without a jury).

During the term, and before the adjournment of the court, the defendant moved for a new trial. The motion for a new trial, in addition to the three general grounds, asked that the judgment be set aside and a new trial be granted upon the ground that on the date of the trial the defendant was at her home sick with malarial fever, and unable, on account of her illness, to advise her attorneys of the fact of her illness. The movant's residence was 18 miles from Leesburg, where the court was held. This special ground of the motion was supported by the affidavit of the defendant's attending physician, stating that she was suffering from chills and malarial fever, and that on July 18th (the date of the trial) she could not safely attend court, or go anywhere else, and that she still was under his treatment. It appears also from the affidavit of her counsel that she had been present at the court during every preceding term thereof since the suit was filed in March, 1911, and that when she did not appear they tried to get some information of her by telephone, but were unable to do so. The bank made a countershowing to the effect that the court was in session three days before the date upon which the judgment was rendered, and that she had sufficient time to furnish the court with proper affidavit of her sickness, if she was ill; that she failed to allege, in the affidavit filed in support of her motion for a continuance, what she would testify in the trial of the case; and, furthermore, that at the time she was a married woman and lived with her husband, Shade Wright. The trial court sustained the countershowing and refused to set aside the judgment and grant a new trial.

[1] We think this case is fully controlled by the ruling of this court in Benford v. Shiver, 78 S. E. 860.

[2] The court was fully authorized to refuse the motion for a new trial, so far as it was predicated upon the general grounds, because the testimony for the plaintiff, not being disputed, required the judgment which was rendered. We think, however, that the court erred in not setting aside the judgment and reopening the case, so as to give the defendant a day in court. While the motion under consideration was presented as a ground of a motion for a new trial, it was filed as a separate paper and after the original motion for a new trial; and though it was denominated as a ground of the motion for a new trial, it was in effect a motion to set aside the judgment. In this ground, separately filed, it is specifically asked that the judgment be set aside. This is all that was or could have been asked in the premises; for the court did not err in ruling the case to trial upon the mere showing by counsel that their client was absent. But there subsequently developed a reason why the judgment should be set aside. Generally a motion to set aside a judgment may be filed at any time within three years. Of course, therefore, it can be filed at any time within the same term; and we know of no reason why a motion to set aside a judgment should be refused merely because it may be denominated as a ground of a motion for a new trial, which must be filed during the term.

[3] In the countershowing of the plaintiff the point is made that in the defendant's showing it does not appear what she expects to testify upon another trial of the case. The absence of a party, especially the sole party upon the particular side of the case, may of itself constitute a good ground for a continuance. The defendant had the right to be present, if for no other reason than to assist her counsel in the selection of the jury and in the conduct of the case, and in suggestions upon cross-examination of witnesses for the opposite party; and she had a plea, to sustain which it was evident she might and would properly be a witness. If she had been present, probably she might have been able to inform her counsel of other sources from which information might have been derived in support of her answer. A motion to set aside a judgment is not confined, like a motion in arrest, to matter appearing upon the record, or appearing to be absent from the record; and as we pointed out in the case of Benford v. Shiver, supra (in which the facts are quite similar to those involved in this case), a judgment should be set aside when it appears that a party who had filed a substantial and meritorious defense was kept away from court under such circumstances as that the court should have continued the case upon a timely motion for a continuance, which informed the court as to the true reason of the party's absence.

A wife whose deceased husband has left no children, and who is by law his sole heir, can take his property, and, by paying his debts, avoid an administration, if all his creditors consent; and it may be that there is nothing in the defense to the effect that the debt evidenced by the notes is the debt of her deceased husband. Perhaps, however, a wife who assumes one of her husband's debts, without the consent of the other creditors, who have claims against his estate, would get no title to such property as was left by her husband. And we reverse the judgment with less reluctance because the character of the articles originally sold by the plaintiff bank to the defendant's husband is such that it may be true that, at the time the widow gave her notes in lieu of the notes given by her deceased husband to the bank, the corn, fodder, etc., had been used or dissipated; and in that case, if the husband left no other property, the making of the notes by the wife would be nothing more nor less than the assumption of her husband's debt. The evidence may show that by giving the notes the wife merely assumed the pre-existing debt of her husband, or even if that is not true, the defendant may otherwise sustain her plea of failure of consideration.

It is not disputed that the defendant was 18 miles from court at the time the judgment was rendered, and seriously ill with chills and malarial fever, and the seriousness of her illness is indicated by the affidavit of the attending physician, who on July 26th swore that she still was unable to leave her home for any purpose whatever. The refusal to set aside the judgment upon the ground of the defendant's illness seems to have been based on the fact that the court was in session three days before the date upon which the judgment was rendered, and that the defendant then had a husband who lived with her, and who could perhaps have brought information of his wife's sickness to her counsel. It would seem that in a state of ideal connubial felicity nothing would be more natural than for a husband to find pleasure in the prompt and eager discharge of his spouse's slightest wish, to say nothing of that impelling sense of duty which would unconsciously actuate him to attend to any of her business affairs, and thus relieve her from even the smallest annoyance; but the evidence does not disclose whether the tie which bound Shade to Cynthia was the silken cord of love or the hateful chain of convention.

[4] As applied to modern wives and husbands, the phrase "living together" does not always import that they are living at the same place. The expression merely implies that there has been no separation, voluntary or legal, which can legally be said to have released either from their duties to the other under the strict letter of the law. We think, therefore, that the judge was not authorized to assume, from the testimony to the effect that Cynthia lived with Shade, that Shade was living with Cynthia, or at the house where Cynthia abode at the time of the trial, or during the three days before the trial, or even if he were there, that he was bound to journey 18 miles to Leesburg to inform the defendant's lawyers that his wife was sick. No presumptions arising from the evidence can be indulged, except such as are authorized by law; and as it was not the duty of the defendant's husband to assist her counsel, or give them information as to his wife, certainly nothing more could be presumed than that he would do his duty. But even if the husband should have performed this service for his wife, we hardly think the wife should be charged with the failure of her husband to do his duty. A general enforcement of this principle would be "hard law" for wives. Proof that the defendant was a married woman, who was not separated from her husband, was not, without more, sufficient to disprove and impeach a defendant, who testified, on a showing for continuance, that she had no one by whom she could send the physician's certificate, or otherwise notify the court that she was physically unable to attend the court. Even if there be a presumption that every husband does his duty, the duty of making a showing for a continuance for his wife in a suit upon a note, evidencing a debt which was originally the debt of the defendant's first husband, is not imposed by law upon the second husband as the successor to the marital offices of his predecessor.

Judgment reversed.

GEORGIA COAST &amp; P. R. CO. v. SAME.

(Nos. 4,591, 4,592.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 30, 1913.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1040*)—HARMLESS ERROR—RULING ON DEMURRER.

The plaintiff having elected to proceed upon the second count in his petition, the ruling addressed to the first count, even if erroneous, did not hurt the defendant.

2. COVENANTS (§§ 31, 57*) — EVIDENCE (§ 461*) — PAROL — COVENANT — CONSTRUCTION—VALIDITY—"PERSONAL COVENANT"—"COVENANT RUNNING WITH THE LAND."

The plaintiff proved a covenant that ran with the land. To constitute a covenant running with the land, the covenant must have a relation to the interest in the estate conveyed, and the act to be done must concern the interest created and conveyed; but it is not necessary that privity of estate shall exist between the original grantor and a purchaser from the covenantee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Covenants, Cent. Dig. §§ 31, 54; Dec. Dig. §§ 31, 57.* Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2129-2133; Dec. Dig. § 461.*]

3. COVENANTS (§ 69*)—ACCEPTANCE OF DEED—ASSIGNEE OF GRANTEE.

Where a deed was made in consideration of the "benefit and advantages which will accrue to [the grantor] by reason of the construction of the railroad of [the grantee] on, over, and through his lands," and upon the express "condition that said railroad company is to put a side track on said land and also a warehouse at the place requested" by the grantor, the grantee, by accepting the deed, entered into a covenant to comply with its terms, and this covenant ran with the land, and became obligatory upon a second company, which took over the rights, privileges, and franchises, and property of the former.

4. RAILROADS (§ 72*)—RIGHT OF WAY—COVENANTS—BREACH—PERSONS LIABLE.

A statement in a petition that a named railroad company, pursuant to an agreement of consolidation or merger, took over the property of another named railroad company, and was proceeding to operate and manage the same, prior to the time of the filing of the suit, would be sufficient to charge both the company in possession of the physical property and the company alleged to have been taken over. The fact that the deed or the transfer itself was not formally executed until after the commencement of the suit might (and in the present instance did) afford confirmation of the prior agreement to consolidate.

5. COVENANTS (§§ 21, 114*)—CONSTRUCTION—PETITION—DEMURRER.

The court did not err in overruling the demurrer in which complaint was made that the petition set out covenants, conditions, and agreements different from those contained in the deed attached to the petition. Covenants are to be so construed as to carry into effect the intention of the parties, and their intention should be collected from the whole instrument and the circumstances surrounding its execution.

6. RAILROADS (§ 72*)—CONTRACTS—VALIDITY.

A contract by a railroad company to locate a station at a given point is not per se void. Such a contract is enforceable until it be established satisfactorily that there has arisen such a conflict between the railroad company's public duties on the one hand and its duties under the contract on the other that it is impossible for it to discharge the former without entirely abandoning the latter.

7. RAILROADS (§ 72*)—EVIDENCE (§ 501*) — RIGHT OF WAY — COVENANTS—OPINIONS — BREACH OF COVENANT—DAMAGES.

Generally value is fixed by the opinion of those who are most familiar with the nature and intrinsic qualities of the object to be valued. The damages consequent upon a breach of a covenant, that a railroad company will place a side track and erect a warehouse to be used as a depot, in consideration of the grant of a right of way, are not necessarily speculative. The advantages of accessible railroad facilities are a matter of common knowledge, and their value may be estimated and determined by a jury upon a consideration of facts and circumstances from which it can be made to appear that enhancement could reasonably have been expected, and the probable amount of such enhancement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 168-178; Dec. Dig. § 72.* Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2292-2305; Dec. Dig. § 501.*]

8. COVENANTS (§ 119*)—EVIDENCE (§ 441*)—TRIAL (§ 85*)—BREACH OF COVENANT—PAROL—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—OBJECTION—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE.

None of the rulings upon the admissibility of testimony were harmful to the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Covenants, Cent. Dig. §§ 218-220, 264, 265; Dec. Dig. § 119.* Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1719, 1723-1763, 1766-1845, 2030-2047; Dec. Dig. § 441.* Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 222, 223-225; Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

9. COVENANTS (§ 125*)—BREACH OF COVENANT—INSTRUCTIONS.

There are numerous complaints of error in the instructions of the court to the jury; but none of them are meritorious.

10. COVENANTS (§ 134*)—RAILROADS (§ 72*)—BREACH—QUESTION FOR JURY—DEFENSES.

The evidence authorized the verdict for the plaintiff, and there was no error in refusing a new trial.

Error from City Court of Reidsville; W. W. Sheppard, Judge.

Two actions sued together by J. H. Baxter, administrator, one against the Reidsville & Southeastern Railroad Company and the other against the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Hitch & Denmark, of Savannah, for plaintiffs in error. Way & Burkhalter, of Reidsville, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The two defendants in the lower court were sued together, and a single verdict was returned against both, and the two bills of exceptions will be treated together.

J. H. Baxter, as administrator of the estate of J. H. Pinholster, deceased, filed suit in the city court of Reidsville, on May 18, 1900, against the Reidsville & Southeastern Railroad Company and the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company, companies organized and existing under the laws of the state of Georgia, to recover damages for the breach of a covenant or condition contained in a right of way deed. The covenant or condition referred to appeared in a deed from J. H. Pinholster to the Liberty City, Glenville & Manassas Railway Company, a railroad corporation under the laws of Georgia, and is in the following language: "Upon the condition that the said railroad company is to put a side track on said land, and also a warehouse at the place requested by said J. H. Pinholster." The condition quoted follows immediately after the description of the lands through which the right of way was granted. The deed was made on June 29, 1905. Thereafter the grantee changed its name to the Reidsville & Southeastern Railroad Company. The plaintiff sets forth a copy of the deed, and alleges: "It being well understood between said J. H. Pinholster and said Liberty City, Glenville & Manassas Railway Company that the said warehouse would constitute a regular station or depot on said railroad for the receiving and delivering of freights, as a common carrier, and that the land of the said J. H. Pinholster, near to and contiguous to said station or depot, would naturally be greatly enhanced in value by reason of its close proximity to said station or depot."

The allegation in which the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company is charged with liability for a breach of the covenant is as follows: "Petitioner says that on the 21st day of November, 1905, the charter of said Liberty City, Glenville & Manassas Railway Company was amended by changing its corporate name to that of Reidsville & Southeastern Railroad Company, and that some time later, the date being unknown to petitioner, there was an agreement or contract of consolidation or merger made and entered into between the Reidsville & Southeastern Railroad Company and the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company, the date and specific terms of which are unknown to petitioner, whereby and by virtue of which the said Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company has for more than a year past taken into its charge and custody the property of said Reidsville & Southeastern Railroad Company from the town of Collins, Ga., to the city of Darien, Ga., including the cars, engines, locomotives, rolling stock, tracks, and right of way, including said right of way deeded to said Liberty City, Glenville & Manassas Railway Company by said J. H. Pinholster as aforesaid, and have for more than a year past been operating the said cars, engines, locomotives, and rolling stock over the line of the said Reidsville & Southeastern Railroad Company between the town of Reidsville, Ga., and the town of Ludowici, Ga., and over and upon the said right of way deeded by the said J. H. Pinholster to said Liberty City, Glenville & Manassas Railway Company as aforesaid; the said Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company, at the time it entered into said agreement with the said Reidsville & Southeastern Railroad Company, having full knowledge or notice of the terms, conditions, covenant, and agreement which constituted the consideration upon which the deed made by said J. H. Pinholster to the said Liberty City, Glenville & Manassas Railway Company, conveying the said right of way upon said land, was based, and full knowledge of the fact that said condition, covenant, and agreement had not been complied with, nor in any way performed."

The Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company filed general and special demurrers to the petition, and also an answer denying all of the material allegations thereof. The general and special demurrers were overruled "upon each and all of the grounds stated therein, except as to the ground, urged in argument, that the manner in which the damage alleged to have been sustained in the second count of said petition is not sufficiently set forth." The plaintiff afterward amended his petition to meet the order overruling the demurrers, and alleged in the amendment that the warehouse and side track were to be built on the 50-foot right of way granted. The defendant thereupon amended its answer, setting up a special defense, as follows: "That the covenants and conditions contained in the deed, a copy of which is attached to the plaintiff's petition, and for the breach of which damages are asked, is void, in that it is a condition and covenant impossible of performance, in that it is physical impossibility to construct a main track, a side track, and a warehouse on the 50-foot right of way granted in said deed." This amendment was allowed without objection. The court required an election, and the plaintiff elected to rely upon the second count of the petition. The case was tried before a jury, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $400. Exceptions pendente lite were filed by the defendant to the overruling of its general and special demurrers and to other adverse rulings of the court. Each of the defendant railroad companies moved separately for a new trial, the motions were overruled, and in each bill of exceptions error is assigned upon the interlocutory rulings and upon the refusal of a new trial.

[1] 1. The plaintiff's cause of action was set forth in two counts, and the action of the court in compelling the plaintiff to elect upon which count he would proceed obviates the necessity of our passing upon the ground of the demurrer in which it was alleged that there was a misjoinder of causes of action, for, even if the court should have sustained this ground of the demurrer, the judgment overruling it was rendered harmless by subsequently requiring the plaintiff to elect upon which count he would proceed. In the first count it was alleged that the plaintiff was damaged in the sum of \$1,000, the alleged value of  $6\frac{1}{2}$  acres of land embraced in the right of way appropriated by the railroad, and the depreciation of the entire tract for farming and agricultural purposes, by its being cut diagonally into two tracts, with lines on each side of the right of way about one mile long. In the second count it was alleged that, if the defendants had complied with the covenant of the deed, which was the sole consideration thereof, the value of plaintiff's adjacent land would have been enhanced \$1,000 by the construction of the side track and the erection of the warehouse or depot, as stipulated in the deed conveying the right of way.

In view of the rulings of the court, it is not necessary to rule upon the point as to whether a petition which alleges in different counts damages due to depreciation of his property, as well as damages due to enhancement of value of which he was deprived by the breach of the alleged covenant, is subject to demurrer for misjoinder of causes of action. The case as tried was confined to the inquiry as to whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover for the breach of the alleged covenant, and, even if the court erred in holding on demurrer that the plaintiff might recover the value of the land taken by the railroad company, plus the consequential damages to the land not taken, this ruling did not harm the defendants, in view of the plaintiff's electing to proceed only for the damages resultant upon the breach of the covenant in the deed executed by his intestate.

[2] 2. The next point raised in the record and first raised by demurrer is as to the construction of the covenant contained in the deed, and first, Is this covenant a personal covenant, or one which ran with the land? If it was a personal covenant, clearly the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company would be relieved from any liability thereunder. If the covenant is one that runs with the land, it would follow it into the hands of assignees, and, if it appeared that the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company was the assignee of the Reidsville & Southeastern Railroad Company, the former company would be liable for its own breach, or for that of the Reidsville & Southeastern Railroad Company. Brooks v. Water Lot Co. of Columbus, 7 Ga. 101; Howard Mfg. Co. v. Water Lot Co., etc., 53 Ga. 689.

Several assignments of error relate to alleged errors of the court in construing the contract, and especially in admitting parol testimony as illustrative of the intention of the parties in the contract. The rule which prohibits the introduction of parol evidence, which may vary the terms of a written contract, is not violated by allowing proof of extraneous circumstances which would illustrate the intentions of both parties, where there is doubt as to the precise meaning of the language employed in the covenant. If it be conceded that the language of a deed to land creates a covenant running with the land, which plainly inured to the benefit of the grantor, and which is plainly binding on the grantee and his assigns, and a breach of which would entail loss upon the grantor, and deprive him of any consideration whatever in exchange for the land, the rule which allows parol testimony in explanation of ambiguities should be applied with the utmost liberality against the grantee or his assigns, where it is attempted, by beclouding the provisions of the covenant, to get something of value for nothing.

The allegation of the plaintiff's petition which required the support of parol evidence did not seek to alter or vary the terms of the covenant in the deed, or suggest any additional stipulation not originally embodied in the covenant, and furthermore the condition that "the railroad company is to put a side track on said land, also a warehouse at the place requested by said J. H. Pinholster," is a part of the consideration of the deed, and is legitimate subject-matter of inquiry. As we see it, if it was not the intention of the parties that a side track and a warehouse should be placed upon the right of way granted by J. H. Pinholster, then, according to the terms of the instrument of conveyance, the deed was without consideration. A covenant in a deed is, generally, as a matter of fact, a part of the consideration, and hence the rule is well settled that covenants are to be so construed as to carry into effect the intentions of the parties, not only as it may be gathered from the terms of the contract as a whole, but also as it may be derived from the circumstances surrounding its execution. See Atlanta Railway Company v. McKinney, 124 Ga. 930 (2), 53 S. E. 701, 110 Am. St. Rep. 215, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 436; Baxter v. Camp, 126 Ga. 354, 54 S. E. 1036.

There is enough in the face of the deed, under the terms of which the Liberty City, Glenville & Manassas Railroad Company, which afterward by change of name became the Reidsville & Southeastern Railroad Company, obtained this right of way, to evidence that the covenant was one which ran with the land, and that its obligations would follow any assignee of the grantee in that deed. A personal covenant is one which has no relation to the land conveyed. Atlanta Street Railway Co. v. Jackson, 108 Ga. 638, 34 S. E. 184. To constitute a covenant running with the land the covenant must have a relation to the interest of the estate conveyed, and the act to be done must concern the interest created and conveyed. Muscogee Manufacturing Co. v. Eagle Mills, 126 Ga. 210, 54 S. E. 1028, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1139. It is plainly set forth in Pinholster's deed that he is actuated in the conveyance by the "benefit and advantages which will accrue to him by reason of the construction of the railroad of said party of the second part on, over, and through his lands," and the act to be done concerns the estate he is creating, because the side track and the warehouse are to be put on the land previously described in the deed, to wit, a right of way 50 feet wide, over and through his entire tract of land, described as bounded by the lands of named landholders. Atlanta Railway Company v. McKinney, 124 Ga. 931, 53 S. E. 701, 110 Am. St. Rep. 215, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 436; Willcox v. Kehoe, 124 Ga. 487, 52 S. E. 896, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 466, 4 Ann. Cas. 437. There can be no question that under these principles the Reidsville & Southeastern Railroad Company is liable to the plaintiff for any breach of the covenant due to its omission to fulfill the covenant. In Tucker v. McArthur, 103 Ga. 415, 30 S. E. 283, it was held that it is not necessary that privity of estate should exist between the original grantor and the purchaser from the covenantee in order to create covenants which run with the land, and for that reason, if it properly appeared upon the trial that the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company was the successor or assignee of the Reidsville & Southeastern Railroad Company, the original covenant running with the land would not be defeated or impaired. As to this the rulings of the Supreme Court, in Georgia Southern Railroad v. Reeves, 64 Ga. 492, and Georgia Railroad & Banking Company v. Mayor and Council of Macon, 86 Ga. 585, 13 S. E. 21, seem in point.

[3] 3. Pinholster made his deed in consideration of the benefit and advantages which would accrue to him by reason of the construction of the railroad of the said party of the second part on, over, and through his lands. Certainly parol evidence would be admissible upon the question as to whether any benefit or advantage was derivable from the construction of the railroad. The deed was made upon the express condition that the railroad company was to put a side track and a warehouse on said land (which, as we have shown, can only refer to the land granted) at such a place as the grantor might request. It naturally follows from this that, if the grantee accepted the deed with these express stipulations, the grantee, in accepting it, entered into a covenant with the grantor to comply with its terms, and, if the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company took over the rights, privileges, franchises, and property of the Reidsville & Southeastern Railroad Company (which was the original grantee under another name), this covenant would run with the land and would be obligatory upon the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company. Georgia Southern Railway v. Reeves, 64 Ga. 492.

[4] 4. We will therefore next inquire whether the statement in the petition, to the effect that the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company took over the Reidsville & Southeastern Railroad Company, in pursuance of an agreement of consolidation or merger, prior to the filing of the suit (although there is no allegation that the contract was actually executed until after the suit was filed), was sufficient to charge the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company, as assignee or successor of the Reidsville & Southeastern Railroad Company, with liability for a breach of the covenant. As to this we concur in the opinion of the trial judge that the making of the deed of conveyance by the Reidsville & Southeastern Railroad Company to the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company at a later date itself evidences a confirmation of a prior agreement which antedated the suit. Where one corporation takes all of the available property of another, and undertakes the exercise of its duties to the public as a public service corporation, the duty of carrying out all of its contracts may be implied, in the absence of proof that there was an express exemption from liability. In any event, if the court erred in ruling upon the pleading, no material harm has resulted to the plaintiff in error, for it is plain from the evidence that at the time the suit was filed all of the property and franchises of the Reidsville & Southeastern Railroad Company had in fact been taken over by the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company, and for that reason there is no substantial merit in the point.

[5] 5. In the sixth paragraph of the defendant's demurrer complaint it is made that the petition sets out covenants, conditions, and agreements wholly different from any condition, covenant, or agreement contained in the deed, and it is insisted that such collateral stipulations and independent agreements cannot be pleaded, in the absence of an allegation setting up fraud, accident, or mistake, as a reason why these agreements, or covenants, and conditions were omitted. The same objection is addressed to evidence which was admitted upon the trial, and it is also insisted that without this testimony the verdict is unsupported by the evidence. The holster's deed is attached to the petition, and speaks for itself. We have already alluded to some of its salient provisions. It is stated in the fourth paragraph of the petition that it was understood that the warehouse would constitute a regular station or depot of the defendant railroad company, for the receipt and delivery of freight, and the same statement appears in the eighth paragraph; but it is evident that this statement is made in explanation of the uses to which the warehouse specified in the deed could be applied, and it is plainly not the introduction of an additional covenant. The statement that it was understood that this warehouse should be used as a depot might be proved by parol. That the warehouse would be of some use is inferable from the agreement to build it. It would be for the jury to say whether it would be reasonable to suppose that a railroad company would agree to build a warehouse and a side track in order to benefit an adjacent landholder, at which, however, it never intended to stop a train or to receive any freight. The grantee of the deed covenanted that it would build a warehouse and a side track at such a point on Pinholster's land as he might designate. Under the rule that covenants are to be construed so as to give effect to the intentions of the parties, we think that the demurrer to the fourth and eighth paragraphs was properly overruled, and upon the proof submitted we think the jury were authorized to find from the agreement itself that it was the intention of both parties that trains should stop sometimes, at least, and, under some circumstances, at the proposed warehouse. It is hard to see how there would be any enhancement in the value of Pinholster's property, if a train did nothing more than pass through at full speed, and the warehouse or depot was never used.

[8] 6. There is nothing in the evidence to authorize the conclusion that a compliance with the conditions of the deed executed by Pinholster would affect the proper discharge of the duties of the public service corporation, or would in any wise injuriously affect the public interest so as to render the covenant repugnant to sound public policy. This phase of the case is sufficiently elaborated in the sixth headnote.

[7] 7. The question which has given us the most concern is whether the damages are too speculative for recovery and incapable of legal estimation. We have reached the conclusion, however, that, in view of the testimony in the case, the finding of the jury was extremely moderate in amount, and we are not prepared to hold that the enhancement of real estate values, due to the conveniences supplied by proximity to a railroad station, is not capable of estimation from data which will enable the jury to award partial compensation for the results of a breach of such a covenant as that involved in this case. After all, every estimate of value is a mere matter of opinion, and this principle is recognized by the courts. The jurors could not shut their eyes to the fact that it is a matter of universal experience that facilities for transportation and travel, where these facilities may be easily enjoyed, add to the value of nearby property. The increment of value which may be added in a particular case depends upon variant circumstances, and must be determined by the opinions of those who are conversant with the surroundings. But it cannot be said that, because there is not an analytical computation of the different elements upon which the opinion is based, the loss was not sustained, nor that the damages claimed are purely speculative. There is testimony in the present case that a compliance with the covenant would have enhanced the value of the adjacent land of Pinholster from $1,200 to $1,500. A witness may give an opinion based upon facts which he details, and then it is for the jury to say whether they reach the same conclusion, or whether upon the facts stated the opinion they reach differs from the opinion of the witness. There was testimony that, if the side track and warehouse had been put upon the land within a reasonable time, the location would have been a good shipping point and a good place for a gin and mercantile business. From these facts, as well as from the opinion of the witnesses as to how much these improvements would have enhanced the value of the land, the jury had the right to determine, in their opinion, the value of the probable enhancement. The facts of this case seem to bring it clearly within the rule announced in Atlanta & West Point R. Co. v. Camp, 130 Ga. 1, 60 S. E. 177, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 594, 124 Am. St. Rep. 151, 14 Ann. Cas. 439.

[8] 8. None of the rulings upon the admissibility of testimony were harmful to the defendants. The court permitted the widow of Pinholster to testify as to a conversation between her husband and one Emerson. But it was shown that Emerson was the superintendent of the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company, and was at the time engaged in locating stations along its line, and the objection to the effect that this testimony tended to vary the terms of the written contract is untenable. On the contrary, the testimony as to the alleged conversation was to the effect that Emerson admitted that Pinholster's construction of the contract was correct, and that he had agreed that, if the 50 feet of right of way was not enough land upon which to erect a warehouse, he would accept the necessary additional land which Pinholster then and there offered to deed to the railroad company as soon as they started to build the depot. Upon the point of Pinholster's offer to give the land there can be no objection, for if the original 50 feet had been too small to contain a suitable depot (in addition to the side track), the railroad company was empowered to condemn enough additional land adjoining to enable it to properly perform its duties to the public, though, according to the witness, Emerson did not raise any objection whatever, nor did he object to the condition contained in the covenant in the deed. A portion of the testimony may be objectionable upon the ground that the sayings of the deceased person were not against his interest, but this objection did not reach all of the testimony which the defendant moved to exclude, and therefore the court did not err in overruling the objection. The court did not err in admitting the deed from the Reldsville & Southeastern Railroad Company, which was executed subsequently to the filing of the suit, conveying all of the property of this railroad company to the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company. There was testimony that this contract, while not formally reduced to writing, had been operative and treated as binding upon the parties themselves since March 1, 1906, and was therefore in effect prior to the filing of the suit. The conveyance itself recited that it was made for the purpose of effecting a merger or consolidation of the two railroads, in accordance with the provisions of a deed of trust executed by the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company to the Morton Trust Company, trustee, dated March 1, 1906. Before the introduction in evidence of the deed, testimony was introduced showing that the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company was in possession of all the property of the Reldsville & Southeastern Railroad Company and in complete control and management thereof.

[9] 9. There was no error in the instructions contained in the charge of the court. There are numerous complaints of error in the instructions of the court to the jury; but, for the reasons already given in ruling upon the demurrers, we think that none of them are meritorious. The court instructed the jury that they might look to the facts and circumstances of the case and see whether or not the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company had entered into a contract of merger or consolidation at the time the suit was filed; that the contract need not be placed in writing at all; that, if the contract was made, and the execution merely deferred to a future date, if the minds of the parties were together upon the terms of the agreement, the contract was made. In view of the evidence, direct and circumstantial, which tended to show that as far back as March 1, 1906, the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company had executed a mortgage or deed of trust to the Morton Trust Company upon the railroad of the Reldsville & Southeastern Railroad Company and all its other property, the jury was authorized to find that at least as far back as March 1, 1906, and prior to the filing of this suit, there was a contract of merger or consolidation between these two railroads which was recognized between the parties themselves as valid and binding, while it might not have been effectual as a contract in competition with the rights of a third party.

[10] 10. There was evidence for the plaintiff which sustained every allegation in the petition, and there was no error in refusing a new trial upon the ground that it was contrary to the evidence. It was for the jury to say whether the spur track was a "side track," as that term is ordinarily understood. The evidence as to this point was in conflict. It was also within the power of the jury to find that the placing of a box car near the spur track, after the commencement of this suit, was not the construction of a warehouse within the meaning of the covenant.

The question as to whether the condition in the deed was impossible of performance was fairly submitted by the court. It was for the jury to say whether the warehouse which was in the contemplation of the parties could have been erected upon the right of way 50 feet wide by building the main line track on the outer edge instead of in the center of the right of way. Ordinarily the main track of a railroad is laid within the center of the right of way; but we see no reason why it is indispensably necessary that this should be done in every case, and, even if, as suggested by the witnesses for the railroad, the custom of placing the main line track in the middle of the right of way is universal, the railroad company could have complied with the covenant by condemning any additional land necessary for the construction of the warehouse.

Judgment affirmed.

BURRISS et al. v. BROCK et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 24, 1913.)

1. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 97*)—BONDS—AUTHORITY TO ISSUE.

Act Feb. 19, 1913 (28 St. at Large, p. 355), amending Act Jan. 5, 1895 (21 St. at Large, p. 921), by enlarging the Anderson school district, and authorizing the trustees of the new enlarged district to hold an election on the question of issuing bonds without requiring, as a condition precedent thereto, a petition of a majority of the freeholders of the district, does not violate Const. art. 2, § 13, providing that, in authorizing a special election in any "incorporated city or town" for the purpose of bonding the same, the General Assembly shall prescribe, as a condition precedent to such election, a petition of a majority of the freeholders of said city.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. §§ 224-232; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

2. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 97*)—BONDS—AUTHORITY TO ISSUE.

There is no provision in the Constitution requiring a petition of freeholders as a condition precedent to an election on the question of issuing bonds of a school district.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. §§ 224-232; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

3. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 97*)—STATUTES—IMPLIED REPEAL—BOND ISSUE.

Act Feb. 19, 1913 (28 St. at Large, p. 355), contains no repealing clause, yet, as it expressly authorizes the trustees of the Anderson school district to hold an election on the question of issuing bonds without requiring a petition of freeholders as a condition precedent thereto, impliedly repeals Civ. Code 1912, § 1743, requiring a written petition of at least one-third of the resident electors and a like proportion of the resident freeholders as a condition precedent to such election, since they relate to the same subject-matter and are inconsistent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. §§ 224-232; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

4. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 41*)—ALTERATION AND CREATION OF NEW DISTRICTS.

Since Act Feb. 19, 1913 (28 St. at Large, p. 355), amending Act Jan. 5, 1895 (21 St. at Large, p. 921), enlarging the Anderson school district, provides, impliedly at least, that the enlarged district shall bear its just proportion of any tax for the liquidation of bonds of the old district, it does not violate Const. art. 11, § 5, providing that when a new school district is created, including cities or towns already embraced in special school districts, in which buildings, etc., have been erected by the issuance of bonds, the new school district shall bear its just proportion of any tax levied to liquidate such bond.

5. STATUTES (§ 90*)—SPECIAL ACTS—INCORPORATING SCHOOL DISTRICT.

Act Feb. 19, 1913 (28 St. at Large, p. 355), amending Act Jan. 5, 1895 (21 St. at Large, p. 921), creating the Anderson school district by extending its boundaries, does not violate Const. art. 3, § 34, subd. 5, prohibiting the incorporating of school districts by special law as such law does not incorporate a district but only amends a previous statute of incorporation.

6. STATUTES (§ 76*)—SPECIAL LAWS—APPLICABILITY OF GENERAL LAW.

Const. art. 3, § 34, subd. 11, providing that no special law shall be enacted where a general law could be made to apply, does not render invalid an act enlarging a school district and authorizing the trustees to hold an election on the question of issuing bonds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 77½-78½; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

7. STATUTES (§ 107*)—SUBJECTS AND TITLE OF ACTS—ACTS RELATING TO MORE THAN ONE SUBJECT.

Act Feb. 19, 1913 (28 St. at Large, p. 355), entitled "An act to amend an act to establish the Anderson school district, to authorize the establishment of free graded schools therein, and to provide the means for the equipment and efficient management of the same, approved January 5, A. D. 1895, so as to enlarge the said district and authorize the trustees to issue bonds, and to provide the means for the equipment and efficient management of the new district as amended," does not violate Const. art. 3, § 17, requiring that every act shall relate to but one subject, which shall be expressed in the title.

8. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 63*)—LEGISLATIVE POWER—DELEGATION.

Act Feb. 19, 1913 (28 St. at Large, p. 355), amending Act Jan. 5, 1895 (21 St. at Large, p. 921), enlarging the Anderson school district and authorizing the trustees of the enlarged district to hold an election on the question of issuing $100,000 of bonds, and providing that, if the voters should refuse to authorize the bonds, the trustees may suspend this amendment and carry on school according to the original act until such time as the voters shall authorize the bonds, does not confer legislative power upon the trustees, since the Legislature itself prescribed the contingency upon the happening of which the amendment should be suspended.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 108-114; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

9. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS (§ 97*)—BOND ISSUE—CONDUCT OF ELECTIONS—POLLING PLACES—NUMBER.

No law, constitutional or statutory, requires more than one voting place for an election such as is provided by Act Feb. 19, 1913 (28 St. at Large, p. 355), authorizing the trustees of a school district to hold an election on the question of issuing bonds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. §§ 224-232; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

Action by C. O. Burris and others to restrain J. A. Brock and others, trustees of the Anderson School District, from issuing bonds. Petition dismissed.

Weston & Aycock, of Columbia, for petitioners. Atty. Gen. Peoples and J. F. Lyon, of Columbia, for respondents.

HYDRICK, J. By an act of the Legislature approved January 5, 1895 (21 Stat. 921), the territory embraced within the corporate limits of the city of Anderson was created a separate school district, and the city was authorized to issue, and did issue, $20,000 bonds, which were designated as school bonds, the proceeds of which were used to purchase lands and erect school buildings thereon. In 1902 these bonds were refunded. In 1903 the city issued $15,000 more of school bonds, the proceeds of which were used to purchase lands and erect buildings thereon for school purposes. In 1913 the Legislature passed an act (28 Stat. 355) entitled "An act to amend an act to establish the Anderson school district, to authorize the establishment of free graded schools therein, and to provide the means for the equipment and efficient management of the same, approved January 5, A. D. 1895, so as to enlarge the said district and authorize the trustees to issue bonds and to provide the means for the equipment and the efficient management of the new district as amended." The italicized portion of the title above quoted is the title of the act of 1895. The act of 1913 enlarges the old school district of the city of Anderson by annexing certain adjacent territory lying within the boundaries therein designated, and, so enlarged, the school district extends beyond the corporate limits of the city. Among other things, the act authorizes the board of trustees of the new school district to submit to the qualified voters residing therein the question of issuing $100,000 of bonds, and provides that $35,000 of the bonds so issued shall be exchanged for, or used to pay, the $35,000 of school bonds issued by the city of Anderson, and the balance for the purpose of improving the present school property, acquiring additional property, and erecting buildings for school purposes. The title to all the property procured by the proceeds of the $35,000 of school bonds issued by the city of Anderson is in the trustees, who were continued in office by the act of 1913 and made trustees of the new school district; and under that act all the property of the old school district becomes the property of the new school district. No part of the territory annexed to the old school district was under any bond debt for school purposes; nor was there any school property therein, so that the new district acquired no school property from the annexed territory.

At the election ordered by the trustees, only one box was provided, which was at the courthouse, in the city of Anderson, where all the voters of the district had to vote. The election resulted in favor of issuing the bonds, and, the trustees having advertised for bids for so much of them as are to be sold, this action was brought to enjoin the issuing thereof.

[1] The first objection made is that the act of 1913 violates section 13 of article 2 of the Constitution in authorizing the trustees to hold an election on the question of issuing bonds without requiring, as a condition precedent of such election, a petition of a majority of the freeholders of the district. The section in question reads: "In authorizing a special election in any incorporated city or town in this state for purpose of bonding the same, the General Assembly shall prescribe as a condition precedent to the holding of said election a petition from a majority of the freeholders of said city or town as shown by its tax books, and at such elections all electors of such city or town who are duly qualified for voting under section 12 of this article, and who have paid all taxes, state, county and municipal, for the previous year, shall be allowed to vote; and the vote of a majority of those voting in said election shall be necessary to authorize the issue of said bonds." Even a casual reading of this section shows that it is not applicable to the election authorized by the act, which was not in any incorporated city or town, in the sense in which those words are used in the Constitution, nor for the purpose of bonding the same. But it was in a special school district, which was not even coterminous with the city, though it would have made no difference if it had been, because the purpose of the election was the bonding of the school district and not the city. The Constitution (section 5, art. 10) contemplates the issuing of bonds by different political divisions or municipal corporations extending over the same territory or parts thereof.

[2] There is no provision in the Constitution which requires a petition of freeholders as a condition precedent to an election on the question of issuing bonds of a school district, as that above quoted with regard to issuing city or town bonds.

[3] Section 1743 of the Civil Code of 1912 requires a written petition of at least one-third of the resident electors and a like proportion of the resident freeholders of the district as a condition precedent of such an election. But the act of 1913, being of later date, though it contains no repealing clause, yet as it deals with the same subject in so far as it affects the election in question, and it expressly authorizes the trustees to hold the election and does not require such a petition, necessarily has the effect of repealing so much of section 1743 as is inconsistent with its own provisions.

[4] The petitioners' next contention is that the act of 1913 violates section 5 of article 11 of the Constitution, which provides: "That when any school district laid out under this section shall embrace cities or towns already embraced into special school districts in which graded school buildings have been erected by the issue of bonds, or by special taxation, or by donation, all the territory included in said school district shall bear its just proportion of any tax that may be levied to liquidate such bonds or support the public schools therein." The specific objection urged is that the act fails to provide that all territory included in the new district shall bear its just proportion of any tax that may be levied to liquidate the $35,000 of bonds issued by the city of Anderson. The act does provide, impliedly at least, that all the territory in the new district shall bear its just proportion of such a tax, for it provides that the tax for that purpose shall be levied upon all the property of the district as assessed for taxation for all other purposes. It is suggested, however, that the newly annexed territory should pay a greater proportion of the $35,000 than the old, and this because the old territory already owned the property acquired by the use of the proceeds of those bonds, while the new territory owned no property at all. But it must be remembered that the bonds have not been paid, and that they are presumed to represent the value of the property. There is nothing to show that it has increased or decreased in value since it was purchased. Therefore, as to that property, the two sections of the new district stand on the same footing as if the property had just been purchased. While the old territory has been taxed to pay the interest on the bonds since they were issued, the citizens thereof have had the use of the property as compensation therefor. Moreover, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, the court will presume that the Legislature considered that matter and obeyed the mandate of the Constitution and imposed upon each section of the new district its just proportion of such tax.

[6, 8] The next contention is that the act violates subdivisions 5 and 11 of section 34 of article 3 of the Constitution. That section prohibits local or special legislation on certain subjects. Subdivision 5 prohibits any local or special law "to incorporate school districts," and subdivision 11 provides that, "where a general law can be made applicable, no special law shall be enacted." These objections are met and answered by the decisions of this court in State v. McCaw, 77 S. C. 351, 58 S. E. 145, and State v. Brock, 66 S. C. 357, 44 S. E. 931.

[7] The objection that the act relates to more than one subject and that the subject thereof is not expressed in the title, contrary to the provision of section 17 of article 3 of the Constitution, is also untenable, as will clearly appear from a consideration of the title and the provisions of the act. This provision of the Constitution requiring that every act shall relate to but one subject, which shall be expressed in the title, has been so fully and so frequently expounded and applied that it would be useless to attempt to add anything upon that subject. See Dove v. Kirkland, 92 S. C. 313, 323, 75 S. E. 503, and cases cited.

[8] The last objection to the act upon constitutional grounds is because it confers upon the board of trustees power to suspend the operation thereof, if the result of the election should be against issuing the bonds, thereby, as it is alleged, conferring upon the trustees legislative power. The language relied upon to sustain this objection is as follows: "As it will be impracticable to carry out the amendment herein provided for if the voters of said district should refuse to authorize the issuing of bonds herein provided and for the special school tax, the trustees are hereby authorized to suspend this amendment and to carry on schools according to the provisions of the original act until such time as the qualified voters shall authorize said bonds issued and said special tax levy, at which time the said board of trustees shall operate under this amendment." As the contingency upon which the trustees were authorized to suspend the act did not and cannot arise, since the voters did authorize the issue of bonds, it would seem that the question raised by this objection has become academic. But, properly construed, the act does not confer legislative power upon the trustees, because the Legislature itself prescribed the contingency, upon the happening of which the amendment should be suspended. No discretion to suspend the amendment was vested in the trustees. The language above quoted was intended merely as a direction to them as to the course which they should pursue on the happening of the contingency named.

[9] It was properly conceded that there is nothing in the fact that only one voting place was provided for holding the election. We know of no law, constitutional or statutory, and none has been cited, which required more than one voting place. Indeed, the act of 1895, of which the act of 1913 was only an amendment, required that the elections therein provided for should be held at the courthouse in the city of Anderson. It was suggested that separate voting places should have been provided for those residing in the new territory and those residing in the old, and that a majority of each section should have been required. It is sufficient to say that the Legislature did not so require, and we see no good reason why it should have done so.

The petition is dismissed.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 917*)—ISSUANCE OF BONDS—INJUNCTION.

Where a judge of the superior court has rendered judgment confirming and validating the issuance of bonds by a municipality, under the provisions of Civil Code 1910, §§ 445, 447, and no bill of exceptions assigning error upon such judgment is filed within 20 days from the date thereof, for the purpose of carrying the questions raised in the proceedings to validate the bonds to the Supreme Court, then, under the provisions of section 448 of the Civil Code, "the judgment of the superior court, so confirming and validating the issuance of the bonds, shall be forever conclusive upon the validity of the bonds against the * * * municipality, * * * and the validity of the bonds shall never be called into question in any court in this state." Consequently, after the validation of certain municipal bonds, as recited above, no writ of error to the judgment validating the same having been sued out within the time prescribed by law, it was not error for the court below to refuse to enjoin the issuance of said bonds at the suit of certain taxpayers of the town issuing the bonds, upon the ground that the town was not authorized "to establish a system of waterworks in the town, nor a system of electric lights in the town"; the construction and installation of the system of waterworks and electric lights in the town being the objects to which the proceeds of the bonds were to be applied. Epping v. City of Columbus, 117 Ga. 263, 43 S. E. 803; Holton v. City of Camilla, 184 Ga. 560, 68 S. E. 472, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 116, 20 Ann. Cas. 199; Baker v. City of Cartersville, 127 Ga. 221, 56 S. E. 249. Whether the ground set forth in the petition for injunction, that "the levy of a tax to pay the interest and principal of the bonds will require the levy of a tax in excess of the rate of one-fourth of 1 per cent., the limit of the taxing power of the municipality as fixed by its charter," would be a good ground for injunction, is not decided, as the evidence did not require a finding that a levy of a tax sufficient to pay the interest and principal of the bonds would exceed the charter limit.

(a) The recovery of the amount of an open account was waived; and if there was a lack of specification as to its items, this will not require a reversal.

Where a bond for title stipulated that it was not transferable, and the obligee, before paying any of the notes given for the purchase money, executed a warranty deed to a third person, in which there was a provision binding the grantee to pay the purchase-money debt of the grantor, and the grantor became the tenant of the grantee, and where the grantee paid to the obligor in the bond more than half of the purchase-money notes as they became due, if thereafter the maker of the bond, with the consent of the obligee therein, accepted from another the unpaid balance of the purchase money before it fell due, and executed to such person a fee-simple conveyance, he taking with notice of the rights of the grantee from the obligee in the bond, and thereafter conveying to such obligee a life estate in one-half of the land, under such circumstances the grantee from the obligee in the bond could, in a proper equitable action, obtain a decree against the person so taking a deed from the obligor in the bond, requiring such person to make a deed to the plaintiff upon payment of the amount paid out by such defendant, less proper credits for mesne profits, and a decree against such person and the obligee in the bond, canceling the deed to the latter and recovering the property.

(a) No question of whether tender was necessary arises under the pleadings and evidence.

(b) The obligor in the bond having died, no representative of the estate was made a party, and the action proceeded against the grantee from such obligor and the obligee in the bond. The defense was not by an administrator of such obligor, but by the obligee and the person taking a conveyance from the obligor, with notice.

Hill, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Early County; W. C. Worrill, Judge.

Action by A. J. Singletary against Caroline Cowart and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

On January 27, 1907, A. J. Singletary filed his equitable petition against R. S. Grimsley, H. H. Grimsley, Caroline Cowart, and Mrs. E. E. Holmes. It does not appear that Mrs. Holmes was served, or that her administrator was made a party after her death. The petition alleged in substance as follows: On December 24, 1902, Mrs. Holmes bargained to Caroline Cowart a certain described lot of land. The purchase price was fixed at $1,250, represented by 23 notes of $50 each, and one note for $100, falling due, respectively, on the 1st days of September, October, November, and December, in each successive year thereafter; the last note being due on December 1, 1908. Mrs. Holmes gave to Caroline a bond for title in accordance with these terms. On January 12, 1903, Caroline Cowart represented to the plaintiff that she was unable to comply with her agreement to pay the notes as they became due, and offered to convey to him the land if he would pay the notes as they matured. She accordingly executed to him a warranty deed for the land, in which was contained a recital that he bound himself to see that her obligations to Mrs. Holmes should be complied with. He accordingly paid to Mrs. Holmes the notes as they matured, and at the date of the filing of the petition he had paid to her 15 of the notes, amounting to $750, besides interest. Caroline Cowart, after the execution of her deed to the plaintiff, leased the land from him, and remained in possession thereof as his tenant; but the term of her tenancy has expired. On November 6, 1906, she and R. S. Grimsley, for the purpose of defrauding him and defeating his rights, and with full knowledge of them, had Mrs. Holmes to execute to Grimsley a warranty deed to the land. (H. H. Grimsley, though made a party, appeared in the progress of the case to have no interest in the matter.) R. S. Grimsley paid to Mrs. Holmes the balance due on the land, and all the purchase-money notes were surrendered to him, except those which the plaintiff had previously taken up. Grimsley made a deed conveying a life estate in one-half of the land to Caroline Cowart. It is the purpose and intention of Grimsley to take possession of the land, and of Caroline Cowart to surrender it to him. The plaintiff has always been ready, willing, and able to comply with his contract and pay the balance of the purchase-money due as it matured, and he offers to do so. He prays that Grimsley be enjoined from taking possession of the land; that Caroline Cowart be enjoined from surrendering it to him; that she be ousted from possession; that his lien for rent be established; that Grimsley be required to accept so much of the purchase price of the land as has fallen due by the terms of the notes, and be required to deliver to the plaintiff the notes for such amount held by Grimsley, and to accept the payment of the remaining notes as they mature; that, upon the payment by the plaintiff of the balance of the purchase money, Grimsley be required to execute to the plaintiff a deed to the land; that the deed from Grimsley to Caroline Cowart be surrendered and canceled; and for process and general relief. The plaintiff amended by alleging that Caroline Cowart was insolvent, and that the defendants had remained in possession, and had enjoyed the rents, issues, and profits, of the yearly value of $200, for which the plaintiff prayed judgment as mesne profits.

Answers were filed by R. S. Grimsley and Caroline Cowart, in which they denied the alleged grounds for recovery, and averred that Grimsley was a purchaser for value from Mrs. Holmes. They attacked the deed from Caroline Cowart to Singletary on substantially the following grounds: (1) It was procured by fraud. (2) It was procured by duress. (3) It was upon an inadequate consideration, coupled with great disparity in mental capacity on the part of the contracting parties. (4) It was given to secure a usurious debt. (5) It was given as a security for or in payment of the debts of her husband. It was also contended that Singletary made no valid and binding promise in writing to pay the notes given by Caroline Cowart to Mrs. Holmes. Caroline Cowart offered, in her answer, to pay to the plaintiff any sum that might be found justly due to him.

A demurrer to the petition was overruled, but no exception was taken to that ruling. A verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. The case was brought to this court, and the judgment was reversed on account of errors in the charge. Grimsley v. Singletary, 133 Ga. 56, 65 S. E. 92, 134 Am. St. Rep. 196. Later the case was referred to an auditor, whose report found in favor of Singletary. A motion for a re-reference was made and denied; and to this ruling exceptions pendente lite were filed, and error was subsequently assigned thereon. Exceptions of law and fact to the report of the auditor were filed. The presiding judge overruled the exceptions of law, declined to approve the exceptions of fact, and rendered a decree, in substance, that Grimsley should recover of Singletary $435.70, with interest from the date of the auditor's report (that being the difference between the amount paid by Grimsley to Mrs. Holmes and the amount found against him on account of mesne profits for the half of the land to which he had held possession), less $100 for the rent of the land for the then current year; that, upon tender of payment of this net amount, Grimsley should execute to Singletary a conveyance of the premises in dispute; that the plaintiff recover of Caroline Cowart and Grimsley the premises in dispute, subject to a lien in favor of Grimsley for the amount decreed in his favor, with interest; that Singletary recover of Caroline Cowart $570 rent; and that the deed from Grimsley to her be canceled. Caroline Cowart and Grimsley excepted. The record does not show whether Mrs. Holmes was ever served. No answer by her is in the record. But it appears in the evidence that she was dead at the time of the trial, and no representative on her estate is shown to have been made a party. Other material facts appear in the opinion.

Walter Park, of Blakely, and Pope & Bennett, of Albany, for plaintiffs in error. A. G. Powell, of Atlanta, and C. L. Glessner, of Blakely, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] 1-3. The members of this court are agreed as to all matters involved in this case, except one. The issues of fact were found in favor of Singletary by a jury on a former trial, and by the auditor when the case was referred to him. The presiding judge has approved that finding, and the evidence was sufficient to authorize him so to do. There was no error in overruling the motion for a re-reference. The report of the auditor, while somewhat meager, was sufficiently full to withstand the attack made upon it in the motion for a re-reference, and a reversal is not required. This disposes of the contention that the deed made by Caroline Cowart to Singletary was procured by fraud; that the transaction was not in fact a sale with an option to repurchase, but was the securing of an indebtedness; that this debt was infected with usury and included a debt of her husband; that there was such mental disparity between the parties and such inadequacy of consideration as to amount to fraud; and all others depending on questions of fact. Under the evidence, the decision in Baggett v. Trulock, 77 Ga. 369, 3 S. E. 162, is not controlling. See, in this connection, Felton v. Grier, 109

Ga. 320, 35 S. E. 175; McElmurray v. Blodgett, 120 Ga. 9, 47 S. E. 531; Brown v. Bonds, 125 Ga. 833, 838, 54 S. E. 933.

[3] We were requested to review and overrule the decision in Felton v. Grier, supra. Its special application to this case is the ruling that, it being legally possible for the owner of real estate to sell it to another at an agreed price and at the same time secure the right to repurchase, the law will enforce such a transaction when actually made. Whether any criticism can be made upon anything that was said in the opinion is immaterial. The principle announced is correct, and we decline to reverse it.

[4] 4. It was urged that Singletary did not bind himself in writing to Caroline Cowart to pay the purchase-money notes which were given by her to Mrs. Holmes; that, if there was any promise to that effect, it was in parol; and that such a promise was obnoxious to the statute of frauds. In the deed to Singletary it was recited that Caroline Cowart had given her notes for the purchase money of the land to Mrs. Holmes, and that "Singletary bonds [binds] himself to see that said bond is complied with." The acceptance of this conveyance by Singletary bound him to carry out such covenant. Kytie v. Kytie, 128 Ga. 387 (2), 57 S. E. 748. As between him and his grantor such an agreement to pay purchase money was not within the statute of frauds. Ford v. Finney, 35 Ga. 258; Gorman v. Wood, 73 Ga. 370, 374; Coldwell Co. v. Cowart, 138 Ga. 233, 243, 75 S. E. 425.

[5] 5. We now come to the only point of difference between the members of this court. The bond for title which was given by Mrs. Holmes to Caroline Cowart, after describing the terms of the sale and the notes given for the purchase money, and binding Mrs. Holmes "to make or cause to be made" good and sufficient title in fee simple to the land upon payment of the notes, contained the following: "It is hereby understood and agreed that time is of the essence of this contract; and should the party of the second part fail to pay said notes as they become due, then this bond to become null and void, and whatever money shall be paid shall be treated as rent at the rate of $150 per annum. And it is further stipulated that this bond is not transferable to any one." Under the facts of the case, the majority of the court are of the opinion that neither of the two clauses above quoted prevented Singletary from having equitable relief. The first clause declares time to be of the essence of the contract, and provides for a forfeiture in case of nonpayment of the purchase money. This clause does not undertake to put any restriction upon the transfer of the bond or the alienation of the property by the purchaser. There was no evidence to show that Mrs. Holmes ever claimed any forfeiture or breach of the bond arising from nonpayment.

On the contrary, she received payment from Singletary of 15 of the notes substantially, if not exactly, as they fell due, and received a large part of the purchase money from Grimsley in discharge of the remaining notes before they were due. She could not, of course, claim a forfeiture and at the same time receive the purchase money. So that any contention that there was a forfeiture and a resale, without regard to the original contract, finds no support whatever in the evidence. Indeed, such is not the contention; but this clause is used in support of the position that there was a limited restriction on alienation, as will appear below.

The clause of the bond for title upon which this branch of the case depends is the second clause above quoted, which reads as follows: "And it is further stipulated that this bond is not transferable to any one." If the insertion of such a stipulation in the bond for title rendered the conveyance by the obligee to Singletary absolutely void, so that he acquired no right thereunder, and no equity arose in his favor by reason of the payment of a large part of the purchase money to Mrs. Holmes, and so that Mrs. Holmes could make a conveyance to Grimsley, receiving from him the balance of the purchase money, less what Singletary had paid, and so that Grimsley could convey a life interest in half of the land to Caroline Cowart, and Singletary could thus be entirely left out, and would have no equitable right whatever, then the finding of the auditor and the decree of the court were wrong; otherwise, they were right. There was evidence tending to show that Mrs. Holmes knew that Singletary was sending to her money to pay the notes of Caroline Cowart as they fell due, and that she accepted the money from him and delivered up the notes so paid. There was also abundant evidence to show that Grimsley knew that Caroline Cowart had made a deed to Singletary, and that Singletary had leased the place to her as his tenant, and that Grimsley was thus affected with notice that Singletary had or claimed some character of interest in the land before Grimsley took a deed from Mrs. Holmes. It is also undisputed that, in acquiring title from Mrs. Holmes by paying the balance of the purchase money before it was due, Grimsley knew that a large part of the purchase money had been paid, and that he was receiving the benefit of such payments, and was getting the land for such balance, and not for the entire amount stipulated in the bond. He testified in general terms that he did not know that Singletary had made these payments, but thought that they had been made by Caroline Cowart; but he admitted having testified on a former trial that Caroline had told him that she had made a deed to Singletary, and, as stated above, there was evidence showing that he was put on notice or inquiry as to Singletary's interest, and the auditor found against him. Hence, in considering whether the report of the auditor and the decree can be declared to be erroneous as matter of law, we must accept it as a fact that Grimsley acted with notice of Singletary's interest. Under such facts, can it be held that Singletary had no equitable rights, and that he was cut off from all relief by reason of the provision in the bond for title that it was not transferable? The argument in favor of such a position must rest substantially upon one or all of these contentions: First, that the bond obligating the maker to convey a fee-simple title upon payment of the purchase money is to be analogized to a conveyance in fee simple, and that in such a conveyance there may be a limited and reasonable restriction upon alienation; second, that the bond for title is to be analogized to a chose in action, which at common law was not assignable; third, that it is to be considered as a contract between the obligor and the obligee, and that the obligor had the right to provide with whom she desired to deal, and that the contract should not be assignable.

Before taking up each of these contentions separately, it may be well to note that, strictly speaking, there was no transfer of the bond, but that the obligee made a warranty deed to Singletary. Whatever title the maker of such a deed might acquire thereafter by payment of the purchase money would pass to her grantee. Parker v. Jones, 57 Ga. 204; Isler v. Griffin, 134 Ga. 192, 87 S. E. 854; Powell on Actions for Land, § 141. By the payment of the part of the purchase money, he or she undoubtedly acquired an equitable interest, which could be conveyed. We deem it unnecessary to consider the question of whether the record of her deed carried constructive notice to Grimsley, as we have found that there was sufficient evidence to show actual notice on his part. If this conveyance by Caroline Cowart to Singletary be treated, as substantially an assignment of the bond for title to him, nevertheless was it void, and did he acquire no rights thereunder, or by virtue of his payment of a considerable part of the purchase money?

The first contention stated above is dependent upon analogizing the restraint upon an assignment of a bond for title to a restriction upon alienation by the grantee in a fee-simple deed. Civil Code, § 3657, declares: "An absolute or fee-simple estate is one in which the owner is entitled to the entire property, with unconditional powers of disposition during his life, and descending to his heirs and legal representatives upon his death intestate." This definition excludes the right to limit the power of disposition during the life of the grantee, if the estate is one in fee simple. Moreover, by section 3718 of the Civil Code it is declared: "A condition repugnant to the estate granted is void." In Freeman v. Phillips, 113 Ga. 589, 38 S. E. 943, it was held: "A devise giving a fee in land to remaindermen on the termination of a life estate, with the restrictions that the remaindermen should 'never mortgage, rent, or sell said parcel of land,' vests in such remaindermen, at the death of the life tenant, a fee in such land free from the restrictions sought to be imposed. The restraint upon alienation, being repugnant to the nature of the estate, is void." We are not dealing now with base fees, or reversions, or limitations over, or with the question whether, construing a particular conveyance as a whole, the estate conveyed is in fact a fee simple, or a less estate, but with a conveyance in fee simple in which it is sought to restrict the right of alienation by the grantee.

If we look to authorities outside of our own Code and decisions, attempts to impose general restraints on alienation in granting a fee-simple estate are held void, as repugnant to the estate granted. Restraints upon alienation of leasehold interests, estates for years, and the like are held to be valid, in order to protect the versionary interest of the grantor. Some courts have held that, coupled with the grant of a fee-simple interest, there may be a reasonable restraint on alienation for a limited time, or prohibiting a conveyance to a particular person, or the like. The leading case in this country in which this subject is elaborately discussed is De Peyster v. Michael, 6 N. Y. (2 Seld.) 476, 57 Am. Dec. 470. In Mandelbaum v. McDonell, 29 Mich. 78, 18 Am. Rep. 61, the subject was again discussed at length by Christianity, J. He attacked vigorously the statement of some text-writers and judges that a grant of a fee-simple estate could be made, and at the same time the grantee could be restricted from selling such estate for a limited time. He declared that this statement had arisen from a misconception of the actual ruling in Large's Case, 2 Leonard, 82, and had been perpetuated by erroneous obiter dicta which had grown into positive assertion. In conclusion he said: "And we think it would be unwise and injurious to admit into the law the principle, contended for by the defendants' counsel, that such restriction should be held valid, if imposed only for a reasonable time. It is safe to say that every estate depending upon such a question, would, by the very fact of such a question existing, lose a large share of its market value. Who can say whether the time is reasonable, until the question has been settled in the court of last resort; and upon what standard of certainty can the court decide it? * * * The only safe rule of decision is to hold, as I understand the common law for ages to have been, that a condition or restriction which would suspend all power of alienation for a single day is inconsistent with the estate granted, unreasonable, and void." See, also, 2 Jarman on Wills (2d Ed.) 1490. This seems to accord with the definition of a fee-simple estate in our Codes. See, also, in this connection, Manierre v. Welling, 32 R. I. 104, 78 Atl. 507, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1311, and note.

In 24 American and English Encyclopedia of Law (2d Ed.) 867, it is said: "There are many dicta, as well as a few direct authorities, to the effect that restraints on alienation for a limited time are valid; but in a number of cases the validity of such restraint has been said to be doubtful, and on principle, and according to the weight of authority, a restriction, whether by way of condition, or of limitation over, or of bare prohibition against any and all alienation, although for a limited time, of a vested estate in fee, whether in possession or remainder, is void. In the case of a contingent remainder, however, or of any other interest not vested, a restriction upon the power of alienation to last as long as the interest remains contingent is valid." As stated above, we need not consider the subject of conditions or limitations over, here mentioned, as they are not now involved. In jurisdictions where it is held that a restraint upon the right to sell a fee-simple interest for a limited time is permissible, it is generally held that, to be enforceable, it must be coupled with a reversion or a limitation over. 1 Warvelle on Vendors (2d Ed.) § 451, p. 532; Fowlkes v. Wagoner (Tenn. Ch. App.) 46 S. W. 586; Fowler v. Duhme, 143 Ind. 248, 42 N. E. 623, 637. In 1 Warvelle on Vendors (2d Ed.) § 453, p. 533, it is said: "Restraints with respect to time have in several instances been held good, and the conditions sustained, provided the restriction is limited to a 'reasonable period'; but the weight of authority would seem to be against the validity of restraints upon alienation, however limited in time." See, also, Gray, Restraints on Alienation (2d Ed.) §§ 54, 105, et seq.

Without entering at length into the various authorities on this subject, we think it is clear that, if the test applicable to conveyances of a fee-simple estate with an attempted restriction on alienation were applied to the provision of the bond for title now under consideration, it would not be valid. Even should we follow those authorities which hold that there may be a restraint upon alienation for a reasonable time, the restraint sought to be imposed in this bond is not in terms limited as to time. The preceding provision of the bond, which declares time to be of the essence of the contract, and authorizes, or seeks to authorize, a forfeiture in case of nonpayment, cannot help the case. It did not declare a reasonable time within which there should be no alienation; nor does it appear that the obligor in the bond has in any manner sought to declare a forfeiture. If it could be held that this amounted to a restraint upon alienation for a reasonable time, namely, until the last payment should fall due, it could only be enforced for the benefit of the obligor. And when Mrs.

Holmes received the purchase money due to her in full, she had no further right to insist on the restraint upon alienation.

The writer has dwelt at some length on the question of restraint upon alienation of a fee-simple estate, because it is an important principle in the law of real estate, and there should be no misapprehension as to it, and also because in consultation some of our Brethren were of the opinion that the analogy is important, if not controlling, in the case. In so far as the argument rests upon the rule that at common law choses in action were not assignable, so as to convey title, but only an equitable interest, it is sufficient to say that this rule has been changed by our statute. In Civil Code, § 3853, it is declared that "all choses in action arising upon contract may be assigned so as to vest the title in the assignee, but he takes it, except negotiable securities, subject to the equities existing between the assignor and debtor at the time of the assignment, and until notice of the assignment is given to the person liable." In Bewick Lumber Co. v. Hall, 94 Ga. 539, 21 S. E. 154, a written instrument was as follows: "Credit check $6.50. Number 687. February 20, 1891. Issued to Aaron Hatton. Not transferable. Payable on demand in merchandise by Bewick Lumber Company. Johnsonville, Georgia. G. B. Monroe." It was held that this was a chose in action arising upon a contract, and that it was assignable, under the provisions of the Code section above quoted. This ruling was made in spite of the fact that the paper contained the words "not transferable." It may be remarked, however, that this was not an executory contract containing mutual obligations. That class of contracts will be next considered.

The third ground upon which the argument rests is that parties have a right to contract, and, among other terms of a contract, to provide that it shall not be assignable, and that, as against the party who does not consent to the assignment, the assignee obtains no right. Certain classes of contracts are inherently nonassignable in their character, such as promises to marry, or engagements for personal services, requiring skill, science, or peculiar qualifications. When rights arising out of contract are coupled with obligations to be performed by the contractor, and involve such a relation of personal confidence that it must have been intended that the rights should be exercised and the obligations performed by him alone, the contract, including both his rights and his obligations, cannot be assigned without the consent of the other party to such contract. The rule is sometimes stated by saying: "Contract rights coupled with liabilities, or involving a relation of personal confidence between the parties, cannot be transferred to a third person by one of the parties to the contract without the assent of the other."

good & Co., 116 Ga. 945, 43 S. E. 257. That case furnishes an illustration of the rule. The contract then before the court bound a railway company, for a sufficient consideration, to put in a side track to connect its main line with the sawmill of a certain firm, and to transport over its railway lumber shipped by that firm at a certain rate; and it bound the firm to ship all the lumber cut by them over the company's railway, with a named exception. The firm entered upon the contract an assignment of their interest in it, and the transferee entered upon it an assignment to another firm, who sought to enforce the contract against the railway company. It was held that such a contract was not assignable without the consent of the railway company.

In Sims v. Cordele Ice Co., 119 Ga. 597, 46 S. E. 841, it was held that an option or contract right to purchase designated property within a given time at a stipulated price, payable in installments, and coupled with certain other agreements, upon the credit of the person owning such right, was not assignable without the consent of the other party.

In Simms v. Lide, 94 Ga. 553, 21 S. E. 220, a contract under seal was made by the owner of land to convey it to another upon payment of a stipulated price within a given time. It recited a consideration of $5. Before the end of the period mentioned the obligee in the contract agreed with another person to sell his interest in the land arising under such contract. He caused the amount of purchase money to be tendered to the maker of the agreement, which she refused. He then filed an equitable petition, for the use of the person with whom he had contracted, to enforce specific performance. It was held by this court that, after the obligee in the contract had elected to pay the stipulated price, and had tendered it within the specified time, and demanded a conveyance, specific performance might be enforced at his instance, "suing in behalf of a third person to whom he has sold all his interest in the premises or in the contract sought to be enforced."

In Perry v. Paschal, 103 Ga. 134, 29 S. E. 703, Perry executed to Sims a paper in the following terms: "This is to certify that I have this day bargained to Jim Sims fifty acres of land off of the southeast corner of lot No. 240 in the 4th district of Terrell County, Ga.; the road running from the Hayes place to Dorse Henry's being the line. I agree to make him a good title on his paying me $500. I agree to run said amount three years, provided he pays the rent promptly." Within less than a year after the making of this instrument, a certain person, on behalf of Sims, tendered to Perry the principal and interest in full, and demanded that a deed be made to Sims. Perry declined to do so. Two days later Sims transferred all his interest under the paper to one Paschal. Paschal tendered to Perry the principal and interest due, and demanded a deed, which was refused. Paschal filed an equitable petition to compel specific performance. It was held that "an assignee of such an agreement, who takes it from the vendee, being thereby subrogated to all his rights, assumes, upon filing a proceeding to enforce the agreement, all his liabilities thereunder, and upon a continuance of the tender is entitled to maintain an action for specific performance of the agreement."

In Sims v. Cordele Ice Co., supra, the two cases last cited were distinguished from the one then under consideration, on the ground that the right to purchase the property in controversy for a designated sum was neither coupled with the assumption of any further liability by the purchaser to the seller, nor did it involve any relation of personal confidence between the parties. In other words, where it was a mere matter of paying the money and taking a title, and the money was paid or tendered, so that no further obligation remained open for performance, the contract was assignable.

In Robinson v. Perry, 21 Ga. 183, 68 Am. Dec. 455, R. and P. entered into a contract by which P. leased from R. a lot of land for five years, covenanting to build on it a comfortable cabin, and clear and keep under good fence 20 acres of the lot, or more, if he chose, and at the expiration of five years to pay R. $100 for the land, and in the meantime to pay the taxes on the lot, and then the title to the land was to be made to him by R. P. assigned his interest in the land. It was held that the interest was assignable, and that the assignees might have specific performance of R., on showing compliance with the covenants to be performed by P. In these cases the question of limiting by agreement the power to assign a contract, so as to transfer both the rights and duties of the party attempting to make the assignment was not involved. But they throw light on the question, by illustrating the difference between the assignability of an executory contract involving liabilities and mutual obligations, and one involving merely the payment of a sum of money and the taking of title, where the purchase money is paid or tendered. This distinction is important in connection with contracts which contain a provision against assignment, as well as in regard to contracts which are nonassignable without such a provision as will be seen later on.

It has been quite frequently said that the parties to an executory contract may in terms prohibit its assignment, so that an assignee does not succeed to any rights in the contract by virtue of the assignment. This broad statement, however, is subject to certain modifications. It would hardly be held that a vendor and vendee of land could contract that the vendee should never assign or yield possession of the land sold, and thus preclude it from being seized and sold for the vendee's debts. As to a contract for the sale of land, such a provision is simply for the benefit or security of the vendor. If the vendor receives the full purchase price, he needs no further security, and can no longer insist on a provision against alienation or assignment, the object of which was to secure such payment or to limit his dealings in regard to the sale to his vendee. If a case might arise where other rights of the vendor than the payment of the purchase money require protection, no such fact appears in this case. The vendor may also waive such a provision by his conduct.

In Cheney v. Bilby, 74 Fed. 52, 20 C. C. A. 291, a contract for the sale of land contained a stipulation "that no assignment of the premises or of his contract shall be valid unless with the written consent of the first party and by the indorsement of the assignment thereon." An assignment was made. Subsequently the assignee filed an equitable petition against the vendor, alleging that all of the engagements of the vendee had been promptly fulfilled. One objection raised was that, if it should be conceded that the original vendee could enforce specific performance of the contract, his assignee could not do so. Caldwell, J., said: "This restraint upon the power of the purchaser to assign the contract unquestionably expired when the last purchase-money note fell due, and complete performance of the contract was tendered by the complainant. The complainant's right to a deed then became absolute. From that time the seller was a mere naked trustee of the legal title, and the purchaser or his vendee the equitable owner of the land. It was no longer any concern of the seller what the beneficial owner of the land did with it, for he no longer had any interest in it. The purchaser had the right to convey his equitable title, or assign his contract to whom he pleased, without asking Cheney's consent; and his vendee would succeed to all his rights." It was then said that the sale or assignment had in fact been ratified, and it was added: "Inasmuch, then, as the provision in question was only intended to secure the faithful performance of the agreement by the purchaser or his assignee, it would be both unreasonable and inequitable to hold that Cheney, the vendor, is privileged to take advantage of the provision, to avoid performance on his part, after the entire amount of the purchase money has been promptly paid or tendered. We must assume, whatever may be the fact in this regard, that the provision against assigning the contract without the vendor's consent was inserted therein for an honest and legitimate purpose; that is to say, for the purpose of securing the punctual payment of the purchase money, and a full compliance with other executory agreements, either by the original purchaser or by his assignee."

In Grigg v. Landis, 21 N. J. Eq. 495, it was held that, where it appears on the face of a contract respecting the sale of land that the prohibition of assignment is not the main purpose of the covenant, but a mere incident to and security for such purpose, the contract is assignable in equity, and the assignee has all the equitable rights of the assignor. It was said that, the restriction being in the nature of a mere security for the performance of the principal covenants, such relief may be given by a court of equity as shall appear to be equitable under the circumstances of the case. See, also, Wagner v. Cheney, 16 Neb. 202, 20 N. W. 222; Johnson v. Eklund, 72 Minn. 195, 75 N. W. 14; Thomassen v. De Goey, 133 Iowa, 273, 110 N. W. 581, 119 Am. St. Rep. 605.

Turning now to some of the decisions in this state, in Street v. Lynch, 38 Ga. 631, Burnett purchased land from Hanna, took a bond for title, and paid him a part of the purchase money. Lynch bought the land from Burnett, paid the entire purchase money, and took a bond for title. Burnett deposited with him the grants from the state of Georgia, and promised to return home and pay the balance of the purchase money to Hanna, and then make a deed to Lynch. Instead of doing so, Burnett sold the land to Street before he paid the balance of the purchase money to Hanna; and Burnett and Street went to the widow and father of Hanna, who had died, and Burnett paid the balance due on the land with part of the money which Street was to pay him for the land, and at his request the Hannas made the deed, not to him for Lynch's benefit, but to Street, the subsequent purchaser. Chief Justice Brown said: "Now the whole case would seem to turn upon notice. If Street, at the time he made the purchase, had notice of the sale to Lynch, he took subject to the rights of Lynch, and held the land as the trustee for Lynch, and the most he could claim was, that Lynch pay him the amount of balance of purchase money paid by him to Hanna, when he was bound to make Lynch a deed and deliver the possession to him."

In Brown v. Crane, 47 Ga. 483, it was held: "Where M. held a tract of land under bond for titles from W., and sold the same to C., executing a bond to make a fee-simple title so soon as he obtained a title from W., C. paying the purchase money in full, and B., with a full knowledge of these facts, confederating with others, by threats, etc., induced M. to sell the land to transfer to him W.'s bond, under which transfer B. procured a deed from W., held, that a demurrer to a bill filed by C., setting up the foregoing facts and praying that B. may be decreed to execute to him a title to said land, was properly overruled." Chief Justice Warner in the opinion said: "The view which a court of equity will take of it is to regard the defendant as holding the legal title to the land in trust for the benefit of the complainant, who had previously purchased and paid for it, and of which fact the defendant had full knowledge at the time he purchased the land from Maulden and procured the legal title thereto to himself."

In each of these cases there was no direct assignment of the bond for title held by the original vendee, but he gave an independent bond for title and received the purchase money; and it was held that one who took with notice of that fact took subject to the right of such purchaser. In the present case, the original obligee in the bond conveyed the land by warranty deed to Singletary, and the evidence sufficiently shows that Grimsley took his deed from the obligor with notice of Singletary's rights. See, also, Bryant v. Booze, 55 Ga. 438; Pearson v. Courson, 129 Ga. 656, 659, 59 S. E. 907.

It is true that, in the cases from which quotations are made above, the original bond for title did not contain a stipulation against a transfer. But if we are correct in the statement which we have made, that the ground on which such a stipulation can be sustained in an executory contract is for the protection of the vendor, that there was no hint of any right on the part of Mrs. Holmes requiring protection, except to secure payment of the purchase money, and that when she had been fully paid she could not further insist on such a stipulation as against the grantee of her purchaser, then, under the facts of this case, the stipulation in the bond for title had served its purpose and was no longer of force. Mrs. Holmes did no more than protect herself by such a stipulation until she received her purchase money. She had received it in full. She conveyed her title, and took up her bond for title. While she was named as a party in the action, it appears in the evidence that she died, and her administrator appeared to have been made a party; so that neither she in her lifetime nor her administrator after her death appeared and sought to enforce the stipulation against assignment. The only persons who are attempting to assert priority over the rights of Singletary, and who claim that Singletary has no interest because of such stipulation in the original bond, are Grimsley, who took with notice of Singletary's rights, and sought to get advantage of the payments which had been made by the latter, and Caroline Cowart, who could not set up such a claim against her warranty deed. In this respect the case differs from such a case as that of Lockerby v. Amon, 64 Wash. 24, 116 Pac. 463, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1064, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 228, if we should follow the court in speculating as to whether the vendor might have had some other need for protection operating after payment or tender of the purchase money, which a majority of this court are not prepared to do.

Under the facts are disclosed by the evidence, Grimsley and Caroline Cowart could not defeat Singletary's rights, because of the stipulation in the bond from Mrs. Holmes to Caroline Cowart that it should not be transferred.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except

HILL, J. (dissenting). I cannot concur in the decision reached by my learned Brethren in this case. The evidence tends to show that Mrs. Holmes owned a farm in Early county. She had leased it for a number of years to Singletary, who in turn subrented it, first to Shep Cowart, and later to his wife, Caroline. At the expiration of the lease to Singletary, Caroline Cowart, whose husband had become involved in debt, and who had formerly belonged as a slave to the parents of Mrs. Holmes, made a contract of purchase for the lot of land in controversy with Mrs. Holmes for the sum of $1,250, the latter executing to Caroline a bond for title, with the stipulation that "this bond is not transferable to any one." Singletary was a merchant and did a supply business. The Cowarts were indebted to him for supplies for the farm. Caroline, before the first purchase-money note became due, and before she had paid any of the purchase money, executed a deed to the land to Singletary, "for and in consideration of that A. J. Singletary will comply with the conditions of the bond she holds from Mrs. E. E. Holmes, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged." Contemporaneously with the execution of the deed, Singletary executed an instrument by the terms of which he declared that he had "leased to Caroline Cowart all of the cleared land" on the lot in controversy for a term of six years, the consideration of the lease being 1,750 pounds of middling lint cotton payable October 1st each year. It is stipulated in this lease that Singletary agrees at the "termination or end of this lease, should the said Cowart pay all rents that may be due on this lease and all other indebtedness that she may owe said Singletary, and in addition $750, then the said Singletary agrees to make said Cowart a deed to said lot of land. It is distinctly understood that this is a lease contract, and not a sale; but, as stated, should said Cowart at the termination of this lease pay all rents, all other indebtedness, and $700, the deed is to be made."

The evidence of Caroline and her husband tended to show that she did not know she was executing a deed to Singletary; that they were ignorant, and could neither read nor write, and were told by Singletary that the instrument was merely a "showing" or note for what they owed Singletary. The testimony of Singletary tended to deny all this, and to show that it was understood that the instrument signed was a deed. Caroline brought cotton to Singletary each fall after the lease, which her evidence tended to show was to be applied by him, as her agent, to the land notes of Mrs. Holmes.

Singletary insists that he paid the money arising from the sale of the cotton to Mrs. Holmes on his own account as part of the purchase money, and not on the contract of Caroline with Mrs. Holmes. He testified: "I would not say positively I wrote and told her I had bought the land or not. I would not say I wrote her that, but I wrote her to give her to understand that it was a good debt, and I would take it up; but I would not say that I wrote her, and told her Caroline had deeded me the land. She knew I was paying them. She knew I wrote and told her to send them to the bank. Q. She did not know who it was for? A. I don't reckon she did. I wrote and told her I would pay the notes. * * * I just wrote Mrs. Holmes I would see the notes were paid."

The evidence tends to show that Singletary paid a portion of the notes, the first four directly to Mrs. Holmes, and the others through the bank. Caroline had possession of the first four notes paid. After a number of the notes had been paid by or through Singletary, the evidence tends to show that Caroline induced R. S. Grimsley to take up the remaining purchase-money notes, amounting to $727, which he paid to Mrs. Holmes upon Caroline's request, and Mrs. Holmes consented to, and did, execute a warranty deed to Grimsley, upon the promise of the latter to give Caroline a home for her lifetime." After the execution of the deed from Mrs. Holmes to Grimsley, the latter executed a deed to Caroline to "a life interest" in one-half of the lot of land in controversy. It is provided in this deed that in the event the land shall be levied upon by any process whatever, or that Caroline or Shep Cowart shall lease or sell the land, it shall revert to the grantor.

From a careful inspection of the record in this case, I think that the court erred in entering a decree requiring Grimsley to execute to Singletary a deed to the premises in dispute. I am aware of the rule that "if, after notice that another has made a contract for the purchase of land, a third person cuts in, buys it, and takes a conveyance, such person stands in the place of his vendor, and a court of equity, if it would decree a specific performance of the contract against the latter, will render a like decree against the former." Bryant v. Booze, 55 Ga. 438. But the present case is different from the Bryant case. There is no evidence in the instant case that Mrs. Holmes, the original vendor, ever knew that Caroline had sold to Singletary a title that she did not possess. The title was in Mrs. Holmes, and she was not bound, in selling it, to examine the records and see whether some one else claimed a title to her land. This duty may be upon a purchaser, but not upon one having the legal title and who desires to sell; and it is clear that Mrs. Holmes had the legal title. Nor is there in the record any evidence tending to show that Mrs. Holmes knew that Sing-tary was paying her the money for himself, but, on the contrary, Singletary testified, "I don't reckon she did" know who the money was paid for. Under the circumstances, Mrs. Holmes could not be made to execute a deed to Singletary. She had not contracted with nor sold to him the land. She had no knowledge that he was paying her the notes as a purchaser, from herself, or from Caroline. She had sold to another (Caroline), and the latter had requested that titles be made to Grimsley. How could Mrs. Holmes be made to perform specifically to Singletary, when she had never contracted to do so, or in any other way become bound to do so? If she cannot be made to perform specifically as to Singletary, I fail to see how her vendee can be so compelled. Mrs. Holmes' administrator was not a party to this suit.

It is argued that the assignee of the obligee in the bond stands in the shoes of the obligor, and that when part of the purchase money is paid by the assignee, and the remainder is tendered by him to the vendor, the latter will be compelled to execute a conveyance. But the reply is that there was a restriction in the bond for title that it was not to be transferable. The assignee had notice of the restriction; and there is authority that such restriction, if reasonable, is valid. Thus "a condition may be imposed in a deed on the power of alienation in certain cases, as that the land shall not be conveyed before a certain date, or to a certain person." 2 Devlin on Real Estate, § 382. In the case of Griggs v. Landis, 19 N. J. Eq. 350-353, it is said: "Any person in selling his property, or making a contract for the sale, has a right to make such agreements and conditions as the purchaser will assent to, provided they are not contrary to law, or the policy of the law. It is not allowed to make property inalienable; it is contrary to the policy of the law; but it is permitted to restrain alienation for a limited time, or for certain specified purposes, or on certain conditions. * * * And there is nothing inequitable in the provision that until all arrears are paid up, and all stipulations complied with, the contract shall not be assigned, even in equity. It must be held, therefore, that the assignment, made in express violation of the positive provisions of the contract, is void, and the complainant, claiming through such assignment, is entitled to no relief in equity."

In 1 Warvelle on Vendors (2d Ed.) § 452, it is said: "While the general principle that the conveyance of an estate in fee simple imports absolute ownership in the grantee, and that any restriction or condition imposed inconsistent with or repugnant to the estate so granted is void, seems to have been adopted as a universal rule of law, it has nevertheless been held in England from very early times that partial restraints may properly be annexed to a grant of the fee, and that the grantee may not disregard such partial restraint under penalty of forfeiture of his estate. This doctrine has also been recognized in some of the American states, and in a number of states it has been held that a condition not to alien to a particular person or persons is valid"—citing Cowell v. Col. Springs Co., 100 U. S. 55, 25 L. Ed. 547; Gray v. Blanchard, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 284; Jackson v. Schutz, 18 Johns. (N. Y.) 174, 9 Am. Dec. 195. Likewise: "Restraints with respect to time have in several instances been held good, and the conditions sustained, provided the restriction is limited to a reasonable period." Id. § 453, citing Stewart v. Brady, 8 Bush (Ky.) 623; Dougal v. Fryer, 8 Mo. 40, 22 Am. Dec. 458; Langdon v. Ingram, 23 Ind. 360.

In the case of Lockerby v. Amon, 64 Wash. 24, 116 Pac. 463, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1064, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 228, the defendants entered into a written contract whereby they agreed to sell S. certain real estate. A cash payment was made, and the remainder was to be paid on or before two years after the date of the contract, with interest at eight per cent. per annum. It was provided in the contract that the "parties of the first part will sell to the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns." It was also provided that, if the purchase money was paid according to the intent and tenor of the contract, then the parties of the first part were to make a warranty deed to the premises to the party of the second part. It was further provided that "no assignment of this agreement shall be valid without the consent and signature of W. R. Amon and Sarah M. Amon, his wife, the parties of the first part." The contract was afterwards assigned by the obligee to J., who tendered the full amount due under the contract and demanded a deed. On being refused, he brought suit to compel specific performance. A judgment of dismissal was entered, on the ground that the contract was not assignable. The Supreme Court of that state affirmed the judgment, holding: "A provision in a conditional sale contract of real estate that it shall not be assigned without the consent of the vendor is valid, and an assignee without such consent secures no enforceable rights under the contract." In answer to the argument in that case that the restriction against alienation was designed only to insure payment of the purchase money, and, that being tendered, there could be no reason for withholding the deed, Chadwick, J., well said: "These arguments are not new, and find some support in the authorities; but they have been rejected by a majority of the courts. The privilege of selecting a grantee is an incident of ownership, and we cannot presume, as did the Supreme Court of Minnesota, that 'at most this stipulation against an assignment is merely collateral to the main purpose of the contract designed as a means of securing and enforcing payment of what was undertaken by the vendee, to wit, the prompt payment of the purchase money. When the vendor has received all his purchase money he has received all that he is entitled to, and all that the provision against an assignment was intended to secure.' Johnson v. Eklund, 72 Minn. 195, 75 N. W. 14. While this reasoning is entitled to consideration, we cannot accept it as the end of the law. A vendor may have confidence that his vendee will not use the property to his disadvantage. It is his privilege to decline to deal with strangers. Or he may, by limiting the right of assignment, save any question as to the interest of intervening third parties, a result not altogether unlikely under our community property system. Or he may be unwilling to assume to pass upon the legal sufficiency of an assignment." And in the case of Omaha v. Standard Oil Co., 55 Neb. 337, 75 N. W. 859, it was said: "It [the assignment of the bond] compelled the city to deal with strangers, and to determine at its peril which of the contesting claimants was entitled to the fund. This may have been one of the very contingencies contemplated by the city, and against which it sought to provide by making the contract nonassignable." And see 88 Am. St. Rep. 201; 4 Cyc. 20. In Langdon v. Ingram, 28 Ind. 360, it was held: "A condition that a grantee or devisee shall not alienate for a particular time, or to a particular person, is good."

But it may be insisted that such a restriction as that contained in the bond in the present case, against alienation of the bond for title, is against public policy and void, unless by the terms of the restriction there is a limitation over of the property, or a forfeiture of the rights of the obligee in case of alienation; and there is some authority to that effect. But if a restriction against alienation, without a clause of forfeiture, is void as being against public policy, I fail to see why it is not equally so when there is a provision for forfeiture in case of alienation; for the foundation of this rule of public policy is that the public welfare demands that there be freedom to dispose of what one owns, and there is as much restraint on disposition where a forfeiture is imposed as when there is simply an agreement not to transfer.

Nor is the restriction void in this case because it amounts to a perpetuity. Under my construction of the bond for title, it cannot be transferred until the time when the last purchase-money note is paid, and I think that this is a reasonable time within which to limit alienation. And, as held in many jurisdictions, a contract in restraint of alienation is not void if not unreasonable. An option in a lease to be exercised within 15 years has been held not void as against perpetuities. 1 Page on Contracts, § 382. Any other rule than this would deprive two or more persons of the right to contract; and this itself would be contrary to public policy. Two or more persons may contract without let or hindrance, provided the contract does not contravene some rule of law or of public policy. It is the right of every one to contract with whomsoever he pleases; and to hold that one cannot so contract, within the limitations above specified, would be to deprive him of a constitutional right. One has the right to select the person with whom he deals, and to restrict the time of payment named in a contract to a reasonable time, and prohibit alienation within such time; and that is only what this contract does. What was the effect of the restriction in the bond? If a reasonable condition imposed in a deed is valid, a similar one in a bond for title would likewise be valid. The effect of the condition in this bond was that there could be no transfer of the bond, or a conveyance of the land in controversy by the obligee in the bond, until the last purchase-money note was paid; and this, I think, was a reasonable condition. The evident purpose of the vendor was to secure a home to her old servant, Caroline, and she was not to alienate or transfer the bond until it matured and the vendor could execute to her a deed to the land. The restriction as to alienation was limited, at all events, to a period of about six years, the maturity of the last note, as the bond stipulated that "time is of the essence of this contract; and should party of the second part fail to pay said notes, as they become due, then this bond becomes null and void, and whatever money is paid shall be treated as rent at the rate of $150 per annum." It follows, from what has been said, that Caroline could not alienate or transfer the bond before the last note was due, and whosoever took a deed from Caroline before that date, with notice of the condition in the bond, was bound by that condition; and having no power to transfer the bond, she certainly could have no power to convey the land before the time stipulated in the bond. Therefore, when Singletary took the deed with notice of the condition in the bond, he acquired no right contrary to the condition.

This case is very different from the Bryant Case, supra, where a third person had "cut in" to deprive a purchaser of his trade. In the view I take of the case, at the time Grimsley purchased the land from Mrs. Holmes, Singletary had not effected a legal contract of purchase of the land from Caroline, on account of the restriction in the bond providing that she could not alienate it, or with Mrs. Holmes; and hence Grimsley had the legal right to purchase from any one having the legal right to sell. Mrs. Holmes never having parted with the legal title to Caroline, nor having sold to Singletary, so far as the evidence discloses, and Caroline having no right to sell to Singletary, Grimsley had the right to purchase from Mrs.

Holmes, with the consent of Caroline that her contract with the obligor be canceled; and, having done so, Grimsley secured a good title relatively to Singletary and Caroline. While it is true Grimsley had notice of the deed from Cowart to Singletary, he also had notice of the restriction in the bond. It may be that Caroline is liable to Singletary on her warranty, if she executed the deed to him, as the auditor finds that she did, and that she is estopped from setting up that she had no title to the land; but I think there is no privity as between Grimsley and Singletary, and consequently the court could not, for the reasons given above, compel Grimsley to execute a deed to Singletary, or enter a decree canceling the deed from Mrs. Holmes to Grimsley, or enter a judgment for any amount against Grimsley.

WILLIAMS v. STATE. (No. 4,389.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 30, 1918.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 335*)—LIMITATIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where, to relieve an accusation from the bar of the statute of limitations, a fact constituting an exception to the statute is alleged, the burden is on the state to prove the exception.

(a) Where, from an accusation charging a misdemeanor, alleged to have been committed by defrauding a certain corporation, it appeared that the offense was committed more than two years before the date of the accusation, and it was alleged that the offense was unknown to the corporation until within the two years preceding the date of the accusation, the burden was upon the state to show that the offense was unknown until within that period to any of the officers or agents of the corporation whose knowledge would be imputable to it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 723-728, 730-751; Dec. Dig. § 335.*]

Error from City Court of Elberton; Geo. C. Grogan, Judge.

Lewis Williams was convicted of swindling, and brings error. Reversed.

Z. B. Rogers, of Elberton, for plaintiff in error. Boozer Payne, Sol., of Elberton, for the State.

RUSSELL, J. Lewis Williams was accused in the city court of Elberton of the offense of cheating and swindling, and was convicted. The accusation charged that he represented to M. E. Maxwell & Co., a corporation, that he owned a certain mule, free of incumbrance, when, in truth and in fact, the mule did not belong to him, but was held by S. S. Brewer under a certain bill of sale. It was further alleged in the accusation that the crime was committed on March 16, 1909, but that the offense was unknown to the said M. E. Maxwell & Co. until April 1, 1911. The accusation was dated November 7, 1911. The defendant moved for a new trial upon the grounds (1) that the verdict was contrary to the evidence and without evidence to support it; (2) that it was contrary to law; (3) that the court erred in admitting in evidence a "retainer of title and mortgage note," executed by the defendant to S. S. Brewer & Settle, which instrument retained title and ownership in said S. S. Brewer & Settle to one black horse mule, about six years old, weighing about 1,000 pounds and known as the "Hill mule"; (4) that the court erred in admitting in evidence a mortgage given by the defendant to M. E. Maxwell & Co., which was not recorded in Wilkes county, although it was not disputed that the defendant was living in Wilkes county at the time of the execution of the mortgage and ever since; (5) because the court erred in giving in charge to the jury section 719 of the Penal Code.

The determination of the question as to whether the verdict is contrary to the evidence and contrary to law depends upon a consideration of the assignments of error relating to the admissibility of the testimony to which the movant objected, and for this reason we shall consider these grounds together. It is necessary to pass upon these assignments of error in view of the fact that we feel constrained to grant another trial, but we shall deal first with the assignment of error which requires us to give the case that direction.

The state failed to prove that the alleged offense was not barred by the statute of limitations. In the accusation it is alleged that the false representations which the defendant was charged with making were in fact made on March 16, 1909. The accusation was not preferred until November 7, 1911. To prevent the bar of the statute of limitations, and to bring the case within one of the statutory exceptions, the accusation further alleged that the offense set out was unknown by said Maxwell & Co. until April 1, 1911.

Where an indictment charges that the offense alleged to have been committed beyond the period of the statute of limitations was unknown, the burden is on the state to prove the exception. Filnt v. State, 12 Ga. App. 169, 76 S. E. 1032; Cohen v. State, 2 Ga. App. 689, 59 S. E. 4. In Mangham v. State, 11 Ga. App. 427-438, 75 S. E. 512, this court was dealing with a presentment, a proceeding in which there is no prosecutor; and, moreover, the point was not controlling upon the decision. The proof showed that M. E. Maxwell & Co. is a corporation. M. E. Maxwell swore that he did not know of the offense until the spring of 1911, and Sisk testified to the same effect. But the evidence did not disclose that either was an officer of the corporation through whom knowledge would be imputed to the corporation, or was an officer of the corporation at all. The proof does not show that there were not other officers of the corporation, or that the officers did not know, for a period of more than two years before the filing of the accusation, that the alleged offense had been committed. Presumably the corporation had officers. If the commission of the offense was known to them, their knowledge must be imputed to the corporation, the exception is not proved, and the offense is barred.

Unless the prosecutor was the only person interested in the offense, proof that it was unknown to him would not suffice to relieve the bar of the statute of limitations and bring the case within the exception, and so, where it affirmatively appears that a corporation is the party defrauded and the party interested in the prosecution, the state does not carry the burden resting upon it, unless it is affirmatively made to appear that none of those officers whose knowledge may be imputed to the corporation knew of the commission of the offense for a period of time exceeding two years prior to the commencement of the prosecution. In other words, it must appear that the prosecution was begun within less than two years from the time that knowledge of the commission of the offense was brought home to any single officer of the corporation whose personal knowledge, due to his relation, could be imputed to the corporation. The state having failed to bring the case within the exceptions set out in section 30 of the Penal Code, the verdict was contrary to law.

The court erred in admitting in evidence the note and mortgage retaining title in S. S. Brewer & Settle. The accusation charged that the defendant's statement, that the mule was unincumbered, which was made with the intent to deceive and defraud M. E. Maxwell & Co., was not true because "the aforesaid mule did not then and there belong to Lewis Williams, but was held by one S. S. Brewer under a certain bill of sale." This was a material allegation, and even if the note with retainer of title had been admitted without objection, there would be a fatal variance between the allegata and probata. Even in a civil case proof that the title to property rested in a partnership would not be admitted to sustain an allegation of individual ownership (Commercial Bank v. Tucker, 94 Ga. 289, 21 S. E. 507; Davenport v. Henderson, 84 Ga. 313 (1), 10 S. E. 920; East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia R. Co. v. Herrman, 92 Ga. 385 (3), 17 S. E. 344); and certainly in a criminal case there should be no greater laxity than in a civil proceeding.

Without regard to this, the document, the introduction of which was permitted by the court, should not have been admitted, because the accusation alleged that the defendant represented that he owned "a certain bay horse mule about six years old, weighing about 900 or 1,000 pounds, named 'Jim,' and that said mule was unincumbered"; whereas, in the note or mortgage admitted by the court, S. S. Brewer & Settle retained title and ownership in a "black horse mule, about six years old," "built on blocky order," and known as the "Hill mule." Omitting other points of difference, it is plain that the same mule cannot be properly described as a bay mule and at the same time be a black mule. The able counsel for the state very frankly and properly concedes that, if the allegation as to Brewer's ownership cannot be treated as surplusage, then there is a fatal variance between the allegata and probata, and the conviction will not be sustained.

There are many descriptive averments which could be omitted from an accusation, which, when made, become material and must be proved as laid. In the present case it might have been sufficient to allege that the defendant falsely stated to M. E. Maxwell & Co. that his ownership in the mule in question was unincumbered; whereas in truth and in fact the defendant did not own the mule, or his title was incumbered. It is doubtful, however, if such an allegation would have put the defendant sufficiently on notice of the charge against him to have enabled him to prepare and defend against the charge; but when the state alleged that his statement was untrue because the said mule was held by one S. S. Brewer under a certain bill of sale, this allegation became the crux of the case. It appears from the record that, but for the prior lien of S. S. Brewer & Settle, the M. E. Maxwell & Co. might be able to collect the sum of $69.02 by a sale of the mule, but that, due to the priority of the lien of Brewer & Settles, the Maxwell & Co. corporation is unable to enforce the collection of its debt, and therefore is subject to loss, and is defrauded.

In Fulford v. State, 50 Ga. 591, and many later decisions, it is said that if the entire averment may be omitted, of which the descriptive matter is a part, or can be rejected as surplusage, then the descriptive matter falls with it and need not be proved; also, "if any unnecessary averments disconnected with the circumstances which constitute the stated crime be introduced, they need not be proved, but may be rejected as surplusage." In Joyce on Indictment, § 359, the author says that the names of third persons who are collaterally connected with the offense, and whose identity is not essential to such a description thereof as is necessary to properly inform the accused of the nature and cause of the accusation against him, need not be stated. Under this rule it has been held that, in an indictment for betting at cards, the names of participants other than the defendant need not be given; and in an indictment for selling intoxicating liquors, the person to whom the sale is alleged to have been made need not be named; and in an indictment for resisting an officer who is taking a prisoner to jail it is not necessary to name the prisoner who is being carried. Many examples of like kind might be given, but, although it might have been unnecessary in the first instance to have named the person who held the retainer of title, we do not think that the averment can for that reason alone be treated as surplusage. An averment which may become material because it is incorporated as a part of the charge must be descriptive of an essential element of the crime, and we think this is the case in the present instance. According to the allegation of the accusation, the defendant's representation that he was the owner of the mule was false because the mule was the property of S. S. Brewer.

The facts with relation to the introduction of the mortgage given by the defendant to M. E. Maxwell & Co. on March 18, 1909, as certified by the trial judge, are as follows: The defendant objected when the mortgage was tendered in evidence upon the ground that its execution had not been proved. The mortgage gave evidence of having been recorded January 29, 1912, in the clerk's office of the superior court of Elbert county. When the defendant objected, the state's counsel replied that the mortgage had been recorded, and thereupon the objection was withdrawn. It does not appear that at this time the defendant's counsel saw the mortgage itself or examined the entry of record; but when he started to argue the case he moved the court to rule the mortgage out of the evidence because, the defendant having resided at that time and ever afterward in Wilkes county, and not in Elbert county, the mortgage was not entitled to record in Elbert county, and therefore it was not admissible without proof of its execution by the subscribing witness. The court overruled this motion, and exception was taken to this ruling. The evidence is undisputed that the defendant had never lived in Elbert county, and that at the time of the execution of the mortgage to Maxwell & Co., as well as since, he lived in Wilkes county; and of course the Code requires that mortgages to personalty be recorded in the county of the residence of the mortgagor.

Evidence of recordation sufficient to dispense with proof of the execution of a mortgage to personalty must be proof that the mortgage was recorded in the county of the mortgagor's residence. But since the execution of a writing may be proved by the admissions of the person who signed it, and there is some evidence in regard to admissions made by the defendant to the effect that he made a mortgage to M. E. Maxwell & Co., which may be inferred to be the same as the paper introduced in evidence, we are not prepared to hold that the judge erred in submitting to the jury the question as to whether the execution of the mortgage was sufficiently proved by these admissions of the defendant himself. The motion of the defendant's counsel, under the circumstances, did not come too late; for it is apparent, by the statement of the state's counsel, he was intentionally misled, and it was not too late for the state to ask that the case be reopened, and that proof of the execution of the mortgage be permitted. But in view of the testimony in regard to the admissions by the defendant that he execute a mortgage to M. E. Maxwell & Co., and there being no hint that he ever made more than one mortgage to this corporation, it does not appear that the defendant was hurt by the ruling.

The court did not err in charging the jury in the terms of section 719 of the Penal Code that "any person using any deceitful means or artful practices, other than those which are [specifically] mentioned in this Code, by which an individual, or a firm, or a corporation, or the public is defrauded and cheated is [guilty of] a misdemeanor under our law," upon the ground, as assigned, that the provisions of section 719 are inapplicable to the accusation. The prosecution was not based upon the provisions of section 703, for the alleged representation of the defendant was confined solely to the ownership of a certain mule, and did not relate generally to his "respectability, wealth, or mercantile correspondence and connections." This is conceded by counsel for plaintiff in error. Counsel insists, however, that the accusation, if it sets out any offense, charged the offense defined in section 713 of the Penal Code. We cannot concur in this view, for that section relates specifically to the subject of giving false information by one who is interrogated as to the facts, and it does not appear from the accusation in this case that the accused was interrogated as to whether there was a lien upon the mule in question or not. On the contrary, it would appear that his statement was made voluntarily and without solicitation or interrogation, with the purpose on his part of obtaining credit.

On account of the state's failure to prove that the offense was not barred by the statute of limitations, and the error of the court in admitting in evidence a document showing that title was reserved to a partnership not mentioned in the accusation, and in property not mortgaged to M. E. Maxwell & Co., the verdict finding the accused guilty was contrary to law and the evidence, and a new trial should have been granted.

Judgment reversed.

INSURANCE (§ 718*)—FRATERNAL BENEFIT ASSOCIATIONS—ACTION ON POLICY—EVIDENCE.

This case is controlled by the decision of the Supreme Court in Fraternal Life & Accident Association v. Evans, 140 Ga. —, 78 S. E. 915. It appears from the record that the plaintiff in error is a fraternal beneficiary association, and therefore is exempt from the rule prescribed in section 2471 of the Civil Code of 1910, which provides that the constitution or by-laws of insurance companies doing business in this state, whether they are foreign or domestic, shall not be received in evidence as a part of the insurance policy, or as an independent contract, unless embodied in or attached to the policy. The trial judge therefore erred in excluding from evidence the by-law of the plaintiff in error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1854; Dec. Dig. § 718.*]

Error from City Court of Athens; H. S. West, Judge.

Action by E. S. Blackshear against the Supreme Ruling of the Fraternal Mystic Circle. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

T. S. Mell, of Athens, for plaintiff in error.
W. M. Smith and Cobb & Erwin, all of Athens, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Mrs. Blackshear sued the Supreme Ruling of the Fraternal Mystic Circle on a benefit certificate upon the life of her husband, Thomas B. Blackshear, for $2,000. The defendant association pleaded that it was a fraternal beneficiary order as defined in chapter 2, art. 9, § 7 (section 2866-2877), of the Civil Code; that the deceased came to his death by his own hand, and that the certificate provided, as one of its conditions, that each member should comply "with the constitution, laws, rules, and requirements of the Supreme Ruling of the Fraternal Mystic Circle, now in force or as they may be amended or altered"; and that the insured had agreed in his application for membership that the constitution and by-laws were a part of the contract as fully as if they were set forth at length therein.

One of the by-laws of the defendant association provides that in the event that a member commits suicide within the first 20 years of his membership, whether the act be voluntary or involuntary, conscious or unconscious, or whether the insured be sane or insane at the time, or if the insured die from the effect of any drug administered by himself, then the beneficiaries of such member shall be entitled to only one-twentieth of the amount of the death benefit stated in the certificate for each year of the membership of the insured. It was uncontradicted that the insured himself inflicted the wound which caused his death. The case was tried by the court sitting as court and jury, and the judgment rendered for the plaintiff was the amount of the certificate. The defendant moved for a new trial upon the general grounds, and also upon the ground that "the court erred in holding that the constitution and laws and by-laws of the defendant were not binding on the plaintiff because they were not attached to the certificate sued on"; the defendant insisting that it is a fraternal beneficiary order, and as such is exempt from the provisions of the law requiring by-laws to be attached to the certificate or policy of insurance.

There was sufficient evidence to authorize the court to find that the insured was insane at the time he killed himself, that he was a member of a subordinate ruling in Macon, Ga., that the contract was in force at the time of his death, that the age of the insured was correctly stated in his application, and that the plaintiff was the beneficiary named in the contract. Therefore the only real question presented in the case is whether the court erred in holding that the by-laws of the defendant were not binding upon the insured or the plaintiff because they were not attached to the certificate, and erred in not sustaining, for that reason, the defense predicated upon the by-law, under which the defendant insisted that it was only indebted to the beneficiary in the sum of $341.14, which it had tendered.

The plaintiff in error asks that we review the ruling of this court stated in paragraph 6 of the decision in the case of Heralds of Liberty v. Bowen, 8 Ga. App. 325, 68 S. E. 1008. The same request is made by counsel not employed in the present case, but having cases involving the same point, who were granted special permission to file briefs.

This case is controlled by the ruling of the Supreme Court in Fraternal Life & Accident Association v. Evans, 140 Ga. —, 78 S. E. 915, in which it was held that fraternal beneficiary orders shall be governed exclusively by the provisions of chapter 2, art. 9, § 7 of the Civil Code (sections 2866-2877), and are, by the provisions of section 2869, exempt from the provisions of section 2471, requiring life and fire insurance policies, which refer to the application for insurance or to the constitution, by-laws, or other rules of the company, to contain or have a copy of the same attached thereto, in order to authorize the introduction of such constitution, by-laws, or rules in evidence as a part of the policy. The trial judge, therefore, erred in holding that the constitution, by-laws, rules, and requirements of the Supreme Ruling of the Fraternal Mystic Circle, were inadmissible for the reason that the same did not appear in the certificate of membership and were not attached thereto by copy as an exhibit.

It is not necessary to review the ruling in the case of Heralds of Liberty v. Bowen, supra, because the point here presented was not involved when that case was before this court. This is plain from the wording of paragraph 3 of that decision, in which we held that "an association which issues policies of insurance, but, so far as appears, has no ritual nor any initiation, cannot be legally classed as a fraternal beneficial association under the laws of Georgia, and may be treated as an ordinary insurance company." This ruling related especially to the matter of service, upon which we ruled in the preceding part of the decision; but it is not in conflict with the sixth paragraph, in which we held that the act of August 17, 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 107), now embodied in section 2471 of the Code, applied to such assessment associations as the Heralds of Liberty appeared from the record to be (as indicated in paragraph 3 of the decision); i. e., associations without ritual or form of initiation, or lodge form of government, but purporting to be and sometimes called "fraternal associations." It appears from the record in that case that, though the Heralds of Liberty had supreme headquarters located in a sister state, Bowen had never been initiated, and there was not, at that time, a single lodge within the state of Georgia, nor any proof that Bowen was a member of any subordinate lodge here or elsewhere.

The distinction between assessment companies, such as the record shows the Heralds of Liberty to be, whether fraternal or not, and fraternal beneficiary associations, dealt with in chapter 2, art. 9, § 7 of the Civil Code, is pointed out by Presiding Justice Evans in Fraternal Life & Accident Association v. Evans, supra. In that case the court rules that "the General Assembly have differentiated fraternal beneficiary associations from co-operative and assessment companies. The latter are classed as insurance companies (Civil Code, §§ 2412 to 2450), while the former are exempt from the provisions of the insurance laws (section 2869 of the Code)." Having held in the Bowen Case, supra, as to the matter of service, that the plaintiff in error was not a fraternal beneficiary association, we were certainly compelled to hold that it was not exempt (not being a fraternal beneficiary association) from the requirement of section 2471 of the Civil Code, as to the matter of incorporating in the certificate or attaching thereto, as an exhibit, a copy of its constitution, by-laws, or rules, before they would be admissible in evidence.

The case at bar comes squarely under the ruling in Fraternal Life & Accident Association v. Evans, supra. The proof shows that the Supreme Ruling of the Fraternal Mystic Circle is the supreme body of that fraternal beneficiary association, which has subordinate lodges (or "rulings"). The supreme council is a representative body, and, before membership, applicants must be formally initiated according to the ritual. Upon this state of facts the Supreme Court ruled that such fraternal beneficial associations, unlike mutual co-operative and assessment insurance companies (and this includes all fraternal insurance companies which do not possess the requisites essential to constitute them fraternal beneficiary associations), are, by the provisions of section 2869 of the Code, exempt from the rule prescribed in section 2471. It follows that the trial judge, in the case now before us, erred in excluding from evidence the by-laws of the defendant fraternal beneficiary association.

Judgment reversed.

1. CONTRACTS (§ 94*)—FRAUD—EFFECT.

Fraud voids all contracts (Civ. Code 1910, § 4254), and the law is liberal in allowing ways and means for relieving from the consequences of fraud, provided the presence and evil of the alleged fraud is first shown.

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 108*)—FRAUD (§ 20*)—WHAT CONSTITUTES—FALSE STATEMENTS.

The court correctly sustained the demurrer to that paragraph of the defendant's answer which stated that the defendant was induced by fraud to sign the note. If the defendant could read, there was no reason why he should have reposed special confidence in the agent of the plaintiff; nor was there any exigency which compelled him to haste in executing the note. The agent of the plaintiff did not fully state the contents of the note, but his statement as to the matter to which the statement related was true. But even "a false statement is not fraudulent, when there is no reason why the statement should be believed and acted upon." Branan v. Warfield & Lee, 3 Ga. App. 586 (2), 60 S. E. 325.

3. EVIDENCE (§ 441*)—CONTRADICTION OF WRITING—WARRANTY.

If the answer of the defendant had set up such a state of facts as would have authorized the conclusion that the defendant was induced to sign the note by fraud on the part of the agent of the plaintiff, the defendant would have been entitled to introduce proof of a breach of any warranty from which resulted a failure of consideration. But since the defendant failed to allege that the execution of the contract was induced by fraud, his plea, in which it was sought to contradict the terms of the written contract by parol testimony in support of the defense that there had been a breach of an oral warranty given prior to the contract, was properly stricken. The contract here involved contained no express warranty. The allegation that its execution was procured by fraud was necessary, and proof to that effect was essential, before the defendant would be permitted to ingraft upon the contract an express warranty as to the age of the mules. The case might be different if the defendant had merely pleaded failure of consideration resulting from a breach of the implied warranty that the mules were merchantable and reasonably suited for the purposes intended.

1. SALES (§ 428*) — ACTION FOR PURCHASE PRICE—SET-OFF.

A plea which properly alleged that the defendant had given notes for the purchase price of trees bought by him from the plaintiff, and had been compelled to pay these notes because they were transferred for value, before maturity, to innocent purchasers, should have been allowed as an amendment to the answer. Such an amendment would have afforded the defendant the right to set off, as against the account sued on, an amount, out of the sum paid by him to the innocent holder of the notes, equal to the damages which the defendant would be entitled to recover for breach of implied warranty as to the trees purchased by him. In other words, if the defendant was forced to pay the notes after the discovery of the defects in the trees purchased by him, because his notes were in the hands of innocent purchasers, whose rights could not be affected by failure of consideration or a breach of warranty, he could have pleaded the failure of consideration.

2. SALES (§ 435*) — ACTION FOR PURCHASE PRICE—ANSWER—SET-OFF.

In the present case the defendant sought to set up that he was compelled to pay the notes he had originally given to the plaintiff, because they were in the hands of innocent purchasers. However, the plaintiff specially demurred to this answer, upon the ground that the defendant's plea did not state when the alleged notes were given, or to whom they were transferred, nor otherwise state sufficient facts to enable the court to decide that the bank to which the defendant alleged he had paid the notes was a holder who purchased the notes before maturity, and therefore the statement that the bank was an innocent purchaser was a mere conclusion of the pleader. The plaintiff was entitled to know the time when the notes were given, and to whom they were transferred; and, upon the refusal of the defendant to amend his plea, it was not error to strike the plea.

3. DIRECTION OF VERDICT.

Upon the evidence submitted, so far as the same was pertinent to the pleading, the judgment of the court in directing a verdict was harmless to the defendant.

Error from City Court of Albany; D. F. Crosland, Judge.

Action by the Bacon Pecan Company against J. W. Gillespie. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

S. J. Jones and Mann & Milner, all of Albany, for plaintiff in error. R. J. Bacon, of Albany, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The G. M. Bacon Pecan Company brought suit on an account against J. W. Gillespie for $1,805.00, besides interest, for pecan trees alleged to have been furnished to Gillespie in 1912. Gillespie pleaded that the trees were bought by him for a corporation of which he was president, and that the corporation was liable and not himself.

It was admitted on the trial that the number of trees stated in the account attached to the petition, at the price named, were supplied as alleged, and the only question originally at issue in the case was whether Gillespie was liable individually, or whether his corporation, the Albany Paper Shell Pecan Company, was the party liable. On the introduction of evidence as to orders for the trees by J. W. Gillespie individually, and acceptance by the G. M. Bacon Pecan Company, the court held that the contract, as shown by the letters and replies, constituted, as a matter of law, a contract with J. W. Gillespie individually. Thereupon Gillespie offered an amendment seeking to set off damages by alleged breach of contract in connection with the trees furnished Gillespie during the winter of 1910-11, one year prior to the transaction which was the basis of suit. The contract, as appears from the record, was in writing, its terms being set forth in correspondence between the parties, and there is no express warranty therein.

The first amendment offered (the refusal to allow which is assigned as error) was based upon the theory of ingrafting an express warranty by parol upon the written contract, which was then in evidence. The defendant subsequently, by sworn amendment, which was allowed, set up a breach of implied warranty as to the trees furnished in the winter of 1910-11. There was evidence in behalf of the plaintiff showing a waiver of this implied warranty, by payment in full, after full knowledge of the number of trees that had died, and also by renewal of note after the facts of the alleged death of numbers of trees and the breach of the contract were discovered; but there was evidence for the defendant that the notes were paid, not voluntarily, but because they had passed to the bank as an innocent purchaser, and that as to the purchaser of the notes for value failure of consideration was no defense. Thereupon the court directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

2. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 138*) — LIEN ON CROPS—PRIORITIES—"JUDGMENT."

The purpose of the act of 1899 (Acts 1899, p. 78) was to give such preference to the mortgage creditor who furnished money or supplies to aid in making a crop as would enable insolvents, who might not otherwise be able to obtain credit, to pursue their ordinary vocation of farming, instead of being forced to become vagrants, and perhaps criminals. And since the legislative intention would be defeated if, merely because of priority of record, a contract lien were held to be superior to a lien of a judgment, which arises by operation of law, the word "judgment," as used in section 3349 of the Civil Code of 1910, so far as applicable to proceedings by rule brought to distribute funds in custodia legis, includes any final process under which the property (the proceeds of the sale of which are subject to distribution) was brought to sale or could have been legally sold.

Error from City Court of Monroe; A. C. Stone, Judge.

Action by Aycock Bros. against one Adcock to foreclose a mortgage on certain cotton. Judgment for plaintiff and J. G. & G. W. Durden placed a mortgage on the same property in the hands of the levying officer. Aycock Bros. brought a rule to determine question of priority of liens. Judgment for Aycock Bros., and J. G. & G. W. Durden bring error. Reversed.

Jos. H. Felker, of Monroe, for plaintiffs in error. Walker & Roberts, of Monroe, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. The single question presented by this record is whether the lien of a mortgage on a crop given to secure payment for advances furnished to aid in making and gathering the crop in the year in which the mortgage was given, is inferior to the lien of a mortgage given to another creditor to secure the payment of the debt of a former year, merely because it was not recorded until after the mortgage given to secure the older indebtedness was recorded in the clerk's office of the superior court. Generally, as among themselves, the priority of mortgage liens is fixed by the date of the record, in the absence of the elements of notice (Civil Code, §§ 3259, 3260); and in the present case the decision of the trial judge seems to rest upon the fact that the mortgage in favor of the defendant in error was recorded at a time prior to the record of the mortgage of the plaintiff in error. The following undisputed facts appear from the record:

One Adcock was indebted to the firm of Aycock Bros. for guano and other articles, which indebtedness was represented by two notes, one due October 1, 1911, and the other due October 1, 1912; both of them representing indebtedness for the year 1911. On May 18, 1912, Adcock mortgaged his crop of cotton to J. G. & G. W. Durden to secure payment for $200 worth of supplies, to aid, as stated in the mortgage itself, in making his crop of that year. On the same day he executed to Aycock Bros., as security for the payment of pre-existing indebtedness to them, a mortgage upon 3,000 pounds of his first lint cotton, to be grown upon the same place. The Aycock mortgage was recorded on the day of its execution; the Durden mortgage was not recorded until May 22, 1912. On October 15, 1912, Aycock Bros. foreclosed their mortgage; and before the sale of Adcock's cotton the Durdens placed their mortgage in the hands of the levying officer. Aycock brought a rule against the officer, and the question of priority of lien was submitted for adjudication to the judge of the city court of Monroe. There was testimony that one of the firm of Aycock Bros. had notice of the Durden mortgage when the Aycock mortgage was executed; but this evidence seems not to have been considered by the court, and it is immaterial, in the view that we take of the case here. Regardless of the question of notice, it is admitted that Aycock's mortgage was first recorded, but that Durden's mortgage was given to secure payment for supplies which were used to aid in making the crop of 1912, while Aycock's mortgage secured debts of the year 1911, and did not secure a debt to aid in making the crop of 1912. The trial judge directed the funds in court, after the payment of the costs, to be applied upon the mortgage fi. fa. of Aycock Bros., no doubt, as we have said above, determining the issue by the priority of the record.

[1] We think the court erred in this ruling. We have not been able to find any case in which the exact point has been decided by the Supreme Court, but we think that the rulings in Franklin v. Callaway, 120 Ga. 382, 47 S. E. 970, and Akin v. Comer & Co., 138 Ga. 733, 75 S. E. 1121, clearly indicate the importance of construing section 3349 of the Civil Code in accordance with the legislative purpose which was manifest in its passage. The section as taken from the act of 1899 (Acts 1899, p. 78) provides that "the lien of mortgages on crops, which mortgages are given to secure the payment of debts for money, supplies, and other articles of necessity, including live stock, to aid in making and gathering such crops, shall be superior to judgments of older date than such mortgages." As pointed out by Mr. Justice Lamar in Franklin v. Callaway, supra, it is apparent that the status of this enactment is somewhat anomalous. The Legislature was dealing with a condition in which persons holding older fi. fas. had liens on everything owned or which might subsequently be acquired by one who might wish to engage in farming. According to section 2787 of the Code of 1895 (Code of 1910, § 3329), the liens established therein stood in the following order: (1) Liens in favor of the state, counties, and municipal corporations, for taxes. (2) Liens in favor of creditors by judgment and decree. (3) Liens in favor of laborers. (4) Liens in favor of landlords. (5) Liens in favor of mortgagees. (6) Liens in favor of landlords furnishing necessities. At the time of the passage of the act of 1899 the lien of a judgment creditor was superior to the lien of a mortgagee subsequently acquired; and while, anterior to the passage of that act, the priority of the lien as among the mortgagees was established by the date of the record of their respective mortgages, it cannot be supposed that while the General Assembly was singling out that particular class of mortgages which secured the payment of supplies necessary to make crops, and making the lien of such a mortgage superior to the lien established by a judgment or decree, the Legislature intended that a mere contract lien, created to secure an indebtedness not of that class which it was seeking to prefer, should be entitled to priority over judgments. And yet to rule that because of priority of record a mortgage given to secure the debt of a previous year has priority of lien over a mortgage given to secure payment for supplies furnished in the year in which the crop was made, and which were furnished for the specific purpose of enabling that particular crop to be made, would in many cases have precisely that effect.

If the contention of the defendant in error is sound, the statement we have just made might be illustrated by the present case. If priority of lien is to depend solely upon the date of the record of the respective mortgages, the Aycock mortgage fi. fa. would take the fund in the hands of the constable (or sheriff, as the case may be) to the exclusion of the Durden supply mortgage fi. fa. Any judgment creditor of Aycock, by placing his fi. fa. in the hands of the officer, could, by rule, take the fund away from Aycock; and thus the provisions of section 3349 would be absolutely nullified, because the fund at last would have been applied to a judgment of older date than the Durden fi. fa. The judgment creditor could not take the fund directly from the Durden mortgage, but through the intermediation of the Aycock fi. fa. he could indirectly subvert the superiority of the Durden lien into inferiority. Or would the court have to hold in such a case that the lien of the Aycock mortgage was superior to the mortgage for supplies in favor of the Durdens because the Aycock mortgage was first recorded, but that, inasmuch as the lien of the judgment creditor who had intervened was superior to that of the Aycock mortgage, and the Aycocks could not hold the fund to be applied on their mortgage fi. fa., the fund should, by reason of this intervention, be applied upon the Durden mortgage, because the lien of the Aycock mortgage was inferior to the lien of the judgment?

It is very plain, from the rulings in the Franklin and Akin Cases, supra, that the recording of the mortgages provided for in section 3349 of the Civil Code is a matter of very little importance. It is adjudicated in those cases that it is a matter of no consequence whatever, where a mortgage given for supplies to aid in making a crop comes in conflict with an older fi. fa. In the Franklin Case Justice Lamar says, "Whether the paper was recorded on the day it was executed, or months afterwards, will make no difference," and in the Akin Case the mortgage for supplies was not recorded until after the fi. fa. had actually been levied. When a mortgage given to aid in making a crop comes in conflict with a mortgage given to secure a debt made for a different purpose, the matter of record cannot be of any more importance than when the contest is between the mortgage given for supplies and the fi. fa. on a common-law judgment, unless it was the intention of the General Assembly to give to mortgages executed to secure debts of every kind a priority over older judgments.

The use of the word "date" in section 3349 of the Civil Code is not without some significance. A lien can only find full fruition in final process. The Aycock mortgage could not have brought the crop here involved to sale without being foreclosed, or without a mortgage fi. fa., and the mortgage fi. fa. is final process (in a sense a judgment), unless its progress be arrested by some proceeding appropriate for the purpose of transforming it into mesne process. As no creditor or claimant interposed any objection to the proceeding to enforce the collection of the mortgage, and the fund in court was raised by the sale under the mortgage fi. fa., the affidavit to foreclose the mortgage, followed by execution, can well be treated as a judgment, and as such was inferior to the lien inherently present in the mortgage given for supplies, whether the latter had ever been recorded or not. Under the act of 1899 it took priority of an older judgment having a lien on the same crop, whenever it became a perfect crop mortgage for supplies. Franklin v. Callaway, supra. See, also, Thompson-Hiles v. Dodds, 95 Ga. 754, 22 S. E. 673; Dickenson v. Stults, 120 Ga. 635, 48 S. E. 173. As pointed out by Chief Justice Simmons in the Dodds Case, "before the adoption of the act of 1899, the effect of failure to record a mortgage within the time prescribed by law was to postpone it 'to all other liens created or obtained * * * before the actual record of the mortgage,'" and that act was not intended to place creditors on any better footing in this respect than that occupied by them before.

[2] 2. It is manifest that the Legislature intended by the passage of the act of 1899 to open a door of hope to persons engaged in the occupation of farming who might have become so heavily involved as to be unable to make a crop without assistance, and who could not obtain any assistance, because they had no means of securing supplies necessary to aid them in making a crop. A failure to make a crop the preceding year, or the loss of a crop, though either might be due to providential cause, might place a poor tenant or cropper in a position in which he would not be able to secure the payment of any advances made to him by pledge or lien upon property in his possession or control. Furthermore, he might be so greatly involved in debt that, even if he made a crop, this crop would be subjected to the superior lien of creditors who had obtained or who might obtain judgments against him; and thus he would be totally unable to comply with any obligations he might make in the spring in furtherance of his farming operations. The Legislature very wisely saw that it was possible, under these conditions, for a large class of our people to be left helpless and hopeless, with the strong probability that in numbers of these cases such persons would become vagrants and then criminals. And such a condition of affairs would tend necessarily to diminish the products of agriculture and to cripple the pursuit of this our leading occupation. A prudent man would not be willing to make advances with but small prospect of being paid for the supplies which he advanced, and when there was every probability that the crop, which could not have been produced without his intervention and assistance, would be diverted, from payment for the very supplies without which no crop would have been made, to the payment of creditors who had in no way aided in the creation of the crop, however just their older demands.

The purpose of the act of 1899 was to give insolvent farmers another chance, and it could only be done by giving to those who might wish to furnish farmers with the supplies, without which the crop could not be made, such security as would encourage the advancing of the necessary assistance in the way of supplies. The debt due for these supplies is declared, in the Franklin Case, to be in the nature of purchase money; and, considering the broad and beneficent purpose of the act, we conclude that it was the intention of the Legislature to put the lien of a mortgage, taken for the purpose of securing payment for such supplies, in a class by itself, apart from mortgages given to secure ordinary debts. This being true, the date of the record of the crop mortgage for supplies is immaterial, except in a contest as to priority in a case where there is a contest between two or more crop mortgages for supplies furnished in the year in which the crop was made. Even as to a crop mortgage for supplies for a different year from that in which the crop in question was made, it cannot be said that the supplies furnished were necessary in making that crop; nor can it be said that for that reason the debt due for such supplies is in the nature of purchase money, when the supplies were used for producing another and a different crop.

It is our opinion, therefore, that under the undisputed facts of the record the funds in the hands of the officer of the court should be paid upon the debt for the supplies which aided in producing the crop from which that fund was realized, and should be directed to be applied to the mortgage fi. fa. of the Durdens.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1001*)—VERDICT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

The evidence in the present record is substantially the same as it was on a former trial, upon a review of which it was held that a verdict in favor of either party would have been supported by evidence. Peavy v. Clemons, 10 Ga. App. 507, 73 S. E. 756.

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§§ 444, 449*)—PETITION—SUFFICIENCY—PLEADING AND PROOF.

Suit was brought by two named individuals, who in the first paragraph of the petition described themselves as administrators of the estate of a deceased person. The petition then set forth facts showing that the defendant was indebted to the estate in a named sum and prayed for process. Held: (1) In the absence of a special demurrer, the petition sufficiently showed that the persons named as plaintiffs were seeking to recover in their representative capacity as administrators of the estate of the deceased person named in the petition. See Civil Code 1910, § 5690. (2) It being admitted in the answer that the plaintiffs were administrators as alleged, it was not necessary for them to prove it; and a verdict in their favor as administrators should not have been set aside because of the absence of such proof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1813-1817, 1837-1841, 1850-1854; Dec. Dig. §§ 444, 449.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 667*) — VERITY OF RECORD—ANSWER.

In the bill of exceptions there is a specification of "the defendant's answer on which the case was tried." The clerk of the trial court transmitted with the record a paper purporting to be an answer filed in the case, duly verified, which contains an admission of the allegation in the petition that the plaintiffs are administrators of the estate therein referred to. This document must be treated as the answer filed in the case, notwithstanding a suggestion in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error that the answer which had been filed in the case was lost, and that in lieu thereof a paper purporting to be an answer was used on the trial, which contained a denial of the representative character of the plaintiffs. Especially is this true when the suggestion is made solely upon information received from others by counsel who had not been connected with the case before it reached this court.

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 683*) — SUPPLEMENTAL STATEMENT BY DEFENDANT—REBUTTAL.

While permission to a defendant in a criminal case to make a second or supplemental statement on his trial is a matter of discretion on the part of the trial judge, and the exercise of this discretion will not be interfered with unless abused, still it is error to refuse to permit a defendant to make a statement strictly in rebuttal of an alleged confession of guilt which was not shown upon the state's case in chief but was reserved and introduced as new matter after the defendant had made his statement.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1068*)—HARMLESS ERROR—CURE BY VERDICT—INSTRUCTIONS.

The refusal to instruct the jury that they could consider, on the question of damages, the "worldly circumstances" of the defendant, even if the instruction should have been given, was not harmful error, since the verdict was for the defendant.

5. CARRIERS (§ 315*)—ACTION BY STREET CAR PASSENGER—EVIDENCE ADMISSIBLE UNDER GENERAL ISSUE.

Where a suit is brought against a street railway company to recover damages for failure to perform its duty of protecting a passenger from alleged wrongful conduct of its motorman, the defendant, under the plea of the general issue, can introduce evidence showing that the conduct of the motorman was fully warranted and justifiable.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by Joseph Binder and others, executors, against the Georgia Railway & Electric Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Binder sued the Georgia Railway & Electric Company for damages for an assault and battery alleged to have been made upon him by an agent of the defendant while he was a passenger on one of its cars. The verdict was in favor of the company, and the plaintiff's motion for a new trial was overruled. The evidence makes substantially the following case: Plaintiff, while a passenger, sitting at the front of the defendant's car, was attracted by a scuffle on the rear end of the car, and, on looking back, saw an inspector of the company removing forcibly a man from the rear platform. The inspector, in so doing, pulled a black-jack from his pocket and hit the man with it across the face, and a stream of blood followed the blow. The motorman yelled, "That's good, hit him again," and with that stopped the car and ran back to the rear platform. Several passengers, including the plaintiff, stepped off the car. One passenger said, "It is a shame to hit a man that way." Plaintiff said, "Yes, it is a pity; the inspector shouldn't have struck him that way." The motorman said to him: "It is none of your God damn business; he has got a right to kill him if he wants to. You get to hell on the car; it is none of your business." Plaintiff replied, "I was not talking to you." The motorman ordered the passengers back on the car, and one passenger said to him, "If you are man enough, put me on." The passengers then got back on the car. The motorman continued to curse the plaintiff, and made motions as though to remove the brass lever, and seemed to be trying to draw the plaintiff into a fight. The plaintiff was standing on the front platform, and both men and women heard the motorman's abuse of him. When the plaintiff got off at his destination he told the motorman that he was going to report him, and thereupon the motorman cursed and abused him, calling him a "God damn liar," as he left the car. He was mortified and humiliated by the conduct of the motorman, but, because of the presence of lady passengers, he controlled himself, saying nothing except that he intended to report the facts to the company and ask for the motorman's discharge. He testified that at his request his attorney wrote to the company, stating the facts and asking that the motorman be discharged, and agreeing that if this was done he would be satisfied. On the second day following he got on a car of the defendant company. He did not then see who was the motorman. When he was getting off the car as his destination the motorman, the one who was on the car on the previous occasion, recognized him, "shook his fist, and said, 'God damn,' and something like 'a Jew,'" which was not fully understood by the plaintiff. The testimony of the plaintiff as to these facts was corroborated by other passengers. In rebuttal the motorman testified that the inspector who was trying to remove the man from the rear platform was his brother; that the plaintiff, who was on the front platform, said the inspector was "a dirty scoundrel"; that he (the motorman) said, "Go and tell him about it, don't tell me;" and the plaintiff said: "I will not do it; it is just a dirty outrage. The men of the street car company are a set of damn thieves and scoundrels anyway." Two witnesses testified that the plaintiff did not use the language imputed to him by the motorman.

Besides the general grounds that the verdict was without evidence to support it and was contrary to law, the motion for a new trial contains the following grounds: (1) That the trial judge refused to allow the plaintiff to prove the "worldly circumstances" of the defendant. (2) That the trial judge refused to allow the plaintiff to prove that after the occurrence complained of, whenever the motorman saw him, and while the motorman was performing his duty for the company, he shook his fist and clinched his teeth at the plaintiff. (3) That the trial judge refused to allow the plaintiff to introduce in evidence the following extract from a letter of his attorney to the defendant: "Mr. Binder does not desire to hold the company responsible for his mistreatment by this motorman, provided the company will remedy the situation, that permits a passenger to be thus insulted; he feels that such a man has no business in a position where he comes in contact with the public, and asks that you make a full investigation of this matter." (4) That the judge erred in allowing the testimony of this motorman to go in evidence, since this testimony was introduced for the purpose of proving justification, when there was no plea of justification, but only a plea of the general issue. This exception is presented in several forms in the motion for a new trial.

M. H. Silverman, of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error. Colquitt & Conyers, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. We think the general grounds of the motion for a new trial are without merit. The trial judge fully instructed the jury on the principles of law pertinent to the issues, as laid down in the case of Mason v. N., C. & St. L. Ry., 135 Ga. 741, 70 S. E. 225, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 280. Of course the general principle is well recognized that carriers are under a duty to exercise extraordinary diligence to protect their passengers not only from the insults of their servants but from the insults of their fellow passengers. The jury was authorized to believe in this case, under the evidence of the motorman, that this passenger was not entitled to the protection of the company, for, if the evidence of the motorman is the truth of the transaction, the passenger had forfeited this right of protection by his abusive language and opprobrious words used to the motorman. The evidence preponderates against the motorman's testimony; yet the matter was for the exclusive determination of the jury; and, if they believed the passenger did use opprobrious words to the motorman (the words to which the motorman testified), such words were sufficient to justify him in denouncing the statement made by the passenger and might have justified an assault and battery, although the evidence does not show that the motorman made any assault and battery, or even an assault upon the passenger. A passenger has no license, because of his relation as passenger, to use opprobrious words and abusive language, without provocation, to an employé of the company in charge of the car; and, if he does so, the employé has the right, within proper limitations, to protect himself and to resent the language of the passenger. Any provocation or aggravation of the servant by a passenger which will not fully justify him in his resentment will not free the master of liability. An act which may not amount to a justification may yet amount to a mitigation and, if the mitigating circumstances be strong enough or the injury small, may furnish a basis only for recovery of nominal damages. But, according to the evidence of the motorman in this case, the passenger was wholly unjustified in using the opprobrious words and abusive language, and the motorman became thus entirely justified in his conduct, and such conduct could not be the basis of liability against the master. Mason v. N. C. & St. L. Ry., supra, and cases therein cited.

[2] 2. Even if the refusal of the judge to allow the plaintiff to prove the worldly circumstances of the defendant company was erroneous, the error was immaterial and harmless in view of the verdict for the defendant. The jury never reached the question of the measure of damages, in that they found a verdict generally for the defendant, and this question is merely a moot question here. McBride v. Georgia Ry. & Elec. Co., 125 Ga. 515, 54 S. E. 674.

[3] 3. There was no error in the refusal of the judge to permit the plaintiff to show that, subsequently to the tort complained of, the offending motorman, whenever he would see the plaintiff riding on his car, would shake his fist and clinch his teeth at the plaintiff. This subsequent conduct might furnish cause for a separate suit against the company and might be construed to be an insult to the passenger, but it certainly was not relevant to the conduct made the basis of the present suit. The case of Gasway v. A. & W. P. R. Co., 58 Ga. 216, relied upon by the plaintiff in error, is not applicable to the questions made in this record. In that case the company retained the offending servant after knowledge of a tort for which the company was liable, and the subsequent conduct was pertinent to the point of ratification of the tort by the principal.

[4] 4. There was clearly no error in refusing to permit the introduction in evidence of an extract from a letter written by the plaintiff's attorney to the defendant. This extract illustrates no question in the record, was entirely irrelevant and immaterial, and was self-serving on the part of the plaintiff.

[5] 5. The remaining grounds of the motion for a new trial present in different form the one point that the defendant could not prove justification of the conduct of the motorman, and thus escape liability, without filing a formal plea of justification; that the proof was not admissible under the plea of the general issue. The rule is well settled as to torts that justification must be set up affirmatively and by a special, formal plea. Ratteree v. Chapman, 79 Ga. 574, 579, 4 S. E. 684. Pleas of justification refer to such torts as malicious prosecution, assault and battery, libel and slander, and the like. Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Morgan, 110 Ga. 168, 171, 35 S. E. 345. A plea of justification admits the tort and sets up facts of justification, and under such a plea the defendant has the affirmative and assumes the burden of proving justification. In the present case the gravamen of the complaint is not primarily liability for the tort of the motorman but liability for the neglect of the defendant company to discharge a public duty in the protection of its passengers from the insults of its employes, a duty which the law imposes upon it. In other words, the suit is based, not on the wrong of the motorman in insulting the passenger, but upon the failure of the carrier to protect the passenger from the insult. A petition which did not allege this failure of the carrier to perform its duty would be subject to demurrer. Now, when the carrier denies by a plea the essential fact upon which the claim for damages is predicated, to wit, the failure to protect its passengers from insult, it can prove under that general denial any fact which under the law disproves its liability; and it effectually escapes liability by proof that it did not fail in the performance of this obligation. Proof that the offending servant was justified in the use of the language complained of, or the insult given, or the unlawful act, necessarily proves that the carrier has not failed in the performance of its duty to the passenger. It would seem to be logically and legally impossible to file a plea of justification when the gist of the action is a neglect of duty. If the defendant admits the allegations of negligence, he necessarily admits not only prima facie liability but ultimate liability. In other words, it cannot justify its negligence in failing to perform its duty to the passenger, for the law authorizes no such defense; and, if it admits its own negligence in this respect, it can only defend by showing either that the plaintiff's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury or that the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have known of the defendant's negligence and avoided its consequences; and either of these defenses can be made under the general denial. We think this view is not only in consonance with sound reason but is clearly deducible from decisions of the Supreme Court.

In Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Morgan, supra, it was held that a plea of justification could not be made to a suit for injury to property by the running of a railroad train, and that all the evidence tending to show justification was admissible under a plea of the general issue. In Chapman v. A. & W. P. R., 74 Ga. 547, it was said that, to constitute a plea of justification, the facts alleged must be such as are not admissible under the plea of the general issue. Horton v. Pintchuck, 110 Ga. 355, 358, 35 S. E. 663; Brunswick & Western R. Co. v. Wiggins, 113 Ga. 842, 846, 39 S. E. 551, 61 L. R. A. 513; Cole v. A. & W. P. R. Co., 102 Ga. 474, 476, 31 S. E. 107.

We conclude that the case was fairly tried; and while the evidence preponderates against the verdict, yet there was some evidence to support it; and, as no error of law of a prejudicial character is shown by the record, this court will not disturb the judgment refusing another trial.

Error from City Court of Reidsville; M. C. Collins, Judge.

Action by Wilcox, Ives & Co. against C. W. Rogers. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

H. C. Beasley, of Reidsville, for plaintiff in error.

POTTLE, J. [1, 2] The defendant was indebted to the plaintiffs on a promissory note given for the purchase price of fertilizers. The note became due in the fall, and the plaintiff sent his collecting agent to see the defendant and obtain payment. The defendant did not have the money to pay but did have on hand 16 bales of cotton. He informed the agent that he was willing to ship these 16 bales to the plaintiffs in order that they might sell them and apply the proceeds on the note, provided they would honor his draft for $100, which he needed to pay his cotton pickers. The agent agreed for the cotton to be shipped but stated that he did not know whether his principal would honor the draft or not. Thereupon the defendant shipped the cotton to the plaintiffs and at the same time wrote a letter stating that the cotton had been shipped and requesting that it be sold on arrival, that his draft for $100 be paid, and that the balance be credited on his note. To this letter the plaintiffs replied, stating that they would handle the cotton to the best advantage and place the proceeds as a credit on the note. They declined, however, to pay the draft and requested that the defendant withdraw it. Thereupon the defendant wrote the plaintiff as follows: "Yours of the 15th inst. received; somewhat surprised; the 16 bales of cotton is my cotton yet; the contract must go where I say go. Now if you want to give me my note for some [same?] handle the same that way. If not you had better place contents as I tell you. We are sending draft back to you for collection. Pay same and send my note at once." To this letter the plaintiffs replied, declining to honor the draft, but stating their willingness to turn over the cotton to any factor the defendant might select, provided they were paid the amount of their indebtedness. They further stated that they were willing to sell the cotton to the best advantage and place the proceeds to his credit, and if anything was left, they would either honor his draft or forward check in settlement. The letter concluded with the statement that, if what had been said was not satisfactory, they would be glad to receive remittance in full, upon receipt of which they would turn over the bill of lading for the cotton to anybody the defendant might designate. The defendant made no reply to this letter. The plaintiffs sold the cotton, credited the proceeds on the note, and brought suit for the balance. The defendant pleaded an accord and satisfaction. The jury found in his favor; and the plaintiffs' motion for a new trial was overruled.

The evidence authorized the verdict. The plaintiffs' agent had no authority to accept from the defendant anything else than the full amount of the note in cash. The defendant was not bound to ship to the plaintiffs his cotton, nor were they bound to accept it.

When he shipped it, however, they were bound either to refuse to take it at all or to accept it upon his terms. The effect of the last letter written by the defendant was that he was willing for the plaintiffs to sell the cotton and apply the proceeds to the note, provided they would honor his draft for $100. If they accepted the cotton for the purpose of selling it and applying the proceeds to the note, they were bound to do so upon the terms stated in the defendant's letter; that is, upon the condition that they honor his draft for $100. This they declined to do but wrote to the defendant a letter proposing to sell the cotton upon the best terms possible and apply the proceeds to his note. The defendant, however, declined to agree to this but, on the contrary, peremptorily notified the plaintiffs that they must take the cotton upon the terms and conditions stated in his previous letter or let it alone. He further stated, in effect, that, if they did sell the cotton without paying his draft, they must do so upon the understanding that it paid his note in full. Upon receipt of this letter the plaintiffs were bound to do one of two things: Either to refuse acceptance of the cotton at all or to accept it upon the defendant's terms, which were either to honor his draft for $100 or to accept the cotton in full satisfaction of the note. The mere fact the plaintiffs wrote to the defendant a letter declining to accept his terms does not prevent the transaction from amounting to an accord and satisfaction, when they did actually accept the cotton and dispose of it and refuse to pay his draft. The cotton belonged to the defendant. He had a right to dictate the conditions upon which it should be received, and the plaintiffs were bound to comply with his terms upon their acceptance of the cotton. The charge complained of correctly embodied the principle above stated. The instruction upon the subject of reconciling conflicts in the testimony was not altogether accurate but is not sufficient cause for a new trial. The evidence authorized the verdict, and no material error of law was committed.

CERTIORARI (§ 42*)—PETITION—SUFFICIENCY.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; H. A. Mathews, Judge.

Action in a justice's court by C. L. Cooper against the Union Mutual Association. Judgment for plaintiff, and from an order of the superior court dismissing a petition for certiorari, defendant brings error. Reversed.

C. J. Johnson, of Macon, for plaintiff in error.

HILL, C. J. The petition for certiorari set out the following facts: On December 18, 1911, C. L. Cooper sued out against petitioner in said justice's court a proceeding to foreclose an alleged laborer's lien for $10 upon certain personal property, to wit, "more than 30 policies of insurance." Execution issued thereunder and was levied on said date by J. D. Barkley, a constable, upon a roller-top desk belonging to petitioner. When said levy was made, the defendant in execution (petitioner in certiorari) denied owing said pretended claim and offered to give bond. Refusing to comply with said request, said levying officer, under threat of immediately seizing said property, demanded and received from petitioner a cash deposit of $12 upon the representation that the same would be accepted and held in lieu of the bond required by law, which petitioner offered to make, and pending the making of the same; petitioner parting with said $12 upon the representation that the same would be refunded, and parting with the same as the only alternative to prevent the immediate seizure of said property, and under no agreement or condition of any kind whatever that the same should be applied to said pretended claim. The next day petitioner gave bond and filed a counter affidavit in said foreclosure proceeding. When the issue in the case came on regularly to be tried, the attorney for plaintiff in execution stated in his place that the court had paid over to him $10, the amount of the claim sued on, and that he had paid over the same, less his fee, to the plaintiff, and that the case was at an end so far as the plaintiff was concerned; that he had no further connection with the case as attorney for plaintiff, and advised and urged the court to enter up the case on the docket as having been settled and costs paid by the defendant. Petitioner's attorney objected and moved to dismiss the case for want of prosecution. The court overruled this motion. Petitioner's attorney then moved the court that the case proceed to trial on its merits, and this motion was overruled by the court, and the court then ruled that the case had been settled and costs paid by the defendant and made an entry to this effect on the docket. The answer of the justice to said petition for certiorari admitted the truth of petitioner's allegation that, on the next day after said levy was made, petitioner gave the levying officer bond with good and sufficient security approved by him, and also filed in said justice's court a counter affidavit in the case. The answer, however, denied other allegations in the petition. A traverse to this answer was duly filed.

The issue formed upon the petition for certiorari, the answer, and the traverse coming on regularly to be heard before a jury in the superior court, the judge took the case from the jury and passed an order dismissing the petition for certiorari on the ground that "the certiorari petition does not set out any clear and specific assignment of error upon any specific and judicial act of the justice, judicial decision, or judgment." In the petition for certiorari the following facts are set out, with the judgment of the court thereon, and a specific assignment of error made to the judgment: That the court overruled a motion by defendant to dismiss the case for want of prosecution; that the court overruled a motion by defendant that the case proceed to trial on its merits; that the court, over objection of defendant, ruled that the case had been "settled and costs paid by defendant," and entered up judgment accordingly. It is specifically alleged: First, that the judgment and rulings of the court are contrary to law; second, that the judgment of the court is contrary to the evidence; third, that the judgment is contrary to law for that petitioner has not been allowed his day in court and has not been given an opportunity to be heard on the merits of the case; that the court should have passed an order directing said levying officer to refund said $12 to petitioner before entering up final judgment in the case; fourth, that the judgment is contrary to the evidence and the law for that the case has not been settled; that the defendant (this petitioner) has paid nothing in settlement of said claim of the costs. We can hardly conceive of assignments of error more specifically and definitely made. Certainly the overruling of the motion to dismiss the case for want of prosecution is a specific and judicial act of the justice, constituting a judicial decision and judgment. So also was his overruling the motion that the case be tried on the merits, and certainly the ruling that the case had been settled, and an entry to that effect on the docket was a decision given by the justice and was in the strictest sense a judicial and final decision. It would seem that the errors complained of are meritorious, but of this we say nothing. We hold only that the judge of the superior court erred in his judgment that "the certiorari petition does not set out any clear and specific assignment of error upon any specific and judicial act of the justice, judicial decision, or judgment." But, irrespective of this, certainly the issue on the traverse should have been submitted to the jury. See 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 762; Fricks v. Miller, 41 Ga. 274; Craig v. Pope, 48 Ga. 551; Lowry POTTLE, J. In section 1 of the act approved August 12, 1910, entitled "An act for the protection of persons furnishing material and labor for the construction of public works, and for other purposes," it is provided that any person who enters into a contract with the state, or county, or a municipal corporation for the repair, construction, or prosecution of any public building or public work shall be required to execute a bond, conditioned that the contractor "shall promptly make payment to all persons supplying him or them with labor or material, or both, in the execution of the work provided for in such contract." In section 2 it is provided that the person furnishing the material or labor, after the completion of the contract and within a year, shall, upon making affidavit that the labor or material has been supplied and payment therefor has not been made, be furnished with a certified copy of the bond, "and shall within said period have a right of action thereon," and be authorized to bring suit on the bond in the name of the state, county, or municipal corporation, as the case may be, for the use of the person furnishing the labor or material. Acts 1910, p. 86.

The town of Grantville entered into a contract with John F. Grandy & Son to construct a school building. The contractors executed a bond, conditioned that they should "faithfully perform said contract on their part, according to the terms, covenants, and conditions thereof, except as are hereinafter provided." There was no condition in the bond requiring the contractors to pay for any labor or material furnished to them. The Woodward Lumber Company, in the name of the town of Grantville, brought suit on the bond, under the act of 1910, for the value of material which had been furnished to the contractors to be used in the construction of the school building. The case reached the Supreme Court, and it was held that, as the bond was neither literally nor in substance in accord with the provisions of the act of 1910, suit on the contractors' bond could not be maintained under that act in the name of the municipality, for the use of one who had furnished material to the contractors but had not been paid. Town of Grantville v. Fidelity & Deposit Co., 139 Ga. 53, 76 S. E. 575. Thereupon the Woodward Lumber Company brought its action directly against the town of Grantville, predicated its right to recover upon allegations that the municipal authorities had negligently failed to require of the contractors the bond provided for by the act of 1910. The petition was demurred to on the grounds that no cause of action was set out; that the suit was barred by the statute of limitations, having been brought more than two years after the cause of action accrued; and that it did not appear from the petition that any claim in writing had ever been presented to the municipal authorities, in accordance with the provisions of section 910 of the Civil Code. The demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiff excepted.

Without reference to whether the suit is barred, or whether the claim should have been filed with the municipal authorities as a condition precedent to suit, we are clear that the petition set forth no cause of action. The act of 1910 was passed for the sole benefit and protection of persons furnishing material and labor for the construction of public works. This is its declared purpose as expressed in the title. Persons furnishing material or labor to be used in the construction of private property have a lien, and are therefore protected. They have no such protection in reference to public property. The purpose of the act of 1910 was to afford to persons who furnished material or labor to a contractor to be used in construction of public works a remedy for the collection of their debts. To this end it was provided that the public authorities should take from the contractor a bond for the protection of laborers and materialmen, upon which they might bring suit. It does not follow, however, that an action will lie against a municipality which fails to take this bond. Since all persons are bound to take notice of a public law, it may be that a contract with public authorities for the construction of a public work would be void unless the contractors gave the bond required by the statute. As to this, however, we express no opinion. If the contract for the building of the schoolhouse in the town of Grantville was void, certainly no action would arise against a municipality in favor of one who furnished labor or material to the contractor. In any event a materialman furnishing material to the contractor was bound at his peril to ascertain the terms of the contract and of the bond which had been executed by the contractor. If it knew the terms of the bond, it furnished the material at its peril. If it did not know that the municipality had failed to take the bond required by the act of 1910, it was guilty of gross negligence, because the contract and bond were matters of public record in the office of the municipal corporation and open to the inspection of all those interested in ascertaining their terms. So that, without discussing the general liability of municipal corporations under section 897 of the Civil Code, or undertaking to determine what are legislative or judicial powers, and what are ministerial duties, we are very clear that the petition set forth no cause of action, because the plaintiff has sustained loss as much on account of its own negligence in failing to ascertain the terms of the bond as on account of the failure of the municipality to take the bond required by the act of 1910.

Sing Phillips was convicted of violating a municipal ordinance, and, from the overruling of a certiorari by the superior court, brings error. Affirmed.

Ray & Ray, of Jefferson, for plaintiff in error. C. L. Bryson, of Jefferson, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Sing Phillips was tried for a violation of a municipal ordinance of the city of Jefferson against keeping liquor for illegal sale, and, being found guilty by the mayor, appealed to the city council. Hon. P. Cooley was mayor pro tem. and presided at the trial of the case upon appeal. Before proceeding with the case, the defendant filed written objection to the council as constituted upon the ground that Hon. P. Cooley and Hon. S. J. Nix, two members of the council, were disqualified to serve as aldermen or councilmen for the city of Jefferson for the reason that they were holding two offices at the same time, in contravention of the Constitution. It appears that Hon. P. Cooley was solicitor of the city court of Jefferson and Hon. S. J. Nix was at that time clerk of the superior court of Jackson county. The objections were overruled, and the case proceeded to trial, resulting in the conviction of the accused. In the petition for certiorari exception is taken to the introduction of certain evidence, but the only point insisted on in the brief is that in which the question as to the disqualification of these councilmen is raised.

[1] It is true that it is stated in the brief that "the judgment overruling the certiorari should be reversed because the evidence did not authorize conviction," but there is no argument advanced in support of this statement, and the brief proceeds immediately to cite authorities to sustain the main contention, to the effect that the council, with the presence of the solicitor of the city court and the clerk of the superior court, as members of it, was not legally constituted. Some of the authorities cited from other jurisdictions seem to lend support to the contention of the plaintiff in error, but these rulings of courts of our sister jurisdictions must yield to the adjudication of the Supreme Court in what we deem to be a case practically identical with the one now before us. It certainly makes no difference that in that case the mayor and council were appointed by the Governor (as provided by the charter of St. Marys); the ruling of the Supreme Court went beyond the method by which these officers were selected.

[2] It dealt with the character of the office which they filled, and it was distinctly held that municipal officers in this state do not come within the designation of civil officers of this state. In this view of it, the provision of the charter of Jefferson, which empowers the mayor and each member of the council, under certain circumstances, to discharge the duties of justice of the peace and sheriff, cannot affect the case, for, even if any one of them was on such an occasion a state officer pro tempore, neither the mayor nor any of the council would be state officers when discharging municipal functions. The right to discharge upon occasion the duties of a state officer has been granted them, and perhaps, while executing the duties of the office of either justice of the peace or sheriff, the councilmen of the city of Jefferson might temporarily be civil officers of this state, but when acting as mayor or councilmen their duties would be of an entirely different nature, and the character of their offices would be fixed by the discharge of these municipal duties.

Glessner & Park, of Blakely, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Laing, of Dawson, B. T. Castellow, Sol. Gen., of Outhbert, and R. R. Arnold, of Atlanta, for the State.

RUSSELL, J. It is only necessary to deal with one of the assignments of error, for it is not likely that any errors which may have been committed on the former trial of this case will recur upon the new trial which we are constrained to grant. As to one of the assignments we will say, in passing, that whether the defendants were influenced by a controlling motive is a question of fact, but state's counsel should not be permitted, in argument, to go beyond the legitimate deductions to be drawn from the evidence actually introduced. It appears from the record that six persons made an assault upon the person of one John Weems and, after compelling him by force to go with them to a lonely and secluded spot, gave him an outrageous beating. Six persons were indicted for this offense; the plaintiffs in error being three of the number. Two of those indicted, Will Williams and Mark Hodge, pleaded guilty, and upon the trial the court permitted the pleas of guilty which had been filed by the defendants Williams and Hodge to be introduced against the plaintiffs in error. Proper and timely objection was made to the introduction of this testimony. The effect of this evidence was to use the confession of Williams and Hodge against the defendants then on trial as evidence of a conspiracy. The evidence was not essential to the state's case, because the accused were not indicted for riot; and, being indicted for assault and battery, it was not necessary that conspiracy be shown. The purpose of the testimony, therefore, was to increase the probative value of other testimony tending to fix the crime upon the accused as being three of those persons who were identified by the prosecutor.

After a conspiracy is shown, the sayings of any of the conspirators in regard to the criminal project not yet completed are admissible, but after the conspiracy is ended no one of the conspirators is bound by the admissions or confessions of his fellows. Admissions of guilt by Williams and Hodge were not necessarily evidence that even the declarants affirmed that the other defendants were guilty; and the only way in which these defendants could be affected by anything which Williams or Hodge might say in regard to the matter, after the transaction was over, would be by either of them testifying as a witness. Even if the suggestion that the defendants Williams and Hodge intended, in their pleas of guilty, to say that all of the persons indicted were likewise guilty could be inferred from the fact that they had pleaded guilty, such a statement would be nothing more than mere hearsay upon the trial of other defendants than themselves. "Where two persons have been jointly indicted for the same offense, but are separately tried, a judgment of conviction against one of them is not competent on the trial of the other, inasmuch as his conviction is no evidence either of joint action or of the guilt of the accused." 12 Cyc. 445; People v. Bearss, 10 Cal. 68; State v. Fertig, 98 Iowa, 139, 67 N. W. 87; Clark v. Commonwealth, 14 Bush. (Ky.) 166; People v. Mullins, 5 App. Div. 172, 39 N. Y. Supp. 361; People v. Kelf, 126 N. A paper stipulating that the maker conveys certain described personalty to secure a debt, and that upon payment of the debt the creditor will reconvey the property to the debtor, is a bill of sale to secure a debt and not a mortgage. The stipulation for a reconveyance of the property is not a defeasance clause, such as a provision that the instrument would be void upon payment of the debt. Upon payment of the debt a reconveyance can be compelled, but until this is done the instrument remains operative as a bill of sale, even though the debt is paid. See *Bellerby v. The plaintiff having elected to take a money verdict, the measure of his damages could not exceed the principal and interest of his debt, less any sum which had been received by him in part payment, notwithstanding the value of the property exceeded this amount due at the time of the trial. Holmes v. Langston, 110 Ga. 861, 36 S. E. 251. The original debt was $350, with interest from January 21, 1907, at 7 per cent. per annum. The plaintiff testified that on or about September 25, 1910, he had received on the debt $106. Hence the amount due on the date of the verdict, to wit, March 25, 1913, was $381.20. The verdict was for $448. Direction is given that the excess be written off from the verdict and judgment.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 91*)—RAILROADS (§ 441*)—KILLING OF LIVE STOCK—NEGLIGENCE—PLEADING.

The strictness of pleading necessary in suits in the superior and city courts is not required in justices' courts. Nevertheless, where a suit is brought in a justice's court against a railroad company for the killing of live stock, it is essential that the plaintiff should, at least in general terms, allege that the killing was the result of the negligence of the defendant company. A failure to make such allegation will subject the summons to dismissal, in the absence of an amendment, upon a demurrer pointing out this defect. The presumption of negligence which the law raises against a railroad company is a rule of evidence, and not of pleading, and is applicable as such to all suits brought against railroad companies in the courts of this state for damage sustained by the running of their engines, cars, or other machinery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 307-323; Dec. Dig. § 91;* Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1575-1595; Dec. Dig. § 441.*]

Error from Superior Court, Brooks County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Action by Mrs. J. L. Atkins against the South Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Branch & Snow, of Quitman, for plaintiff in error. Wm. H. Long, of Quitman, for defendant in error.

POTTLER, J. This was an action originating in a justice's court. The summons required the defendant "to answer plaintiff's demand in an action or a suit on a claim for damages, a copy of which said claim for damages is hereto attached." The copy of the claim for damages referred to is as follows: "The South Georgia Railway Co. to Mrs. J. L. Atkins, Dr., July 30th, 1910. To one medium-sized light-colored Jersey cow about three years old, the property of Mrs. J. L. Atkins, killed by your freight train No. 6 going north about 9:30 a. m., near the Quitman Foundry in the city of Quitman, $50.00." The defendant demurred on the ground that no cause of action was set forth against it, and that it was not alleged, either in the summons or in the cause of action thereto attached, that the defendant had been guilty of any negligence. The demurrer was overruled, and, after an adverse verdict, the defendant sued out a writ of certiorari to the superior court, which was also overruled, and it excepted.

1. It has been often ruled that the strictness of pleading required in the superior and city courts should not be applied to suits in justices' courts. Hence it has been held that in a suit in a justice's court against a railroad company, founded upon the negligence of the defendant, a general averment of negligence is sufficient, and the specific acts thereof need not be set forth. Ga. Southern & Fla. Ry. Co. v. Oliver, 6 Ga. App. 308, 64 S. E. 1007, and cases cited. In Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Lane, 9 Ga. App. 524, 71 S. E. 918, the plaintiff sued the railroad company for the killing of live stock. In the summons the defendant was required "to answer to plaintiff's demand upon an action for damages to personal property, * * * a copy of which cause of action is hereto attached." In the copy of the cause of action it was stated: "All of the above property killed by the running of engine, cars, or other machinery of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company at and near McGriff street crossing in the town of Whigham, Ga., and in said district G. M., said county and state." It was held that the summons was sufficient, and that there need be no express averment of negligence, since, where property was killed by the running of the engines, cars, or other machinery of the railroad company, there was a presumption of negligence, and the plaintiff made out a prima facie case upon proof of such killing. In the case of Ga. Ry. & Elec. Co. v. Knight, 122 Ga. 290, 50 S. E. 124, suit for damages was brought in a justice's court. It was held: "The defendant company had the right to be put on notice of the specific acts of negligence by reason of which it was charged that the plaintiff had been damaged. But a suit in a justice's court which in general terms alleged negligence was good against an oral demurrer made after trial before the justice and at the trial upon an appeal to a jury in the justice's court." Upon further reflection we are satisfied that the decision of this court in the Lane Case, supra, is not in harmony with the ruling of the Supreme Court in the last cited. The presumption of negligence which the law raises against a railroad company is a rule of evidence, and not of pleading. It is therefore necessary, in a suit in a superior or city court, claiming damages on account of negligence of the railroad company, to allege affirmatively that the defendant was negligent, and, if the information is called for by special demurrer, the petition is defective if it does not set forth the specific acts of negligence upon which the plaintiff relies. Ga. R. Co. v. Williams, 3 Ga. App. 272, 59 S. E. 846. This allegation of negligence may be proved by the presumption of negligence which the law raises, and, if this presumption is not rebutted, the plaintiff will be entitled to recover. This presumption extends only to the acts of negligence alleged. Ga. R. Co. v. Williams, supra. Hence, before any presumption will arise, negligence must be alleged. While the same strictness of pleading which prevails in the superior and city courts is not required in a justice's court, it is nevertheless necessary in that court to allege negligence in general terms, or else the summons and the cause of action attached thereto will be subject to demurrer. Except as to the form of the pleading, the rule that the presumption of negligence which the law raises against railroad companies is a rule of evidence and not of pleading is applicable in the same way in all the courts. This has been the rule announced by the Supreme Court and the decision of this court in the case of Lane, supra, is not in harmony with this ruling, and for this reason cannot be followed. The court erred in overruling the demurrer.

Wm. T. Townsend, of Cartersville, for plaintiffs in error. Jas. R. Whitaker, of Cartersville, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. The plaintiffs sued the defendant upon a promissory note which had been executed by Davis Jenkins to the defendant and indorsed in blank by the defendant and delivered to the plaintiffs. The defendant pleaded that he sold the note to the plaintiffs at a discount, with the understanding that they would look to the maker alone for payment; that on maturity of the note the plaintiffs failed to collect the amount from Jenkins, although instructed so to do by the defendant, but, on the contrary, extended the time of payment to Jenkins, without the knowledge or consent of the defendant. By amendment the defendant pleaded that when the note matured the plaintiffs accepted in renewal thereof the individual note of Jenkins, without the knowledge or consent of the defendant. The trial resulted in a verdict in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiffs' motion for a new trial was overruled, and they excepted.

[1] 1. There was no demurrer to any of the defendant's pleas. The indorsement of the defendant was in blank. It therefore imported that the indorser would pay if the maker failed to do so. Civil Code, § 4279. It was not competent for the defendant to show by parol evidence that, notwithstanding this apparently unconditional promise to pay in the event the maker did not, the real agreement between the parties was that the indorsee would not look to the indorser for payment. In other words, the defendant sought to show by parol that the unconditional indorsement was in fact intended by the parties as an indorsement without recourse. He could no more do this than the maker of the note could show by parol that the promisee agreed never to collect it. Sasser v. McGovern, 11 Ga. App. 88, 74 S. E. 797; Stapleton v. Monroe, 111 Ga. 848, 36 S. E. 428; Brewer v. Grogan, 116 Ga. 60, 42 S. E. 525. Parol evidence is not admissible, in an action on a note by a bona fide holder against the maker, indorser, or surety, of any declaration or agreement which is inconsistent with the promise to pay the instrument. Hence an agreement between indorser and indorsee that the words "without recourse" shall be written over the signature of the former will be no defense to an action by one who is indorsee of the paper for value and without notice. Nor would the fact that the indorsee had knowledge of such an agreement be a defense to the action. Joyce on Defenses to Commercial Paper, § 342.

[2] 2. Mere indulgence to the maker of a promissory note, or an extension of the time of payment, without any new consideration, will not discharge a surety or indorser, even though done without his knowledge or consent. If, however, payment be extended to a definite time and upon a new consideration, the surety or indorser would be discharged, if it be done without his consent. Tanner v. Gude, 100 Ga. 157, 27 S. E. 938; Preston v. Garrard, 120 Ga. 689, 48 S. E. 118, 102 Am. St. Rep. 124; Joyce on Defenses to Commercial Paper, § 680. Since the defendant did not aver in his plea that there was a consideration for the extension of time granted by the plaintiff to the maker of the note, the original plea set forth no defense, and should have been disregarded on the trial.

[3] 3. The amendment to the defendant's answer did set forth a defense. It was therein averred that the plaintiff, without the knowledge or consent of the defendant indorser, accepted in renewal of the note indorsed by the defendant a new note of the maker. If true, this amounted to a novation of the original contract, and operated to release the indorser. Smith v. First National Bank of Fitzgerald, 5 Ga. App. 139, 62 S. E. 826; Joyce on Defenses to Commercial Paper, § 688.

[4] 4. On the trial the maker testified that, when the note sued on matured, he and the plaintiffs made a new note, payable to a bank, which he understood was in renewal of the note sued on, but that he did not take up the old note. One of the plaintiffs testified that the note given to the bank was not in renewal or settlement of the note sued on; that the note sued on had been indorsed to the bank by the plaintiffs, and, when the bank insisted on payment, the new note was given by the plaintiffs and Jenkins, the maker, and the note sued on was left with the bank as collateral. He further testified that the note sued on was never renewed, that the time of payment was never extended, and that the new note was made payable to the bank. To the testimony of Jenkins that the new note was in renewal of the note sued on, the plaintiffs objected on the ground that the renewal note was the highest and best evidence.

It is an easy matter to state generally that, where the contents of a written instrument become material in a legal investigation, the writing must be produced, or the foundation laid for the introduction of secondary evidence. Civil Code, § 5828. The difficulty lies in the application of this general rule of evidence to the facts of the particular case. See 1 Greenleaf, Evidence (16th Ed.) § 5630. The wisdom of the rule is illustrated in the present case. If the plaintiffs gave their note to the bank in settlement of the note sued on, which had been discounted at the bank, it could not be a renewal of the original obligation, even though Jenkins, the maker who was liable on the first note, signed the second note also, and would not be a satisfaction of the first note, unless there was an agreement between the plaintiffs and Jenkins that it would be so accepted. On the other hand, if Jenkins executed his note to the plaintiffs, it might or might not have been accepted by the plaintiffs as a renewal of the first note, and therefore as a satisfaction thereof. Upon this question the new note was very material. It might show upon its face that it was not a renewal of the original obligation. If it did not, then it became material whether it was intended as a novation of the original note and was so accepted by the plaintiffs. It was not competent for the witness to testify generally that the new note was given in renewal of the note sued on, unless the alleged renewal note was produced for the inspection of the court and jury. The contents of the note consisted of the signatures of the makers and the indorsers, the date, the amount, the date of maturity, and all other stipulations therein contained. To allow a witness to testify as to any portion of the contents of the writing would be a violation of the rule against the introduction of secondary evidence. When the witness testified that the new note was given in renewal, he necessarily intended to convey the impression that the new note was executed by Jenkins and accepted by the plaintiffs in renewal of the note sued on, and such testimony necessarily involved an inquiry into some of the contents of the written instrument. No foundation having been laid for the introduction of the secondary evidence, it was inadmissible, and the court erred in overruling the objections thereto.

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 656*)—WITNESSES (§ 246*)—

QUESTIONS TO WITNESS.

The presiding judge may, with propriety, ask such questions as may tend to elicit the truth as to a transaction which is under investigation, but care should be used to see that no intimation of the opinion of the court is conveyed by the questions propounded. An opinion as to the merits of the case might be expressed by the form of the questions propounded, and the rights of one of the parties to a fair trial might thus be prejudiced and impaired; and in such a case a reversal of a judgment refusing a motion for a new trial would necessarily result.

Error from City Court of Brunswick; D. W. Krauss, Judge.

Ed Murphy and another were convicted of violating the prohibition law, and bring error. Reversed.

A. D. Gale, of Brunswick, for plaintiffs in error. Alfred H. Crovatt, Sol., and H. F. Dunwoody, both of Brunswick, for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The defendants were placed upon trial in the city court of Brunswick, charged with a violation of the prohibition law. There is evidence which would authorize the verdict of guilty returned by the jury. The legitimate deduction from the circumstances in proof would authorize the conclusion that the room in which one of the witnesses stated he had purchased intoxicating liquor was frequently used by the defendants as a place for such illegal sale. The witness Emmett Butts, however, is the only person who testified about purchasing intoxicating liquor; and, without his evidence, the acquittal of the defendants would, so far as appears from the record, have resulted as a matter of course. The plaintiffs in error complain because, after the solicitor of the city court had announced that he had no further questions to propound to the witness Emmett Butts (who at that time had not testified to anything which would tend to criminate the accused), the court subjected the witness to a severe and searching cross-examination, starting with the following question: "Witness, if you don't know anything more about this case than you have testified to, how is it they have you up here as a witness? Didn't you tell the officer you had purchased intoxicating liquors at this place?" To this question the defendants objected, upon the grounds that the court undertook to cross-examine the witness upon the part of the state without any proper foundation having been laid, and that the testimony sought was hearsay, and a voluntary statement upon the part of the witness not made in the presence of the defendants, and therefore could not be given in evidence against the defendants. These objections were overruled. Thereafter the witness testified to having told Mr. McCollough and Mr. Owens that he had gotten some whisky in the restaurant of a negro named Dabb, and that upon the advice of his employer, Mr. McCollough, he had told the sheriff about it. This testimony was objected to upon grounds similar to those interposed to the court's question. The court declined to approve the first ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, and from his approval of the second ground, what transpired, as stated by the court, is as follows: In substance, the court interrogated the witness as objected to in the second ground of the amended motion for new trial. This interrogation by the court was not had until after both counsel for the state and the defendants had examined the witness. The inquiry by the court as to whether or not the witness had informed the officers of his connection with the alleged purchase of the intoxicating liquors was made as a matter of inducement, and for the purpose of ascertaining the truth.

We doubt not that the sole motive of the learned trial judge was to ascertain the truth of the transaction, but it is never proper for a judge to assume to discharge the duties of a prosecuting attorney. However anxious a judge may be for the enforcement of the law, he should always remember that he is as much judge in behalf of the defendant accused of crime, and whose liberty is in jeopardy, as he is judge in behalf of the state, for the purpose of safeguarding the interests of society. It is very plain that up to the point where the trial judge took charge of this witness the state had utterly failed to make a case. Whether the accused be guilty or innocent, he is entitled to be tried according to the voluntary testimony of the witnesses who appear and are sworn freely and voluntarily to testify. The natural effect of the judge's question, regardless of what the witness might have answered, was to impress the jury that the truth of the transaction was that the witness had purchased intoxicating liquors from these defendants; for the judge asked the witness if he had not previously told the officers that he had done so. The witness, being apprised that the judge knew of his previous statements, would naturally be impelled by fear to repeat a statement he had previously made, and that is precisely what happened in this case. It was no doubt plain to the jury, from the court's mode of questioning this witness, that the judge was firmly of the opinion that the witness, in first testifying, had evaded and concealed the truth, and that it was the judge's opinion that if the truth were told, there would be sufficient evidence to authorize a conviction. The same statement applies to the questions asked the witness Will Andrews. The judge certifies, as to this witness, that he did not ask the witness any questions until the witness had been examined by both counsel for the state and the accused, and that his questions were asked only in the interest of the truth, and for the purpose of ascertaining the truth. We do not question the motive of the trial judge, but there can be no question that such queries on the part of the presiding judge accentuate and impress upon the jury the answer of the witness, by conveying a clear and forcible intimation of the judge's opinion in the premises.

The defendants may be guilty, and if so they should be punished; but they cannot be found guilty in a court of law except upon a legal trial. In a criminal case the jury, and not the judge, sums up the evidence. When this witness Butts, after having been examined by counsel for the state and counsel for the accused, gave no information which would have authorized the conclusion that the defendants were guilty, was faced by the judge with the question as to his former statements to the officers, and the jury had heard the judge say to him: "Witness if you don't know anything more about this case than you have testified to, how is it that they have you up here as a witness?" even a casual listener would have been impressed by the consciousness that the court thought the witness knew more than he had told; and how much more strongly impressed were the jury, who look to the court for guidance.

This case is controlled by the rulings of this court in Sharpton v. State, 1 Ga. App. 542, 57 S. E. 929, and a number of subsequent decisions. The judge has the right to ask questions to elicit the truth, but the form of his interrogatory must be such as not to intimate or express an opinion as to the truth of the case, or the merits of the contentions of either of the parties. An intimation of opinion by question is as repugnant to the provisions of the Code (Penal Code, § 1058; Civil Code, § 4863) as a direct statement of opinion.

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Action by Minnie O. Hartz against Morris

A. Hartz. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Miller & Jones, of Macon, for plaintiff in error. Minter Wimberly and Jesse Harris, both of Macon, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. Minnie Hartz brought an action of trover against her husband, Morris Hartz, from whom she had previously separated, to recover a diamond sunburst and a diamond horseshoe pin. She claimed title under a gift from him. According to her testimony, he gave her these articles shortly before their marriage, and stated to her that the sunburst had been left in his mother's will to his future bride, and that he was therefore giving it to her as a wedding present. She accepted the gift and continuously used the property as her own until her separation from her husband about six months after their marriage. Shortly before the separation she was taken to the hospital for an operation, and gave him both pieces of jewelry for safe-keeping. Upon the separation the husband refused to return the property. He never claimed title to either piece of jewelry, within the knowledge of the plaintiff, until after the suit was brought. The defendant did not deny the gift of the horseshoe pin, but did deny making his wife the present of the sunburst; as to this he contended that he merely consented for her to wear it. He further testified that at the time the wife claimed that the gift of the sunburst was made, and also at the time the suit was brought, the title to the sunburst was in himself and his brother Sidney Hartz jointly. It also appeared from the evidence that the American National Bank held a mortgage on the sunburst, which had been executed by the Hartz brothers. The trial judge charged the jury as follows: "Now you are not concerned in any way, so far as this case is concerned, with the rights of Sidney Hartz or with the rights of the American National Bank, if any it had, in the event you believe that by a preponderance of the evidence that the diamond sunburst pin was in truth and in fact given by Morris Hartz, as his property, to his wife, or to his betrothed, to be her property, or as a gift." He also instructed the jury as follows: "He (the defendant) further says that it was not his property (the diamond sunburst) to give; that it was the property of a partnership consisting of himself and his brother, and I have admitted to you that testimony tending to show that it was the property of himself and his brother, as tending to throw light upon the probability or improbability of the contentions of the plaintiff in the case that the defendant did give to her the diamond sunburst pin as contended by her." The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the property sued for, and the defendant, in his motion for a new trial, contends that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, and that the court erred in the instructions above set forth.

[1] According to the testimony of the wife, the transaction relied upon by her in proof of her title contained all the essential elements of a gift. There was an intention to give by the donor, acceptance by the donee, and delivery of the article given. Civil Code, § 4144. The defendant did not dispute the gift of the horseshoe pin. Consequently the only question necessary to be decided is whether or not the defendant had a right to set up an outstanding title in his brother to an undivided half interest in the diamond sunburst. If the husband had sold the sunburst to his wife, and she had parted with anything of value in consideration therefor, it is clear that he would have been estopped to dispute his own title or his own right to sell. Elliott v. Keith, 102 Ga. 117, 29 S. E. 155; Campbell v. Morgan, 111 Ga. 200, 36 S. E. 621; Southern Bell Tel. Co. v. Harris, 117 Ga. 1001, 1004, 44 S. E. 885. Under our view of the law, it is unnecessary to discuss the question of the right of a cotenant to sue in trover for an undivided interest in property which is incapable of division. Upon this subject see 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 712, 715. It is conceded by counsel for the plaintiff in error that if the husband, in withholding the entire possession of the sunburst from the plaintiff, was a mere wrongdoer, the plaintiff might have recovered upon proof of her mere possession, and he would not be allowed to set up the jus tertii. Mitchell v. Ga. & Ala. Ry., 111 Ga. 760, 764, 36 S. E. 971, 51 L. R. A. 622. It is argued, however, that the defendant was not a wrongdoer in withholding the possession of the property, and that hence the presumption of title arising from proof of prior possession in the wife was not conclusive against him. According to the wife's testimony, the gift was complete, and therefore irrevocable. It was founded upon a good consideration. It was given in contemplation of immediate marriage, and was ratified after marriage. We can conceive of no good reason why in such a case the husband ought not to be estopped to deny his own title, just as he would have been had he made a sale to his wife. The doctrine of estoppel is founded "upon the highest principles of morality, and recommends itself to the common sense and justice of every one; and, although it debars the truth in the particular case, and, therefore, is not unfrequently characterized as odious and not to be favored, still it should be remembered that it debars only in the case where its utterance would convict the party of a previous falsehood, and imposes silence on a party only when in conscience and honesty he should not be allowed to speak." Herman, Estoppel & Res Judicata, § 670. The gift from the husband to the wife was accompanied by an assertion of title. He is therefore estopped, not only by an implied assertion of title, but by an express assertion of title contained in his statement that the sunburst had been bequeathed in his mother's will to his future wife. A good consideration is in law as binding between the parties as a valuable consideration. If a husband, upon a consideration of love and affection, convey land to his wife by warranty deed, he would clearly be estopped, in a suit by her or her privies to recover the land, to deny that he had title when he conveyed it. In Alabama it has been held that a gift by a sealed deed is good, because the donor is estopped from saying that the property has not passed to the donee. See Connor v. Trawicks, 37 Ala. 289, 79 Am. Dec. 58, cited in Thornton on Gifts, § 190.

[2] In this state but three things are essential to consummate a gift of a chattel: Intention of the donor, acceptance by the donee, and delivery of the chattel, or something which the law will accept in lieu thereof. No writing is necessary. And, as between parties sustaining to each other the relation of husband and wife or parent and child, a gift from one to the other is supported by a good consideration; and there is as much reason why the doctrine of estoppel should be applied to the donor as there would be in a case of a sale from one to the other. Whether this rule should apply to a gift from one person to another where there is no such confidential relation need not be determined. The plaintiff having made out her case by proof of a gift from her husband, he cannot defend by setting up title in a third person at the time the gift was made. The trial court properly admitted evidence of title in Sidney Hartz, for the purpose of corroborating the testimony of the husband that he had made no gift; but it was not admissible for the purpose of defeating the wife's claim, if a gift was in fact made as she contended.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1159*)—APPEAL—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

The evidence in support of the verdict while entirely circumstantial measures fully up to the standard of proof required by the statute, in that it is inconsistent with innocence, and excludes every reasonable hypothesis except that of the guilt of the accused.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 636, 864, 1174*)—INSTRUCTIONS—HARMLESS ERROR—PRESENCE OF ACCUSED.

After the jury on the trial of the accused for burglary had been instructed, and had been out for some time and until late at night considering the verdict, the trial judge, with the sheriff, went to the courtroom and, in the absence of the accused and of their attorneys, inquired of the jury whether they desired to be put to bed, or were likely to make a verdict. Without responding to this, one of the jurors inquired of the judge as to what he had charged with reference to the right of the jury to recommend that the defendants be punished as for a misdemeanor. The judge responded by stating that he had charged that, in the event the jury should find the defendants guilty, they would have the right to recommend that the defendants be punished as for a misdemeanor, and that, if such recommendation should be approved by the court, the defendants would receive a misdemeanor sentence. On the next morning, about 9 o'clock, a verdict was returned, finding the accused guilty and recommending that a misdemeanor sentence be imposed. Held: (1) The statement of the judge in answer to the question of the juror did not amount to a re-charge, and was equivalent to an instruction merely as to a form of verdict that the jury could return, if they saw fit to do so. (2) At most it was merely a harmless irregularity, and is not sufficient to set aside a verdict strongly supported by the evidence, especially as it appears that the attorneys for the accused were immediately informed of the occurrence by the trial judge, and failed to make a motion for a mistrial or to have the error corrected in any manner until after verdict.

Russell, J., dissenting in part.

Error from Superior Court, Lumpkin County; J. B. Jones, Judge.

Charles Miller and another were convicted of burglary, and bring error. Affirmed.

R. H. Baker, of Dahlonaga, and Edgar Latham and Moore & Branch, all of Atlanta, for plaintiffs in error. Robt. McMillan, Sol. Gen., of Clarksville, and W. A. Charters and B. P. Gaillard, both of Gainesville, for the State.

HILL, C. J. The plaintiffs in error were jointly indicted for burglary, and on their trial were convicted. They filed a joint motion for a new trial, based upon the general grounds and upon numerous special assignments of error. This motion having been overruled, the case is here for review.

[1] 1. We do not deem it necessary to consider the general grounds for the purpose of showing that the verdict was supported by the evidence. While the conviction of the accused was based entirely upon circumstantial evidence, a careful examination of the evidence satisfies this court that the proof comes fully up to the standard required by law as to this character of evidence. The proved facts were not only consistent with the hypothesis of guilt, but excluded every other reasonable hypothesis save that of the guilt of the accused. Penal Code 1910, § 1010. We hazard nothing in saying that, in our opinion, it would be difficult to establish guilt by a clearer, stronger, or more consistent chain of facts and circumstances, or by circumstances which, taken together, would prove more conclusively the guilt of the accused. The verdict, therefore, should be allowed to stand, unless some material and prejudicial error of law was committed on the trial. An examination of all the special assignments of errors of law leads us to the conclusion that all but one are so clearly without merit as to render extended discussion of them wholly unnecessary. Indeed, this seems to have been the view entertained by learned counsel for plaintiffs in error, who, while not abandoning any of the grounds of the motion for a new trial, seem to rely principally upon one only. This one we will briefly consider and determine.

[2] 2. The ground referred to is as follows: "The jury was charged and entered upon the consideration of the case about 1 o'clock on the afternoon of April 24th, and remained in the jury room during the afternoon and until about 10 o'clock at night, considering the case. The verdict was returned at 9 o'clock a. m., April 25, 1913. During the afternoon the jury had stated, in response to inquiries from the court, that it was not likely to agree upon a verdict. About 10 o'clock at night the judge, in company with the sheriff, visited the courthouse and inquired of the jury at the door of the jury room if they desired to be put to bed or were likely to make a verdict; the purpose of the judge being to arrange for the care and comfort of the jurors during the night, unless they were likely to agree upon a verdict. At this point one of the jurors inquired of the judge as to what he had charged with reference to the right of the jury to recommend that the defendants be punished as for a misdemeanor. To this inquiry the judge responded by stating in substance, that he had charged that, in the event the jury should find the defendants guilty, they would have the right to recommend that the defendants be punished as for a misdemeanor, and that, if such recommendation should be approved by the court, the defendants would receive a misdemeanor sentence. Within a few minutes after this occurrence, the judge informed counsel for defendants as to what had occurred. The defendants and their counsel were not present, nor had they waived their right to be present. Movants contend that, inasmuch as their counsel was not present and had not waived the right to be present when the judge answered the question of the juror, a new trial should be granted, for the reason that the answer of the judge, made in response to the question of the juror, was, in effect, a recharge, and especially so to the juror who propounded the question."

It is well settled that in the trial of a criminal case, whether a felony or a misdemeanor, the accused has the right to be present, in person and by his attorney, during every stage of his trial from the arraignment to the verdict. Lyons v. State, 7 Ga. App. 50, 68 S. E. 149, and citations. This right cannot be lost except by a clear and distinct waiver thereof by the accused. Martin v. State, 51 Ga. 567, and citations. This right is guaranteed to the accused by the fundamental law of this state, in order that he and his counsel may see to it that he has a fair and impartial trial and that nothing is done that would in any wise tend to his prejudice. Unquestionably the trial judge should not in any manner communicate with the jury about the case, in the absence of the accused and his counsel, pending the trial, and the better practice is for the trial judge to have no communication with the jury on any subject except through the medium of the sworn bailiff in charge of the jury, and the communication should be restricted, in the absence of the accused and his counsel, to matters relating to the comfort and convenience of the jury. There should be no communication which would tend in any manner to prejudice the accused (for instance, to hasten a verdict against him, or to induce jurors who might be for him to yield their convictions), and, unless the character of the communication clearly shows that it could not have been prejudicial to the accused, the presumption of law would arise that it was prejudicial, and the accused would be entitled to another trial. In line with this, it has been ruled in this state that, in the absence of both the prisoner and his counsel, the court could not call in the jury and read to them notes of the evidence (Wade v. State, 12 Ga. 25), and that, in the absence of the prisoner, who was confined in jail, the judge was not authorized to recharge the jury, although the prisoner's counsel was present and made no objection to the recharge (Bonner v. State, 67 Ga. 510).

The case of Hopson v. State, 116 Ga. 90, 42 S. E. 412, is relied upon by counsel for the plaintiffs in error. In that case it was held that "recalling a jury in a criminal case, who had retired to consider of their verdict, and, in the absence of the accused and his counsel, and without their consent, giving a second charge, is cause for a new trial, even though this charge be the same in substance as that which had been delivered in the first instance." In that case it was further said that it would make no difference whether both the accused and his counsel were ignorant of the recharge until after the trial ended, and that this irregularity might be taken advantage of after verdict, notwithstanding the knowledge thereof by the accused and his counsel while the trial was in progress. The first question, therefore, to be considered in the present case is whether the statement which the judge made in answer to the inquiry of the jury amounted to a recharge. In Roberson v. State, 135 Ga. 654, 70 S. E. 175, it was held not to be ground for a new trial that the judge, in the presence of the defendant, but during the voluntary absence of his counsel, repeated his instructions to the jury as to the different forms of verdict that might be rendered. In the present case it does not appear whether counsel was absent voluntarily or not, and, while it is not distinctly stated, it is fair to assume that the accused were involuntarily absent, because in confinement, for it is not at all probable that they were out on bond. We cite the Roberson Case not as to this phase of the question, but for the purpose of showing that the statement made by the trial judge in the present case was not a recharge, and simply amounted to a restatement of the form of the verdict. The Hopson Case, supra, is certainly a very strong authority in support of the contention of the plaintiffs in error; but we think it is differentiated from the present case by the fact that in that case the judge recalled the jury and repeated his entire charge to them, in the absence of the accused and his counsel. Certainly this could not be allowed. To permit such practice would tend to undermine and to destroy the value of a fair and impartial trial and to deprive the accused of his inalienable right to be present at every stage of the trial and to have his counsel present for the purpose of protecting his rights, and in the Roberson Case, supra, the Supreme Court evidently took this view of the question, for the court distinguished that case from the Hopson Case by the fact that in the Hopson Case there was a repetition of the entire charge, while in the Roberson Case the judge repeated his instructions only as to the different forms of verdict authorized to be rendered.

In considering the right of the accused to be present at every stage of the trial, and to have his counsel present, we must not lose sight of the further principle, equally well established, that a new trial will not be granted on account of an error which manifestly caused no injury to the accused. It would be trifling with justice to set aside a verdict clearly and strongly supported by the evidence, solely on the ground that such an error had been committed by the trial judge. To warrant such action by a reviewing court, it must be manifest that the error was prejudicial in character. How could it have prejudiced the accused for the judge to have repeated to the jury, in answer to the juror's inquiry, what he had already stated, that they would have a right to recommend that the case be treated as a misdemeanor, and that he, in his discretion, could adopt such recommendation? The statement apparently was favorable to the accused. It emphasized the right of the jury to treat the case as a misdemeanor. It must be perfectly clear that it could not have induced any juror to yield up any conviction as to the essential fact of the guilt of the accused. If the members of the jury were divided or hesitating, it was not as to the guilt of the accused, but as to their right to make a recommendation that the case be treated as a misdemeanor; it did not hasten a verdict, for the verdict was not returned until 11 hours thereafter. Besides, the judge almost immediately made a statement of the occurrence to the counsel for the accused. If they thought the communication was prejudicial or was a recharge to the jury, it was their duty to have insisted then, or certainly the next morning, on the withdrawal of the case from the jury and the declaration of a mistrial.

We are not unmindful of the fact that in the Hopson Case it was said that it would be a matter of indifference whether the accused or his counsel knew of the alleged misconduct of the judge or not, that the irregularity could be taken advantage of after verdict. This question was not involved in the Hopson Case, and this part of the opinion seems to have been obiter dictum of the judge who wrote the opinion. We are not willing to hold, in the absence of a direct decision to the contrary by the Supreme Court, that an irregularity in a criminal trial could not be waived by silence as well as by action. It has been frequently held by the Supreme Court that the unauthorized dispersal of the jury could be waived by silence, or by failure to make timely objection. It has also been held that knowledge of the disqualification of a juror is waived by failure to take timely advantage of the knowledge of the disqualification. Many rights involving a fair and impartial jury trial may be waived either by the conduct of the accused or his counsel, or by their silence. Scott v. State, 6 Ga. App. 567, 65 S. E. 359; Waller v. State, 2 Ga. App. 636, 58 S. E. 1106; Davis v. Ragin, 7 Ga. App. 308, 66 S. E. 806, and citations. The accused and his counsel should not be allowed to take their chances of a favorable verdict, with knowledge of an irregularity, and, after losing, set up such irregularity as ground for another trial. But we do not place our judgment solely on this view. We rather place it upon the opinion that the statement made by the judge in the present case to the juror did not amount to a recharge, but was equivalent simply to an instruction as to the form of a verdict which the jury was authorized to render, and that, even though an irregularity, it did not and could not result in injury to the accused. If we thought the accused had been deprived of any essential right by this statement made to the juror by the judge, we would not hesitate to grant another trial for that reason; but we cannot imagine any right that the accused was deprived of by the statement made to the juror as to the power of the jury to recommend that the charge of felony be treated as a misdemeanor. The evidence is so strong and so clear as to guilt that we do not feel that we should, in the interest of justice, declare another trial for a mere irregularity which, in our opinion, was immaterial, and which could not in any view have been productive of injury to the accused.

Judgment affirmed.

RUSSELL, J. (concurring specially). I agree, not without doubt, to the proposition that the circumstantial evidence tending to show the guilt of the accused was sufficient to authorize their conviction, and, that being so, this court is without jurisdiction to interfere with the verdict upon that ground or the motion for a new trial in which it is insisted that the verdict is contrary to the evidence. However, I do not concur in the opinion that the conduct of the trial judge was a mere harmless irregularity, nor can I view his statement to the jury as to their right and power to recommend otherwise than as an instruction in the nature of a recharge. From a long personal and professional acquaintance with the judge who presided in this case, no man knows better than the writer that this upright magistrate is wholly incapable of consciously doing any act which would work injustice to any citizen or litigant. The judge who presided in the trial of this case is a model of fairness and impartiality. Nevertheless, I cannot consent to hold that the state of facts set forth in the record can be disregarded, as not tending to work prejudice to the rights of the accused to a fair and impartial trial. When the judge asked the jury in this case if they were likely to agree upon a verdict, in the absence of the defendants and of their counsel, it is apparent to my mind, from the question of the juror who acted as spokesman for that body, that the jury was in doubt as to what verdict should be rendered. It is inconceivable that a jury of ordinary intelligence does not know that in most felonies the punishment can be reduced, at the discretion of the judge, upon a recommendation to that effect. No doubt the jury had been discussing that phase of the case. It is a matter of common knowledge that the power of the jury to recommend that a felony be punished as for a misdemeanor frequently results in compromise verdicts, in which there is more or less doubt as to the real guilt of the accused of the offense charged. For a judge, in the absence of the defendant and his counsel, to recharge the jury upon this particular point is as harmful as if there had been an entire recharge. I think the defendants would have been entitled to a mistrial if they had moved in time; but, as was well said by the Chief Judge in his opinion, the defendants waived this right to object. It appears from the record that they had ample time and full notice. It does not appear that there was any reason why they could not have made a motion when the court reconvened on the morning following the incident to which reference is made. One accused of crime can waive any of his rights, or all of them, and where he remains silent and takes the chances of an acquittal, instead of claiming a right to which he is entitled, he cannot, after conviction, ask that that right be accorded him. Lampkin v. State, 87 Ga. 516, 13 S. E. 523. Since the defendants waived their right to ask a mistrial, they must be adjudged to have forfeited this right entirely. The point is valueless to them here. If they had objected at the time and moved for a mistrial, I am of the opinion that it would have been clearly error for the trial judge to have refused to declare a mistrial.

POTTLE, J. (concurring specially). While in Hopson v. State, 116 Ga. 90, 42 S. E. 412, the Supreme Court said in substance that it made no difference whether the accused and his counsel were ignorant of the fact that the jury had been recharged, and conceding that this statement was not obiter, yet later cases indicate a disposition of that court to modify the decision in the Hopson Case. This plainly appears from the decisions in Roberson v. State, 135 Ga. 654, 70 S. E. 175, Richards v. State, 136 Ga. 67, 70 S. E. 868, and Baldwin v. State, 138 Ga. 349, 75 S. E. 324. If the case sub judice were identical upon its facts with the Hopson Case, it would be our duty to follow that decision, because it has never been formally overruled; but it differs from the Hopson Case in two particulars: First, because it affirmatively appears in the present case that counsel sat silent for 11 hours, with knowledge of the fact that the judge had charged the jury as to their right to recommend; and, second, because in the Hopson Case the judge repeated his entire charge in the absence of the accused.

Error from City Court of Miller County; W. I. Geer, Judge.

Action by Viola Lewis against Scrap Jeems. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

P. D. Rich, of Colquitt, for plaintiff in error. Bush & Stapleton, of Colquitt, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. [1-3] The only question in this case is whether a bailee for hire can in defense to an action of trover, brought in a court having no equitable jurisdiction, plead that he has not been paid for keeping the bailed property. Trover never lies unless there has been a conversion. There is no conversion as long as the party in possession has a right to retain the chattel against the person claiming the right to recover it. According to the plea, the defendant was a depositary for hire. She had a lien on the goods and a right to retain them until the hire was paid. Civil Code, § 3501; Seaboard Air Line Railway v. Shackelford, 5 Ga. App. 395, 63 S. E. 252. Having a right to retain the goods, there was no conversion, and no recovery could be had in trover until the hire was paid. Such a defense may be filed in any court in which the action may be brought. The defense is a legal and not an equitable defense, and the court needs no equitable jurisdiction to enforce it. The case is altogether different from Harden v. Lang, 110 Ga. 392, 36 S. E. 100, where trover was brought to recover property sold upon condition that title should remain in the seller until the purchase price was paid, and it was held that, unless some special equity intervened, such as insolvency or nonresidence, the defendant could not set off a claim for damages arising from a breach of the contract of sale. This is so because the action of trover is one sounding in tort. In the present case the defendant is not seeking to recover anything from the plaintiff, but merely to hold the goods until her lien is satisfied. This she has a right to do.

Judgment reversed.

Where the defendant in an action on a promissory note admitted that the note was made by him, but set up by special plea, it was altered, in that the figures in the upper left-hand corner of the note were changed from $110 to $116, and at the trial it appeared from inspection of the note that, while the figures in the upper left-hand corner were $116, the amount written out in words in the body of the note was "one hundred and ten dollars," principal, with interest and attorney's fees, a finding that the alteration in the figures was immaterial and did not affect the validity of the note as admitted by the maker was demanded, and there was no error in refusing to sanction a petition for certiorari brought for the purpose of having this finding reviewed.

Error from Superior Court, Tift County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Action by the Georgia Fertilizer & Oil Company against Joe Bryant. Judgment for plaintiff, and, from a refusal of the Superior Court to grant certiorari, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Robley D. Smith, of Tifton, for plaintiff in error.

HILL, C. J. The Georgia Fertilizer & Oil Company brought suit against Joe Bryant on a promissory note in the city court of Tifton. A verdict and judgment were obtained against the defendant. Errors assigned on the refusal of the judge of the superior court to sanction the defendant's application for certiorari. The case made is as follows: The original petition alleged that the defendant was indebted in the sum of $107 principal, besides interest and attorney's fees, on a promissory note, a copy of which was attached and made a part of the petition. In the upper left-hand corner of the attached copy of the note were the figures $116, and in the body of the note were written out the words "one hundred and ten dollars," and on it was a credit of $9. The defendant admitted giving the note to the plaintiff for $110, and claimed that he was entitled to a credit of $9. When the note was introduced in evidence by the plaintiff, and it appeared that the figures $116 were on the note as above described, the defendant, with the permission of the court, filed an amendment to his plea, setting up in the amendment that the note had been changed or altered, in that the figures on the upper left-hand corner of the note were originally $110, but were changed to $116. His plea did not allege that the change had been made by the plaintiff for his benefit, or with any fraudulent intent. The trial judge submitted the question of alteration as a special issue, and the jury found that the note had been changed or altered, presumably in the particular indicated. On this special finding the judge ruled that, although the instrument had been changed, the change or alteration was not made with any fraudulent intent and was not material, and in no way affected the validity of the note, and this ruling is assigned as error.

We think that there is no merit whatever in the petition for certiorari, and that the judge of the superior court very properly refused to sanction it. The defendant admitted that he owed the note to the plaintiff for $110, less the credit of $9. The verdict was in accordance with this admission, to wit, $101 principal, deducting the credit of $9. Regardless of any other fact, it would be absurd to release the defendant from liability on his promise to pay, when the verdict is in exact accordance with his own admission made in open court. The change of the figures in the upper left-hand corner of the note from $110 to $116, whether made by the plaintiff or by some one for his benefit, was immaterial and wholly ineffective for this purpose, since it is well settled that the writing fully set out in the body of the note would control as to the amount due on the note, irrespective of the figures contained at the top or beginning of the note. Written words control where they are in conflict with mere figures. Clearly the alteration was wholly immaterial, and did not affect the validity of the instrument, which the defendant admitted to have been executed by him. Section 4296 of the Civil Code is controlling in this case. It says: "If a written contract be altered intentionally, and in a material part thereof, by a person claiming a benefit under it, with intent to defraud the other party, such alteration voids the whole contract, at the option of the other party. If the alteration be unintentional, or by mistake, or in an immaterial matter, or not with intent to defraud, if the contract as originally executed can be discovered and is still capable of execution, it will be enforced by the court." Here the contract as originally executed was not only discovered but absolutely admitted by the defendant, and it was certainly capable of being enforced by the court. The bill of exceptions in this case is so clearly without merit that this court feels constrained to affirm the judgment with 10 per cent. damages on the amount of the recovery in the trial court.

Judgment affirmed, with damages.

DANIEL v. BROWDER-MANGET CO.

(No. 4,936.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 9, 1913.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 454*)—ACTION—VENUE.

It has already been decided in this case that the defendant against whom the verdict was rendered could be sued in the county where his principal resided, and that the plea to the jurisdiction was properly stricken. Daniel v. Browder-Manget Co., 11 Ga. App. 789, 76 S. E. 166.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Dec. Dig. § 454.*]

2. BANKRUPTCY (§ 428*)—VENUE (§ 22*) — RESIDENCE OF DEFENDANTS—LOSS OF JURISDICTION.

Discharge in bankruptcy of the principal defendant would not oust the court of jurisdiction of a defendant secondarily liable. This is so because the plea of bankruptcy is one of personal privilege (Collier on Bankruptcy [9th Ed.] § 17, p. 404) and because there are circumstances under which one who has been discharged in bankruptcy may be compelled to pay a debt which was provable in bankruptcy, as, for instance, where the debt was not listed in the bankrupt's schedule and the creditor had no notice of the bankruptcy proceeding, or where, after the adjudication, a new promise to pay has been made by the debtor. Shumate v. Ryan, 127 Ga. 118, 56 S. E. 103. Where the court has jurisdiction of the person of one defendant when a suit is filed, the mere fact that he is subsequently discharged upon some matter in avoidance will not prevent the court from proceeding to judgment against another defendant, jurisdiction over whom is dependent, not upon liability of, but upon jurisdiction over, the discharged defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bankruptcy. Cent. Dig. §§ 782-786; Dec. Dig. § 428.* Venue. Cent. Dig. §§ 35-37; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 225*)—AMENDED PLEADING—CONSTRUCTION.

Where a demurrer to a plea is sustained with leave to amend, and subsequently an amendment is allowed and filed without objection, the original and the amended plea should be considered together in order to determine whether a defense is set forth.

4. PLEADING (§§ 225, 417*) — WAIVER OF RIGHT TO AMEND—RULING ON DEMURRER—WAIVER OF OBJECTION.

The filing of an amendment to meet a ruling sustaining a demurrer is a waiver by the amending party of his right to except to the order requiring the amendment to be made. Brantley Co. v. Southerland, 1 Ga. App. 804, 57 S. E. 980. But this rule does not operate conversely, and an unsuccessful exception to an order requiring an amendment does not prevent the filing of an amendment to meet the demurrer. Where the amendment is filed before exception is taken to the order requiring it, this may be urged as a waiver of the exception, but if not so urged, and the exception be overruled on its merits, the suing out of the exception is not a good reason for refusing to consider the amendment.

5. PLEADING (§ 409*)—ANSWER—OBJECTION—ESTOPPEL.

It does not follow, however, that a plea, because it may be amended without objection, is to be treated, during the further progress of the trial, as setting forth a good defense, for a plea which is bad in substance may be ignored, or the defect may be taken advantage of by a motion to strike, or by objecting to evidence, or by an instruction from the court to disregard the plea, or in any other proper way. The law does not contemplate that a defendant shall prevail upon a plea which is bad in substance unless the plaintiff is estopped from challenging its sufficiency by a judgment which he himself invoked. See Kelly v. Strouse, 116 Ga. 872 (2a), 879, 43 S. E. 280.

6. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 481*) — PLEADING — SUFFICIENCY.

While the plea as amended is complex, confusing, and somewhat duplicitous, it sufficiently charges, in the absence of a special demurrer and as against a general attack that it sets forth no defense, that the note sued on was without consideration, and that the plaintiff, with knowledge of this fact, conspired and colluded with the person to whom the note was given to collect the note from the defendant against whom judgment was rendered.

7. NEW TRIAL (§ 39*)—GROUNDS—INSTRUCTION.

This being so, it was error to deal with the pleadings and to instruct the jury upon the theory that the only defense raised by the defendant was one of non est factum. This error having entered into and affected the whole trial, a new trial should have been granted to allow the defendant an opportunity to sustain his defense of want of consideration and to show that the plaintiff was not a bona fide holder.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 57-61; Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by the Browder-Manget Company against H. T. Daniel. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

[1, 2] See, also, 11 Ga. App. 789, 76 S. E. 168.

J. F. Golightly, of Atlanta, and H. A. Hall, of Newnan, for plaintiff in error. Moore & Pomeroy, of Atlanta, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. The fundamental error into which counsel for the plaintiff and the trial court fell was in ignoring all the defendant's pleas except the plea of non est factum. General and special demurrers were filed to the answer. Upon these demurrers the court passed an order striking all of the answer except so much thereof as set up the defense of non est factum, "with leave to amend in ten days from this date." Subsequently, within the time allowed by the order, the defendant amended his answer and the amendment was allowed, "subject to objections." No objections of any sort were ever filed by the plaintiff to the answer as amended. The defendant sued out a bill of exceptions complaining of the order striking his original answer with leave to amend.

[3, 4] If the fact that he had acquiesced in this ruling by filing an amendment to meet the demurrer had been brought to the attention of this court, it would have been held that by filing the amendment he had waived his right to except to the judgment requiring the original answer to be amended. But this fact was not brought to the attention of this court, and the exception was dealt with on its merits; it being held that the court properly sustained the demurrers to the original answer. As the defendant, in response to the order granting him leave to do so, filed an amendment, and no objections were made thereto, and no attack of any sort was made upon the answer as amended, the court should have considered the answer as amended to determine whether or not it set forth any defense. Olds Motor Works v. Olds Oakland Co. (Sup.) 78 S. E. 902. The mere fact that the defendant excepted to the order requiring him to amend and that his exception to the order was not sustained did not amount to a waiver of his right to amend, which was granted by the order sustaining the demurrers to the original answer.

[5] However, if the answer as amended did not set forth any defense, it was properly ignored, because it is not necessary that a formal motion would be made to strike an answer which is bad in substance. Unless the plaintiff is estopped to call in question the sufficiency of the answer, he may do so by objecting to the evidence, or by asking for an instruction to the jury to disregard the answer, or in any other proper way in which the matter may be brought to the attention of the court.

[7] Hence the instruction which the court gave the jury, to the effect that the only defense which they need consider was that of non est factum, was proper, if the answer did not set forth any other valid defense. If it did, the instruction was erroneous and a new trial must necessarily result.

[6] The answer as amended alleged that the note sued on was really never due to the American National Beverage Company, from whom the plaintiff acquired it, but that it was executed by the defendant and turned over to that company, with the understanding that it was not to become binding on the defendant until after he had examined into the affairs of the company and ascertained that the representations of its officers as to its financial standing were true. It is further averred that, as an inducement to the defendant to execute his note for stock in that company, it was represented to him that the company was capitalized at $400,000, with a paid-up capital of $100,000. It is further averred that, in consideration of the execution of the note, certain officers and agents of the American National Beverage Company promised to elect the defendant president of the company, at a large salary. It is also alleged that the American National Beverage Company was in fact insolvent when the note was obtained, unable to obtain credit, and was in bankruptcy at the time suit was filed; that it was not capitalized at $400,000 as represented and did not have a paid-up capital of $100,000. If all these things are true and the note was not in fact, as is alleged, due to the American National Beverage Company as a complete and binding obligation, but was simply to be held by it in trust until the defendant could ascertain the financial condition of the company, then the defendant had a good defense as against the company.

The allegations relied on to show that the plaintiff was not a bona fide holder of the note are loose and general; but in the absence of a special demurrer they are, in our opinion, sufficient to constitute a defense against the plaintiff. In the original answer it was alleged that the plaintiff conspired with the American National Beverage Company, to fraudulently collect from the defendant the amount of the note. This was one of the allegations which was held to be indefinite and which the defendant was given leave to amend. In the amendment it is averred "that this note was taken by Browder-Manget Company at a time when the American National Beverage Company was unable to obtain credit, and that the said Browder-Manget Company is conspiring with the said American National Beverage Company to defraud the said H. T. Daniel out of the amount of this note." In other pleas it is averred that the plaintiff, when it took the note, did not pay full value for it, and knew that the American National Beverage Company was insolvent. A general charge of conspiracy and collusion is insufficient as against a special demurrer, but there was no objection of any kind to the answer as amended. In effect the defendant simply repeated in the amendment the general allegations of fraud which were contained in the original answer, and hence, if the amendment had been objected to, it should not have been allowed. No objections having been filed to the answer as amended, the general averments of fraud and collusion against the plaintiff were sufficient to raise an issue upon which the defendant was entitled to be heard before a jury. If, upon another trial upon the pleadings as they now stand, he can establish his plea of non est factum or prove that the plaintiff colluded with the American National Beverage Company, which was insolvent, to defraud him, that the defendant was deceived and defrauded by the American National Beverage Company, and that the plaintiff participated in the fraud and conspired with that company to fraudulently collect from the defendant the amount of the note, he would be entitled to prevail, otherwise not.

Judgment reversed.

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 114*)—RELEASE OF SURETY—MISREPRESENTATION OF LAW.

Under the facts set forth in the opinion, the judge of the superior court erred in overruling the certiorari.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. §§ 240-243; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

Error from Superior Court, Haralson County; Price Edwards, Judge.

Action in a justice's court by Jones Bros. against J. W. Watson and one Holcombe. Judgment for defendant Holcombe and from the overruling of a certiorari by the superior court, plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

Griffith & Matthews, of Buchanan, for plaintiffs in error. Jas. Beall, of Carrollton, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Jones Bros. sued Watson, as maker, and Holcombe, as surety, on a promissory note for $28 in a justice's court; and on appeal to a jury in that court a verdict was found against Watson and releasing Holcombe. Jones Bros. thereupon sued out a writ of certiorari, complaining of the verdict and judgment releasing Holcombe from liability on the note; the judge of the superior court overruled the certiorari, and that judgment is excepted to. The facts in the case, briefly stated, are as follows: Watson was a tenant of Holcomb for the year 1911. Watson, as maker, and Holcombe, as surety, executed the note sued on to Jones Bros. for supplies used by Watson as a cropper on Holcombe's place for the year 1911. In the fall of 1911 Watson delivered a bale of cotton to Holcombe, his landlord, for the purpose of paying the balance due on this note. Holcombe took this bale of cotton to Bremen and there sold it to Jones Bros. When the settlement was to be made, Jones Bros. presented a note made by Watson for guano furnished him for that year and insisted that the proceeds of this bale of cotton should be applied first to the payment of this guano note. Holcombe at first refused to consent to this application, insisting that Watson had turned over the bale of cotton to him as his landlord to be sold for the purpose of applying the proceeds to the payment of the balance due on the note made by Watson, on which he (Holcombe) was surety. Jones Bros. according to Holcombe, told him that he (Holcombe) was also liable under the law on Watson's guano note because the guano furnished to Watson had been used by Watson, as cropper, for making the crop. Holcombe, in reply to this, said that if this was the law he would consent that Watson's guano note be first paid and that the balance of the cotton left over be applied on the note of Watson and himself. This was done. The guano note was paid in full and taken up by Holcombe, and the balance of the proceeds arising from the sale of the cotton was placed on the other note. The present suit is for the balance due on the note made by Watson and signed by Holcombe as surety.

Under these facts we think the verdict in the justice's court should have been against both Watson and Holcombe, and therefore that the judge of the superior court erred in overruling the certiorari. We do not see how, under these facts, Watson could have been held liable on the note and Holcombe released. Holcombe's insistence that he was induced to consent to the application of the proceeds arising from the sale of the bale of cotton to Watson's guano note, upon the statement of Jones Bros. that he was liable on this note because the guano furnished to Watson had been used on Holcombe's land to make the crop, was without force. No fraud is charged against Jones Bros. There was no fiduciary relation between Holcombe and Jones Bros. but they were dealing at arm's length; and Holcombe therefore had no right to rely upon this statement of Jones Bros. It is true that Holcombe had the right to control the proceeds of the sale of this cotton, which was made by his cropper to pay the cropper's debt to him; and this control was exercised by him, for he sold the bale of cotton and legally and voluntarily consented that the proceeds should be applied in payment of Watson's individual note for the guano. Even if Holcombe had been deceived by the statement of Jones Bros. that he was liable on Watson's individual note, and had been defrauded by this statement, it was no case for rescission or taking back of the payment which he had made of Watson's individual note, for he did not, before the suit was brought, offer to restore the status quo by returning the Watson note to Jones Bros. On the contrary, he had delivered this note, marked "paid," to Watson. Langston v. Aderhold, 60 Ga. 376; Railway Co. v. Hayes, 83 Ga. 558, 10 S. E. 350. We think therefore, that the learned judge of the superior court erred in overruling the certiorari.

1. ARREST (§ 63*)—ARREST WITHOUT WARRANT—GROUNDS—INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

According to the uncontradicted evidence, it appears that there was no examination or search into the contents of the defendant's valise, but that he voluntarily disclosed its contents. The valise contained about three gallons of whisky in quart and pint bottles. The possession of such a large quantity might authorize the inference that its possessor was keeping the whisky for the purpose of illegal sale, and would authorize his arrest upon a charge of violating the municipal ordinance upon that subject, on the ground that the offense was being committed in the presence of the officer.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 393*)—EVIDENCE—VOLUNTARY DISCLOSURE BY ACCUSED.

In view of the fact that the contents of the valise were voluntarily disclosed by the accused, it was not error to admit in evidence the valise and its contents upon his trial for the offense of selling liquor.

Action by Annie Leonard against the Mayor and Council of the City of Macon. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

A. W. Lane and R. W. Barnes, both of Macon, for plaintiffs in error. Napier, Maynard & Plunkett, of Macon, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Annie Leonard sued the mayor and council of the city of Macon to recover damages for personal injuries, and, from a verdict of $500 rendered in her favor, the defendant filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled. The only question involved in the record arises upon the construction of section 2 of the act of 1903, under which the territory where the alleged injury occurred was incorporated and became a part of the city of Macon. Acts 1903, p. 579. The first section of this act extends the corporate limits so as to embrace certain territory therein described, and the second section of the act provides: "The mayor and council of the city of Macon shall have full power and authority, and are hereby vested with power and authority to select, lay out and name such of the roads and alleys in the territory hereinbefore set forth, to be adopted and known as streets and public alleys of the city of Macon. The mayor and council of the city of Macon shall not be liable in any amount for any failure to keep in repair any of the roads or alleys in said territory, unless the same shall have been first selected, named and laid out as streets or alleys." It was conceded that the injury occurred on what is known as the corner of Third avenue and Middle street in this new territory, and the defense relied upon is that the mayor and council of the city of Macon had not, at the time of the alleged injury, selected, named, and laid out as streets, alleys, roads, avenues, and highways the streets in the territory where the injury was alleged to have occurred. The injury to the plaintiff occurred in July, 1912. It was admitted that during the preceding nine years (the period following the incorporation of the new territory) the city of Macon had exercised jurisdiction over this territory; that the city had a map, known as a property map of this territory, and had adopted this map as indicating the territory thus incorporated, this map having been made in August, 1903, immediately after the territory was incorporated into the city; that the mayor and council of the city of Macon had also placed sewers through this entire territory; that the police of the city patrolled the same; that the street sanitary wagons made the usual visits to this territory; that the city collected taxes from the property owners in this territory; and that the streets and sidewalks in the territory were worked and kept in order by the city of Macon—in other words, that for the nine years the city of Macon had exercised full jurisdiction and authority over the territory as a part of the city. It is true that the city had not, by any affirmative act of the mayor and council, "selected, named, and laid out as streets or alleys" the streets and alleys in this territory; but this, under the facts, we think immaterial, for it is unquestionably true that the city had adopted and accepted the streets and alleys which had already been laid out and named in the territory when it was taken over by the city. In other words, there was no change in the names of the streets and no change in their location. The names and locations remained the same.

Under this evidence we think the trial judge very properly charged the jury that under the law the streets and avenues in this territory formally became avenues and streets of the city of Macon; and that the particular street where the injury occurred, being thus a street of the city of Macon, was governed by the same rule of law which applied to any other street, alley, or avenue in the city of Macon. We are of the opinion that incorporation during nine years under the act authorizing the incorporation of the territory aforesaid, and the acts of the city in collecting taxes and exercising jurisdiction over that territory all this time, and in causing to be made a property map thereof, upon which appeared the streets, alleys, and highways in that territory as they existed and were designated before the incorporation, are sufficient to charge the city, as to them, with the liability imposed upon it with reference to other streets of the city. The city could not, by simply failing to go any further in the laying out and naming of streets, escape all liability for a failure to exercise that diligence which the law imposes on a municipality as to its streets, avenues, and public alleys.

Judgment affirmed.

1. CARRIERS (§ 280*)—INJURY TO PASSENGER RIDING ON PASS—HEPBURN ACT.

As a general rule, a stipulation in a free pass, to the effect that the person who accepts such transportation himself assumes all risks of injury, is enforceable, and as to a passenger who has accepted free transportation a carrier is liable only for injuries resulting from wantonness or willful negligence; but an exception to this rule is presented in the provision of the Hepburn Act (Act June 29, 1906, c. 3591, 34 Stat. 584 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1911, p. 1288]) which permits a railroad company to issue free transportation to its employes and members of their families. As between such employes and the railroad company which employs them the privilege and benefit of being afforded transportation without cost may be considered as a part of the consideration paid for the services of the employe and may be treated as an element of value within the contemplation of both parties at the time of entering into the contract of employment. Consequently the court did not err in refusing to charge the jury that, if the plaintiff (who was the wife of an employe) was traveling on a free pass, she would not be entitled to recover.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 969*)—DISCRETIONARY RULING—REFUSAL OF INSTRUCTIONS—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

Under the facts in this case it was not harmful error for the court to refuse to charge that testimony of a party who offers himself as a witness in his own behalf is to be construed most strongly against him when it is self-contradictory, vague, or equivocal, and, unless there is other evidence tending to establish his right to recover, he is not entitled to a finding in his favor, if that version of his testimony most unfavorable to himself shows that the verdict should be against him. The applicability of this rule of evidence in any particular case is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, who must determine, in the first instance, as to whether the testimony is self-contradictory, vague, or equivocal. As the trial judge sees and hears the witnesses, it must be very manifest that he erred in the application of the rule before the exercise of his discretion will be interfered with.

3. NEW TRIAL (§ 108*) — GROUNDS — NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

The court did not err in refusing a new trial upon the ground of the motion which was based upon newly discovered evidence that the plaintiff was not legally married to the employe of the railroad company, on account of whom the free transportation was issued. The alleged newly discovered testimony at most only furnishes proof of a presumptive marriage, and this must yield when brought into competition with proof of an actual marriage. Upon this point the decision is controlled by the ruling of the Supreme Court in Norman v. Goode, 113 Ga. 121, 38 S. E. 317. "With no competing actual marriage proved, the law presumes marriage from cohabitation and repute. But this presumption the law declines to raise in opposition to a competing marriage actually proved." Jenkins v. Jenkins, 83 Ga. 287, 9 S. E. 542, 20 Am. St. Rep. 318.

1. DAMAGES (§§ 97, 178*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—EVIDENCE—LOSS OF ABILITY TO LABOR.

In a suit against a municipality to recover damages for personal injuries, where it was alleged and proved that the plaintiff, as a result of the injuries received, was unable to do his accustomed work and suffered great mental anguish and physical pain, it was not error to admit the following testimony of the plaintiff: "The fact that I have not been able to work and carry on my duties as I was accustomed to do before has worried me." Nor was the following instruction to the jury erroneous: "And I further charge you in this case that the loss of ability to labor is pain and suffering." In Powell v. Railroad Co., 77 Ga. 192, 200, 3 S. E. 757, it was held that the loss of ability to labor is pain, and that a physical injury that destroys the power of a human being to labor is one of the most serious injuries that it is possible to inflict. See, also, City Council of Augusta v. Owens, 111 Ga. 464, 479, 36 S. E. 830.

2. DAMAGES (§ 216*)—TRIAL (§§ 228, 252*)—ACTIONS FOR PERSONAL INJURIES—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the allegations of the petition claimed actual damages for the loss of ability to labor and also the amount of physician's bills, but there was no specific proof as to these items of damage, although there was evidence under which the plaintiff was entitled to recover for mental anguish and physical pain, the following charge was not improper: "As to this mental pain and suffering, the court can give you no particular rule by which you can arrive at that damage, if [the plaintiff] is entitled to recover; that is left to the enlightened consciences of intelligent jurors." There was no material error in this instruction in the use of the word "intelligent" instead of "impartial." The words, "enlightened consciences of intelligent jurors," are sufficient to include the idea that such jurors must also be impartial. Central R. Co. v. Kelly, 58 Ga. 107, 111; W. & A. R. v. Abbott, 74 Ga. 851, 856; Southern Bell Tel. Co. v. Jordan, 87 Ga. 69, 72, 18 S. E. 202. Nor, under the facts of this case, was the instruction above quoted erroneous because of allegations in the petition that the suit was for doctor's bills and medicine and for lost time, since these items of damage were not specifically proved, and the only damages proved as claimed were those which were properly included under the allegation for mental pain and suffering. The facts of this case distinguish it from that of Southern Railway Co. v. Davis, 132 Ga. 812, 65 S. E. 131, and cases cited therein.

Error from City Court of Americus; W. M. Harper, Judge.

Action by J. H. Baker against J. C. Witt. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

W. W. Dykes, of Americus, for plaintiff in error. Ellis, Webb & Ellis, of Americus, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. On May 13, 1911, L. M. Rambo executed a written agreement to sell to J. H. Baker a tract of land located in Calhoun county, Ga., and known as the Davis estate place, consisting of 1,635 acres, more or less, at $10 per acre. In this writing it was provided that Baker should pay to Rambo $1,000 on June 15, 1911, and execute his promissory note for the balance of the purchase price, to become due December 1, 1911, whereupon Rambo should execute to Baker a bond for title to the land. On June 13, 1911, Baker signed upon this writing the following indorsement: "I hereby transfer my interest in the above bill of sale to J. C. Witt for valuable consideration." On the same day Witt and Baker entered into a written contract in which it was stated that Witt had bought from Baker land described, the description being the same as that contained in the writing from Rambo to Baker, and that it was agreed that Baker should transfer to Witt "the bill of sale" from Rambo, and that Witt would make the cash payment of $1,000 and execute his note to Rambo as described in the instrument from him to Baker. The contract further stipulated: "It is further agreed that the said J. C. Witt and J. H. Baker are to use their best efforts to make a sale of the above-described land and divide any profits they may make over and above the net cost of same, said sale to be made on or before the first day of December, 1911, and the minimum price shall be not less than eleven ($11.00) dollars per acre, and the said J. C. Witt agrees that, if said land is not sold on or before the first day of December, 1911, then he, the said J. C. Witt, further agrees to pay the said J. H. Baker two and one-half per cent. of the purchase price of the said described land for services rendered previous to this date."

Baker brought his action against Witt, making substantially the following allegations: Witt is indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $408.75, besides interest from December 1, 1911. Baker purchased from Rambo the land described in the foregoing document at the price of $10 per acre, and transferred to Witt the obligation of Rambo to convey title; Witt assuming the terms and conditions of the contract made with Rambo. On or about June 15, 1911, Witt paid to Rambo a part of the purchase money, and Rambo executed to Witt a bond for title to the land. On or about November 30, 1911, Witt paid the balance of the purchase money for the land, and Rambo executed to him his warranty deed. Thereupon Witt entered into possession of the land and is now in possession. The plaintiff used his best efforts to make a sale of the land according to the terms of the contract, and was unable to do so on or before December 1, 1911, by reason of all of which Witt became indebted to him in fixed sum. Witt answered, denying the indebtedness, admitting that he had purchased the land from Rambo as set forth in the petition, but alleging that he had paid only $16,000 for the 1,635 acres. He declined either to admit or deny, for want of sufficient information, the allegation that the plaintiff had used his best efforts to make a sale of the land on or before December 1, 1911. For further answer the defendant averred that when he purchased the land from Baker he was to have clear title, and that after executing the contract with Baker he found on record in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Calhoun county a lease of the poplar, cypress, and ash timber located on certain portions of the land, which lease was still in force, and that the timber therein described was worth $1,300. The contract between Baker and the defendant did not except the timber, and Baker, in discussing the proposition of a sale with the defendant, pointed it out to him as an inducement for him to purchase the land. About the time the defendant paid for the property his attention was called to the lease of the timber on the land, and he called Baker's attention to it, and Baker stated to him that it had expired, by agreement or otherwise, and was not of force, and that the defendant would get all of the timber on the place that he had purchased. Defendant several times offered to pay Baker $400 (this sum being 2½ per cent. of the amount which he paid for the land) if Baker would clear up the timber lease; but he failed and refused to do this. The existence of the timber lease made the land less valuable by $1,300 than it would have otherwise been. Defendant prayed for a judgment against the plaintiff for $900. The plaintiff demurred to this answer, on the grounds that it failed to set forth a defense sought to vary the terms of the written agreement between the parties, and failed to show how the defendant arrived at the value of the timber covered by the lease described in the answer. The demurrer having been presented in term time, an order was passed that the case be heard in vacation on April 11, 1913, at which time the court should have authority to pass upon all demurrers and amendments as if in term time, and enter up a judgment in the case, with the right of the losing party to except as if the rulings were made in term. It was further provided in the order that, if the hearing was not had at the time stated, the court would have the right to continue the hearing to a future date.

At the hearing on April 11, 1911, the plaintiff amended his petition by adding a copy of the agreement to sell executed by Rambo to Baker, a copy of the bond for title executed by Rambo to Witt, and a copy of the deed from Rambo to Witt. In both the bond for title and the deed it was stipulated that the instrument was executed subject to certain turpentine and timber leases theretofore executed by the grantor to timber on the land described. In each of these instruments the land was described as containing 1,635 acres, and the purchase price was stated to be $16,000. Thereupon the defendant offered an amendment to his answer, averring that the agreement of the defendant to pay the plaintiff 2½ per cent. of the purchase price of the land for services previously rendered was without consideration; that Baker did not render any services for the defendant prior to that date or in connection with this transaction, and for this reason was not entitled to recover the amount sued for. It was further averred that Baker was unable to sell the defendant the land described in the contract between him and Baker, and that Rambo refused to make the sale to him except subject to a certain lease (a copy of which is attached to the answer) of the cypress, poplar, and ash timber on certain portions of the land for $1,300, to expire September 4, 1919. It was also alleged that Baker was present when the defendant and Rambo finally consummated the trade, that the defendant bought the land from Rambo upon an entirely different contract than the one made with Baker, and that "in closing the trade with L. M. Rambo the said J. H. Baker acquiesced therein, and therefore agreed that the contract between J. H. Baker and this defendant, which is sued on, should become null and void and of no effect, and he therefore waived all of his rights in said contract when the sale was made direct by L. M. Rambo to this defendant on a different contract altogether." It was further alleged that Baker was engaged in the real estate business in Sumter county, Ga., did not have a license to do a real estate business in Calhoun county, Ga., and the amount sued for is compensation for work performed by him as a real estate agent in connection with the transaction, and the sale was made by Baker in the regular course of business as a real estate agent. The trial judge took the case under advisement, and on April 26, 1913, entered a judgment sustaining the plaintiff's demurrer to the defendant's answer as amended, and entered up a judgment as in case of default in favor of plaintiff against the defendant for the principal sum of $408.75 and $40.11 interest. The defendant excepted.

1. Neither the agreement of sale to Baker executed by Rambo, which was transferred to Witt, nor the contract between Baker to Witt contained any exception in reference to the timber growing on the land. Growing timber, being a part of the realty, would, of course, pass under a conveyance of the land which did not except the timber. Upon the face of the papers, Baker obtained an option from Rambo and transferred his option to Witt, and at the same time executed to Witt an agreement to sell. There is nothing in the writing binding Witt to pay Baker any sum of money for the option which the latter had procured from Rambo. The only stipulation in the writing under which Witt became bound to pay Baker any money was that providing for the payment of 2½ per cent. of the purchase price "for services previously rendered to this date." So far as appears, the services thus referred to may or may not have been connected with the sale from Rambo. For aught that appears, they may have been services rendered in an entirely separate and distinct transaction. The petition does not disclose what these services were; the language of the contract is ambiguous, and it is nowhere explained in the pleadings. The sum agreed upon to be paid could not have been intended as compensation to Baker for making a bona fide, but unsuccessful, effort to resell the land for Witt, for the services rendered were those performed prior to the execution of the contract. If the agreement to pay for services rendered referred to the procuring of the transfer of the option from Rambo, the defendant would be bound to pay, because it is admitted that Baker did procure from Rambo an agreement to sell the land, and did transfer this agreement to Witt. The fact that Rambo subsequently declined to make a conveyance which would include the timber, and that Witt accepted the deed which excluded the timber, would not affect Baker's right to recover compensation, if the parties really intended that he should be paid for his services in procuring the option. If, on the other hand, the expression "services rendered previous to this date," as used in the contract between Witt and Baker, referred to some other services, disconnected from the purchase from Rambo, then the defendant's pleas were sufficient to raise an issue. It is distinctly averred that no services were rendered by the plaintiff, and hence that the agreement was without consideration. The recital in the contract that services had been previously rendered would not estop Witt from proving the contrary. This recital was but a statement of the consideration of the promise to pay, and could be inquired into for the purpose of showing that no services had been rendered, and that the contract was for that reason without consideration. See W. E. Coldwell Co. v. Cowart, 140 Ga. —, 75 S. E. 425.

To recapitulate the effect of our ruling is as follows: The expression in the contract, "services rendered previous to this date," is ambiguous. If it should appear that the parties intended that Baker should be compensated for his services in procuring the option from Rambo and transferring it to Witt, upon the pleadings as they now stand the plaintiff would be entitled to recover. If, however, it should appear that the expression "services rendered," as used in the contract, intended to relate to some services disconnected from the purchase from Rambo, then the burden would be on the defendant to show that no services were in fact rendered, and that for this reason his promise to pay was without consideration. So much of the defendant's plea as alleged that no services were rendered by the plaintiff, and that for this reason the promise to pay was without consideration, should not have been stricken. The other portions of the answer were properly stricken, as they set forth no defense.

1. STATES (§ 165*)—BONDS—PAYMENT—NOTICE TO HOLDERS.

Where the action of the State Treasurer and Treasurer of the State Sinking Fund Commission, in publishing a notice to holders of state bonds to present them for payment, was authorized by a resolution of the Sinking Fund Commission, passed at a meeting at which it was unquestioned that a quorum was present, it was unnecessary to decide whether a quorum was present at a subsequent meeting, at which it was attempted to ratify such action.

2. STATES (§ 165*)—BONDS—POWERS OF SINKING FUND COMMISSION.

3. STATES (§ 165*)—BONDS—ISSUANCE—DETAILS.

A resolution of the State Sinking Fund Commission authorized the Comptroller General to receive proposals for the purchase of bonds and stocks authorized by Act Feb. 17, 1912 (27 St. at Large, p. 738), and provided that he should report to the commission the proposals received, and provided, further, that the commission should sell the bonds and stocks at the best possible price obtainable, not less than par flat; that after the completion of the sale the treasurer should call all bonds authorized to be redeemed by that act for redemption on July 1, 1913, but that if the sale should not be completed by that date, the call should abide the further order of the commission, and that the new issue of bonds and stocks should be dated and bear interest, and should specify the rate of interest, times, and places of payment thereof, etc., as therein provided. The resolution was adopted at a meeting at which it was claimed there was no quorum present. Held, that the resolution involved matters of detail either fixed by the terms of the act or within the discretion and judgment of the commission, and therefore still subject to its orders, and hence, where the commission subsequently refused to revoke such resolution, it impliedly ratified it.

4. STATUTES (§ 119*)—TITLES AND SUBJECTS OF ACTS.

The provision of Act Feb. 17, 1912 (27 St. at Large, p. 738), authorizing a new issue of bonds and stocks to be issued by the State Sinking Fund Commission for the purpose of calling in and paying a previous issue, is germane to the subject expressed in the title, which recites that it is an act to provide for the exercise by the state of its option to call in and pay the whole or any part of the bonds and stocks issued under an act mentioned, and does not violate Const. art. 3, § 17, providing that every act shall relate to but one subject, which shall be expressed in its title.

5. OFFICERS (§ 30*)—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS—HOLDING TWO OFFICES.

Act Feb. 17, 1912 (27 St. at Large, p. 738), authorizing the State Sinking Fund Commission, composed under other statutory provisions of the Governor, State Treasurer, Comptroller General, Attorney General, Chairman of the Committee of Finance of the Senate and the Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, to call in and pay certain bonds and stocks of the state, and to issue new bonds and stocks for that purpose, does not violate Const. art. 2, § 2, providing that no person shall hold two offices of honor or profit at the same time, since membership in the commission is not an office, but merely involves the discharge of duties imposed by law on the various officers, and therefore merely an incident to their respective offices.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. §§ 37-43; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

6. STATES (§ 165*)—BONDS—PAYMENT—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The act of 1873 (15 St. at Large, p. 518), and subsequent acts, authorized an issue of bonds and stocks by the state called Green Consols. Various subsequent acts authorized the issue of bonds and stocks known as Brown Consols, for refunding the Green Consols and other outstanding debts. Acts Dec. 22, 1892, and Dec. 22, 1893 (21 St. at Large, pp. 24, 420), authorized a new issue of bonds and stocks known as Redemption Brown Consols, for the purpose of refunding outstanding bonds and stocks of the state, including Brown and Green Consols. Act Feb. 17, 1912 (27 St. at Large, p. 738), entitled "An act to provide for the exercise by the state of its option to call in and pay the whole or any part of the brown bonds and stocks issued under an act * * * approved December 22, A. D. 1892," authorized the issuance of new bonds and stocks, and provides by section 6 that the proceeds thereof shall be applied to the payment of the redemption bonds and stocks issued under the act of 1892 and the consolidated bonds and stocks commonly called Brown Consols, and to no other purpose. Section 7 provides that the proceeds of sales thereof shall be kept as a separate fund, to be used exclusively for the final redemption of such Brown Bonds and Stocks issued under the act of 1892, and "said consolidated bonds and certificates of stock hereinbefore described," but that the sinking fund commission in their judgment may exchange the new bonds for Brown Consols upon such terms as may best subserve the public welfare. Held, that the act of 1912 does not authorize the refunding of Green Consols which are still outstanding, "the consolidated bonds and stocks hereinbefore described," mentioned in section 7, being the Brown Consols mentioned in section 6.

7. STATUTES (§ 119*)—BONDS—PAYMENT—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Act Feb. 17, 1912 (27 St. at Large, p. 738), so far as it authorizes the redemption of Brown Consols in addition to Redemption Brown Consols, violates Const. art. 3, § 17, which provides that every act shall relate to but one subject, which shall be expressed in its title, since the title specifically limits its object to the redemption of the bonds issued under Act Dec. 22, 1892 (21 St. at Large, p. 24), and hence only Redemption Brown Consols issued under the act of 1892 are redeemable thereunder.

8. STATUTES (§ 126*)—TITLES AND SUBJECTS OF ACTS.

While Const. art. 3, § 17, providing that every act shall relate to but one subject, which shall be expressed in its title, is very liberally construed, yet when the title of an act definitely and specifically limits its object, the court must limit the operation of the act to the subject so expressed in the title.

9. STATES (§ 165*)—BONDS—PAYMENT—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Act Dec. 22, 1892 (21 St. at Large, p. 24), authorized an issue of bonds and stocks called Redemption Brown Consols, for the purpose of redeeming other outstanding obligations of the state. Act Dec. 22, 1893 (21 St. at Large, p. 420), authorized the surrender of certain bonds and certificates of stock not covered by the act of 1892, and provided that the treasurer in exchange therefor should issue bonds or certificates of stock of the kind issued under the act of 1892, and known as Redemption Brown Consols. The bonds issued under the act of 1893 recited that they were issued under the act of 1892. Act Feb. 17, 1912 (27 St. at Large, p. 738), authorized the sinking fund commission to call in and pay the bonds and stocks issued under the act of 1892. Held, that bonds and stocks issued under the act of 1893 are redeemable under the act of 1912 as though issued under the act of 1892, the act of 1893 being intended as an amendment supplementing the act of 1892 and enlarging its scope, especially as the state is estopped by the recital in such bonds to deny that they were issued under the act of 1892.

10. STATES (§ 164*)—BONDS—PAYMENT—LEGALITY.

The refunding of certain bonds and stocks of the state would not be enjoined on the ground that certain of them were issued in exchange for bills of the bank of the state which were stolen, that certain others were issued after the time provided by law, or to persons other than those authorized by law to receive them, or that certain others were issued in exchange for stock once surrendered, but not canceled, and stolen and again redeemed, where it was not alleged that any of the holders were not innocent purchasers for value before maturity and without notice, that they did not rest upon valid debts of the state, or that they were fraudulent or void in their inception.

11. STATES (§ 115*)—INDEBTEDNESS—POWER TO CONCUR.

The refunding of a valid existing debt does not increase the debt of the state, and does not need the sanction of the qualified electors under Const. art. 10, § 11, providing that the General Assembly shall not create any further debt or obligation, except for the ordinary and current business of the state, without submitting the question as to the creation of such new debt to the qualified electors at a general election.

16. STATUTES (§ 119*)—TITLES AND SUBJECTS OF ACTS.

The provision of section 15 of the joint resolution of March 22, 1878 (16 St. at Large, p. 672), declaring certain bonds and certificates of stock of the state, issued after the terms of the officers who executed them had expired, to be in all respects as if they had been issued before the expiration of such terms of office, is germane to the subject expressed in the title, which recites that it is a resolution providing a mode of ascertaining the debt of the state and of liquidating and settling it, and hence the resolution did not violate Const. 1868, art. 2, § 20, requiring the subject of acts to be expressed in their title.

17. STATES (§ 158*)—BONDS—RATIFICATION OF INVALID BONDS.

The provision of section 15 of the joint resolution of March 22, 1878 (16 St. at Large, p. 672), for ascertaining the debt of the state and liquidating and settling it, that certain bonds and certificates of stock issued after the terms of the officers executing them had expired were thereby declared to be in all respects as if they had been issued before the expiration of such terms of office, was valid, since, there being no constitutional requirement that the bonds or certificates of stock should be issued by any particular officer or person, the Legislature might have provided for their issuance by private individuals as agents of the state, and might ratify such unauthorized issuance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 149; Dec. Dig. § 158.*]

18. STATUTES (§ 119*)—TITLES AND SUBJECTS OF ACTS.

Act December 20, 1878 (16 St. at Large, p. 704), entitled "An act to extend the time for refunding the unquestionable debt of the state," authorized the refunding until October 21, 1879, of obligations issued prior to January 1, 1866, and no others. Act December 24, 1879 (17 St. at Large, p. 110), entitled "An act to continue in force an act to extend the time for refunding the unquestionable debt of the state," extended the time for refunding obligations, issued prior to January 1, 1866, to October 31, 1880, and also provided for the refunding of obligations issued after January 1, 1866. Held, that the provision for refunding obligations issued after January 1, 1866, did not relate to a subject not expressed in the title of the act, contrary to Const. 1868, art. 2, § 20, since the title of the act of 1878 was broad enough to embrace a declaration by the Legislature of what the unquestionable debt of the state consisted, and hence to include such provision, and the act of 1879 was in effect only an amendment of the act of 1878, continuing it in force and extending its provisions to another class of debts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 164-167; Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

19. STATES (§ 115*)—BONDS—TIME FOR PAYMENT—REMOVAL OF LIMITATION.

Act Feb. 25, 1896 (22 St. at Large, p. 183), prohibited the refunding of coupon bonds, and the coupons thereof, after 20 years from the maturity of the bonds. Act Feb. 10, 1912 (27 St. at Large, p. 922), repeals the act of 1896 as to two certain bonds which matured in 1888. Held, that the act of 1912 and the refunding of such bonds thereunder did not increase the indebtedness of the state contrary to Const. art. 10, § 11, forbidding the General Assembly to create any further debt or obligation, except for the ordinary and current business of the state, without submitting the question as to the creation of such debt to the electors, since statutes of limitations do not affect the validity of a debt barred thereby, or the moral obligation to pay it, and the act of 1896 therefore did not destroy any valid bond after the expiration of 20 years from its maturity, but merely prevented the treasurer from refunding it.

20. STATES (§ 165*)—BONDS—PAYMENT—"DATE OF ISSUE."

Under Act Dec. 22, 1892 (21 St. at Large, p. 24), authorizing the issuance of bonds and certificates of stock by the state, and providing that the state reserve to itself the right to call in and pay the whole or any part of the issue, at any time after the expiration of 20 years from the date of issue, the "date of issue" is the date borne by the bonds and stocks, and not the date when they were actually issued, and hence they were all redeemable 20 years after January 1, 1893, the date which all bore, though some were not actually issued until later.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 157; Dec. Dig. § 165.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, p. 1831.]

21. STATES (§ 165*)—BONDS—PAYMENT—CANCELLATION.

Act Dec. 22, 1892 (21 St. at Large, p. 24), authorizing an issue of bonds, provided that the Sinking Fund Commission should invest all sums coming into their hands in the bonds issued under that act, hold them as assets of the sinking fund, collect the interest thereon, and reinvest the interest in such consols, so that the sinking fund should be cumulative. It further provided that the state reserved the right to call in and pay the whole or any part of the issue at any time after 20 years from the date of issue. Held, that it was only intended to make the sinking fund cumulative until the time arrived for final redemption of the bonds and stocks, for the payment of which it was set apart; and, the state having exercised its option to redeem such bonds and stocks, the commission was not required to longer hold those called for payment as assets of the sinking fund, but should cancel them.

"To be officially reported."

Original action for an injunction by the State, on the relation of W. W. Ray, against Cole L. Blease, Governor, and others, composing the State Sinking Fund Commission. Ordered in accordance with the opinion.

Weston & Aycock, of Columbia, for petitioner. Attorney General Peeples and J. Fraser Lyon, of Columbia, for respondents.

HYDRICK, J. At the session of 1912 the Legislature passed an act entitled "An act to provide for the exercise by the state of its option to call in and pay the whole or any part of the Brown Bonds and Stocks, issued under an act entitled 'An act to provide for the redemption of that portion of the state debt known as the Brown Consol Bonds and Stocks,' by the issue of other bonds and stocks," approved December 22, A. D. 1892." 27 Stat. p. 738. The act provides that the Sinking Fund Commission, which is composed of the Governor, the State Treasurer, the Comptroller General, the Attorney General, the Chairman of the Committee on Finance of the Senate, and the Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, shall have authority to exercise the option reserved to the state in the refunding act of 1892 (21 Stat. p. 24) to call in and pay, at the expiration of 20 years from the date of issue thereof, the whole or any part of the bonds and stocks issued thereunder, dated January 1, 1893, and known as Redemption Brown Consols, and, for that purpose, that the commission shall be authorized to issue and sell 4 per cent. bonds and stocks, not exceeding the aggregate outstanding amount of the bonds and stocks that have been or may be issued under said act of 1892, and certain previous refunding acts, which are specifically mentioned.

During the year 1912, the commission passed several resolutions, and took some steps preliminary to carry out the provisions of the act. Hon. W. L. Mauldin, who was chairman of the Committee on Finance of the Senate, died before either of the meetings of the commission herein mentioned was held, and thereby a vacancy in the commission was created. On October 30, 1912, the commission passed a resolution that its clerk ascertain what amount of the sinking fund would be available on January 2, 1913, for retiring the Brown Consols, and that, when the amount was ascertained, "the necessary steps be taken for calling in the bonds to collect the amount thereof to be paid off and retired." That resolution was adopted at a meeting of the commission attended by four of its members, and its validity has not been questioned. On December 2, 1912, in pursuance of that resolution, the State Treasurer, who is the secretary and treasurer of the commission, published over his signature, as State Treasurer and treasurer of the commission, in a financial paper in New York and in two daily papers in this state, a notice to the holders of Redemption Brown Bonds, issued under the act of 1892, and numbered from 3,781 to 4,319, both included, to present the same to him, on January 1, 1913, for payment, and that interest accruing thereon after said date would not be paid.

On December 23, 1912, pursuant to a call of the chairman of the commission, due notice of which was given to each member thereof, the Attorney General, the Comptroller General, the State Treasurer, and Hon. L. J. Browning, who had been, and claimed that he was then, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, met together as the Sinking Fund Commission, and by unanimous vote passed several resolutions relative to the refunding of the state debt, under the act of 1912, the substance of which was as follows: (1) Ratifying the publication of the notice by the treasurer above mentioned. (2) Authorizing the Comptroller General to receive proposals, pursuant to published advertisement or otherwise, for the purchase of the issue of bonds and stocks which the commission was authorized by the act of 1912 to issue. (3) That the Comptroller General report to the commission the proposals received, and that the commission sell the bonds and stocks at the best price obtainable, not less than par fiat. (4) That after the completion of said sale, the treasurer call all Redemption Brown Bonds (not already called) for redemption on July 1, 1913, but if said sale should not have been completed by that date, said call should abide the further order of the commission. (5) That the new issue of bonds and stocks should be dated and bear interest from January 1, 1913, specifying the rate of interest, times, and places of payment thereof, and the date of maturity of the bonds and stocks, and the privilege of redemption, according to the terms of the act. The validity of these resolutions is questioned by the petitioner and by some of the respondents, on the ground that, when they were adopted, Mr. Browning's term of office as a member of the House of Representatives had expired, and he was not therefore a member of the commission, and without him there were only three members present, and, as four members were necessary to constitute a quorum, no business could have been lawfully transacted at said meeting. Section 10 of article 3 of the Constitution provides that the terms of office of representatives chosen at a general election shall begin the Monday following such election. Mr. Browning's successor was elected at the general election held on November 5, 1912; therefore it is contended that he was not a lawful member of the commission on December 23, 1912, the date on which the resolutions in question were passed.

On January 6, 1913, this action for injunction was commenced against the former members of the commission to test the constitutionality of the act of 1912, and the authority of the commission thereunder to pay or refund certain outstanding bonds and stocks, which are particularly mentioned in the petition, and the validity of the resolution of December 23, 1912, in order that all questions as to the validity of the bonds and stocks which may be issued by the commission may be finally settled and determined. After the General Assembly had convened, pursuant to the Constitution, and after the state officers, who had been elected at the general election on November 5, 1912, had been inaugurated and qualified, and a Chairman of the Committee on Finance of the Senate and a Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives had been appointed, an order was passed making these new officials parties respondent herein. After returns had been filed on behalf of all the respondents, the case was referred to Halcott P. Green, Esq., as special referee, to take and report the testimony, together with his findings thereupon.

The referee finds that the allegations or suggestions contained in the return of His Excellency, the Governor, are unsustained, in so far as it is therein alleged or suggested that there was any irregularity or fraud in connection with the refunding of bonds under the act of 1892, or any unfairness, impropriety, illegality, or collusion in connection with any understanding or agreement on the part of the former members of the commission, or any of them, with any person, firm, or corporation relative to the purchase or sale of the bonds and stocks to be issued under the act of 1912, or with reference to the bringing of this action. As the matters referred to do not affect the validity of the bonds and stocks to be issued, and as no exception has been taken to the findings of the referee, we deem it unnecessary to prolong this opinion by a more detailed statement or consideration of them.

[1] It appears that the action of the State Treasurer and Treasurer of the Sinking Fund Commission, in advertising the call for the Redemption Brown Bonds, hereinbefore mentioned, to be presented to him on January 1, 1913, for payment, was based upon and authorized by the resolution of the commission passed at its meeting on October 30, 1912, at which there was a quorum of members whose title to office at that time is unquestioned, and that the resolution of December 23, 1912, so far as that call is concerned, was only an attempt to ratify what he had done. As his action was based upon unquestioned and unquestionable authority, it needed no ratification, which is necessary only when it is sought to validate an act done without authority.

[2, 3] As to the other resolutions of that date, the substance of which has been hereinbefore stated, it need only be said that it appears from their nature that they involve matters of detail which are either fixed by the terms of the act, or such as are within the discretion and judgment of the commission in carrying out the provisions of the act, and are therefore still subject to its orders; but as to matters within their discretion the commission is not subject to the control of the court. Furthermore, it appears that the commission as now constituted, refused to revoke these resolutions, and thereby impliedly ratified them. It follows, therefore, that it is unnecessary to decide whether the resolutions passed at the meeting of December 23, 1912, are valid or not; hence any decision or discussion of the questions involved in that issue would be mere obiter dictum.

[4] The validity of the act is questioned under the allegation that it violates section 17 of article 3 of the Constitution, which provides that every act shall relate to but one subject, which shall be expressed in its title. The specific objection is that the body of the act provides for the issuance of bonds and stocks, while the title expressed only the subject of providing for the exercise of the state's option to call in and pay certain bonds and stocks. It is argued that the subject of calling in and paying certain bonds and stocks is not broad enough to cover the issuance of refunding bonds and stocks. But the title is broader than the argument assumes. It expresses the subject of making provision for the exercise of the state's option to call in and pay certain bonds and stocks, and whatever the Legislature deemed necessary or proper to make provision to accomplish that purpose is germane to the subject expressed in the title. The issuance of bonds and stocks is the usual method of accomplishing such a purpose, and in this respect the act does not violate the Constitution. State v. O'Day, 74 S. C. 448, 54 S. E. 607, and cases cited.

[5] It is next alleged that the act violates section 2 of article 2 of the Constitution, which provides that no person shall hold two offices of honor or profit at the same time. The specific point is that the Sinking Fund Commission is illegally constituted, in that it is composed of public officers. The answer to this objection is that membership in the commission is not an office. It merely involves the discharge of duties imposed by law upon the various officers who compose the commission—duties which are, therefore, merely incident to their respective offices. State v. Potterfield, 47 S. C. 75, 25 S. E. 39; State v. Green, 52 S. C. 520, 30 S. E. 683.

[6, 7] Without stating in detail the legislation under which the obligations of the state have been funded, consolidated, and refunded from time to time, it will be sufficient, for the purpose of making clear the objections which we shall next consider, to say that since the war between the states there have been three principal issues of bonds and stocks. The first are called Green Consols. These were issued under the act of 1873 (15 St. at Large, p. 518), and subsequent acts amending and extending its provisions. After the greater part of the state debt had been refunded under that act, it was discovered that many of the Green Consols had been issued to redeem bonds and stock which had been issued without authority of law, and were therefore void. After investigation into the validity of the entire debt of the state, the Legislature, in various acts from 1878 to 1880, authorized the issuance of bonds and stocks to take the place of Green Consols found to be valid, and for the refunding of the remaining outstanding valid debt of the state. These bonds were to be of the same kind as Green Consols in every respect material to the present inquiry, except their color. They were colored brown, and are commonly known as Brown Consols.

All Green Consols and Brown Consols matured July 1, 1893. In 1892 the Legislature passed an act entitled, "An act to provide for the redemption of that part of the state debt known as the Brown Consol Bonds and Stocks by issue of other bonds and stocks." 21 Stat. p. 24. The bonds and stocks issued under this act are called Redemption Brown Consols. It will be seen from the title of the act, above quoted, that it contemplated the redemption of only the Brown Consols. But, at the date of its passage, there were still outstanding some Green Consols and some other obligations of the state which had not been refunded, either in Green Consols or Brown Consols, which were, however, still fundable in Brown Consols; hence the act authorized an issue of new bonds and stocks sufficient in amount to redeem all the bonds and stocks of the state which had been or might be issued under the act of 1873, and all subsequent acts authorizing the issue of bonds and stocks. Thereafter, by the act of December 22, 1893 (21 Stat. p. 420), the Legislature authorized the State Treasurer to refund in Redemption Brown Consols the valid principal, with interest to July 1, 1893, of all bonds and stocks then fundable in Brown Consols. Doubtless this act was found to be necessary because of the specific limitation, both in the title and in the body of the act of 1892, of the use of the issue of bonds and stocks therein authorized, and the proceeds of the sale thereof to the redemption of Brown Consols. There are still outstanding certain Green Consols which have not been refunded.

The petitioner contends that the act of 1912 does not authorize the refunding of these outstanding Green Consols for two reasons: (1) Because the body of the act not only does not authorize it, but forbids the refunding of any, except Brown Consols; (2) because, if the body of the act can be properly construed as authorizing the refunding of Green Consols, it violates the Constitution, and is void to that extent, because that subject is not expressed in its title. This contention must be sustained upon both grounds. While the act is by no means as clear as it should have been upon this subject, yet we think, taking all of its provisions together, and considering them in the light of the other act upon the same subject, the intention to be gathered from the language used prohibits the funding of any except the Brown Consols, issued under the act of 1892. The only provisions of the act upon this subject are found in sections 6 and 7. Section 6, after authorizing the sale of the issue by the commission, provides that "the proceeds thereof shall be applied to the payment of the said redemption bonds and stocks, issued under the act of 1892, and the consolidated bonds and certificates of stocks, commonly called Brown Consols, and to no other purpose." Section 7, after providing for the sale and registry of the bonds and stocks, says, "And the proceeds of such sales shall be kept as a separate fund, to be used exclusively for the final redemption of such Brown Bonds and Stocks issued under the act of 1892, and said consolidated bonds and certificates of stock hereinbefore described as shall not be exchanged for the bonds and certificates of stock, the issue of which is provided for in this act: Provided, however, that the Sinking Fund Commission, if, in their judgment it is best to do so, shall have authority to exchange, in whole or in part, the new four per cent. bonds for Brown Consols upon such terms as may best subserve the public welfare." Counsel for the commission admits that section 6 limits the use of the proceeds of sale to the payment of Redemption Brown Consols, issued under the act of 1892, and to Brown Consols, but they contend that the provision of section 7, above quoted, is inconsistent therewith, and, being last, it should control. But when we construe the provisions of both sections together, in the light of the other parts of the act, as we must, there is no inconsistency. Section 6 refers to two well-known classes of Brown Consols, to wit, Redemption Brown Consols, issued under the act of 1892, and Brown Consols, issued under previous acts. Section 7 refers to the same two classes, first, "such Brown Bonds and Stocks issued under the act of 1892," and second, "said consolidated bonds and certificates of stock hereinbefore described," which can certainly as clearly be referred to the Brown Consols mentioned in section 6 as to any other, and when so referred, there is no inconsistency in the terms of the statute. When there are two possible constructions of the provisions of an act, one of which makes them consistent with each other, and the other makes them inconsistent, the former must be adopted.

[3] While the body of the act does authorize the redemption of both Redemption Brown Consols and Brown Consols, the title specifically limits the act to the redemption of bonds and stocks issued under the act of 1892, namely, Redemption Brown Consols. While the courts construe the provision of the Constitution in question (that an act shall relate to but one subject, which shall be expressed in its title) very liberally to the end that legislation shall not thereby be needlessly hampered and embarrassed, still, when the title of an act definitely and specifically limits its object, as that of the act of 1892 does, to the redemption of a particular and specified issue of bonds, the court must limit the operation of the act to the subject so expressed in the title. Otherwise the provision of the Constitution in question would be set at naught. The Legislature may have had good reasons for limiting the commission to the redemption of the consols issued under the act of 1892. But it is not for us to inquire whether it had any reasons, or whether they were good or bad, or whether the failure to provide for the redemption of all the outstanding obligations of the state is only a casus omnisus. In either event we have no power to dispense with the mandate of the Constitution. The commission is therefore limited to the redemption of Redemption Brown Consols issued under the act of 1892.

It is argued, however, that Green Consols are, by the act of 1893, fundable in Redemption Brown Consols, and, this being so, the holders thereof could have them so refunded, and then the commission could refund the latter, and that, as the law does not require the doing of useless things, such circuitous proceedings should be unnecessary. On the other hand, the court cannot sanction the doing of that by the commission which is positively forbidden by the Legislature. Moreover, the commission cannot issue bonds or stocks under the act of 1892. Under that act bonds and stocks were issued by the treasurer. Whether the treasurer can still issue Redemption Brown Consols, under the act of 1892, to refund Green Consols is a question which we are not called upon to answer.

[8] The next question is whether the commission has authority to refund Redemption Brown Consols, issued under the act of 1893, as consols issued under the act of 1892. As we have seen above, the act of 1893 was clearly intended as an amendment supplementing the act of 1892, whereby its scope was enlarged so as to permit the refunding, not only of Brown Consols, but also of all outstanding obligations fundable in Brown Consols. The act specifically requires that the consols issued thereunder shall be of the kind issued under the act of 1892, known as Redemption Brown Consols, and the consols issued under the act of 1893 recite on their face that they were issued under that act. As we shall presently see, the state is estopped to deny that they were so issued.

[18] We proceed next to dispose of the objection to refunding certain bonds and stocks which are made in the following subdivisions of paragraph 20 of the petition:

"20. Certain bonds and stocks about to be refunded under the act of 1912 are not binding obligations of the state, and therefore such refunding will be an attempt to increase the indebtedness of the state for extraordinary purposes without an election, contrary to the provisions of section 11 of article 10 of the state Constitution, for the following reasons [a, b, and j are hereinafter considered]:

"(c) Brown Consols predicated upon the $19,279.75 bills of the Bank of the State stolen and outstanding at the time of issuance of such Brown Consols, as stated in paragraph 16, are not binding obligations of the state, nor is any bond or stock whose origin is to be traced to said Brown Consols in so far as it rests thereon, because the issuance of said Brown Consols was an attempt to increase the debt of the state for extraordinary purposes, without an election, contrary to article 16 of the state Constitution of 1868.

"(d) The act entitled 'An act to extend the time within which bills of the bank of the state may be funded, and to provide the manner of funding the same,' approved December 24, 1880, above mentioned in paragraph 17, authorized until July 1, 1881, the presentation of bills of the Bank of the State for examination and exchange for Brown Consols. Section 5 of said act provided as follows: 'That from and after the first day of July, 1881, all action and right of action, claim and demand, whatsoever, upon the obligations of the corporation known as the president and directors of the Bank of the State of South Carolina, and incident to or growing out of said obligations, shall cease and determine, and from thenceforth shall be forever barred.' This act has never been amended or repealed. After July 1, 1881, the end of the period limited by said act, $36,139.34 of bills were presented, and $18,069.59 of Brown Consols were issued in exchange. The issuance of said $18,069.59 of Brown Consols, upon bills of the Bank of the State presented after the time limited for such presentation by the act of December 24, 1880, was unauthorized, and such Brown Consols are not binding obligations of the state, nor are any bonds or stocks resting upon such Brown Consols binding obligations in so far as they so rest."

"(f) In the months of July and September, 1893, but after July 1, 1893, \$1,029.29 of Brown Consols were issued in exchange for other bonds and stocks as shown by the second schedule appended to paragraph 18 hereof, and immediately thereafter were redeemed by exchange for  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. Redemption Brown Consols of like amount. As the acts providing for the issuance of Brown Consols directed that they should mature July 1, 1893, and therefore did not authorize the issuance of such Brown Consols after that date, and as the act of 1892, providing for the issuance of  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. Redemption Brown Consols, limited to July 1, 1893, the time within which Brown Consols could be exchanged, therefore said \$1,029.29 of Redemption Brown Consols were issued without authority of law, and are not binding obligations of the state. Moreover, the act of 1893 did not authorize the refunding by exchange of Brown Consols surrendered by persons other than the purchasers of the new consols, and said \$1,029.29 of Brown Consols were surrendered by persons other than such purchasers.

"(g) Brown Consols, in the aggregate, amount to about \$706,203.87, issued prior to July 1, 1893, were surrendered, and exchanged for  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. Redemption Brown Consols after that date, contrary to the above-mentioned provisions of the act of 1892, limiting the time for such surrender and exchange, and therefore the  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. Con consols issued in exchange for such Brown Consols were issued without authority of law.

"(b) A number of 4 per cent. Redemption Brown Consols issued under the act of 1889 as amended in 1890 were surrendered after July 1, 1893, and new 4½ per cent. Redemption Brown Consols were issued in exchange. Section 15 of the act of 1892 authorized the surrender of 4 per cent. bonds and the issuance of such 4½ per cent. bonds in exchange therefor 'as provided in this act,' and the limitation of time for surrender and exchange of Brown Consols contained in this act must therefore be applicable also to the surrender and exchange of the 4 per cent. Redemption Brown Consols. The new 4½ per cent. Consols issued in exchange for 4 per cent. Consols surrendered after July 1, 1893, were therefore issued without authority of law.

"(i) At some time between the years 1893 and 1902, at least $14,500 of 4½ per cent. Redemption Brown Consol Bonds, surrendered and exchanged for stock pursuant to said act of 1892, were not canceled as required by said act, but were stolen by a clerk in the office of the State Treasurer, $7,000 of said stolen bonds have since been surrendered and exchanged for stock as provided in the act of 1892. Although the Supreme Court has held, in the case of Ehrlich v. Jennings, Treasurer, 78 S. C. 269 [58 S. E. 922, 125 Am. St. Rep. 795, 13 Ann. Cas. 1166], that the state was estopped to deny the validity of one of said bonds, which was in the hands of a bona fide purchaser, it has not been established that the others have reached the hands of bona fide purchasers; and, until that fact be established, the issuance of new bonds and stocks, predicated upon such other stolen bonds or stock issued in exchange therefor will be unauthorized by law, and contrary to the provisions of section 11 of article 10 of the state Constitution."

The following principles were established in the Bond Debt Cases, 12 S. C. 200, and the cases of Robertson v. Tillman, 39 S. C. 298, 17 S. E. 678, and Ehrlich v. Jennings, 78 S. C. 269, 58 S. E. 922, 125 Am. St. Rep. 795, 13 Ann. Cas. 1166:

[11] (1) The refunding of a valid existing debt does not increase the debt of the state, and therefore needs not the sanction of the qualified electors, which is required by section 11 of article 10 of the Constitution before the public debt can be increased.

[12] (2) The liability of the state upon negotiable paper, issued by competent authority, is the same as that which attaches to private individuals under like circumstances.

[13] (3) Holders of such paper, in the absence of allegation to the contrary, are presumed to be innocent purchasers thereof for value, before maturity, and without notice of any objection to which it may be liable.

[14] (4) When authority to issue such paper exists, neither irregularities nor frauds on the part of the officers or agents of the state who are intrusted with the exercise of such authority will affect it in the hands of such holders.

[15] (5) The state is estopped to deny recitals on the face of such paper in the hands of such holders.

Under the principles above stated, the objection made in each of the foregoing subdivisions must be overruled, because it is not alleged in the petition that any of the holders of the consols which the commission propose to redeem are not innocent purchasers thereof for value, before maturity, and without notice of the defects alleged; nor is it alleged that any of said consols are not rested upon valid debts of the state, or that they were fraudulent or void in their inception. Other reasons might be assigned, but we deem the foregoing sufficient.

[16, 17] The disposition of the remaining subdivisions of paragraph 20 depends somewhat upon other principles besides those above stated.

"(a) Green Consol Bonds and Stocks in the aggregate amount of $54,000, described by their numbers and denominations in the report of the bond commission, were reported by the bond commission to have been executed and issued after the terms of office of the officials who executed and issued them had expired, as stated in paragraphs 12 and 13, and said consols were therefore not binding obligations of the state. These Green Consols are referred to in the following extract from section 15 of the 'joint resolution providing a mode of ascertaining the debt of the state and of liquidating and settling the same,' approved March 22, 1878: 'That the bonds and certificates of stock and exchange and transfer certificates of stock mentioned in said report as issued by F. L. Cardozo as State Treasurer, the same being signed by D. H. Chamberlain as Governor and countersigned by Thomas C. Dunn as Comptroller General, after the terms of these officials had expired, amounting in the whole to $54,000, be and the same are hereby declared to be in all respects as if the same had been issued before the expiration of said the terms of office of said officials, and the validity thereof shall be determined as hereinbefore provided. * * *' This provision did not operate to validate these Green Consols because such validation is not expressed in the title of said joint resolution, and because such validation would have increased the indebtedness of the state for extraordinary purposes without an election, contrary to article 16 of the state Constitution of 1868. None of said Green Consols, nor any bond or certificate of stock whose origin is to be traced to said Green Consols, is a binding obligation of the state in so far as it rests thereon.

Under the decisions of this court, construing and applying the provision of the Constitution in question, the title of the joint resolution referred to in this subdivision is clearly comprehensive enough in the expression of its subject to embrace the validation of the issuance of these consols by the officers named, after the expiration of their terms of office. The subject of the resolution was providing a mode of ascertaining the debt of the state. As to these consols, the mode provided as to the irregularity of their issuance was the declaration, by the Legislature itself, that they were, so far as that matter was concerned, a part of the valid debt of the state, a matter clearly germane to the subject expressed in the title. They were validated only with respect to that irregularity. In all other respects their validity was, by the terms of the resolution, subject to the investigation and decision of the court of claims, just as if they had been issued by said officials while in office. There was no requirement of the Constitution that they should be issued by any particular officer or person. Therefore it was competent for the Legislature to provide that they should be issued by private individuals, as the agents of the state; and, of course, it had the power to ratify what it could have authorized in the first instance. Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller General, 4 S. C. 430.

[18] It is not alleged that these consols were not rested upon valid debts of the state. If they were, as we have seen, the refunding of them did not increase the debt of the state.

"(b) The act entitled 'An act to extend the time for funding the unquestionable debt of the state,' approved December 20, 1878 (16 St. at Large, p. 704), above mentioned in paragraph 14, authorized the refunding, until October 31, 1879, of obligations issued prior to January 1, 1866, and no others. The act entitled 'An act to continue in force an act to extend the time for funding the unquestionable debt of the state,' approved December 24, 1879 (17 St. at Large, p. 110), above mentioned in paragraph 15, authorized the refunding, until October 31, 1880, of obligations issued prior to January 1, 1866, and also obligations issued after that date which should be found valid by Special Commissioner Coit. The subject of refunding obligations issued after January 1, 1866, is not expressed in the title of the latter act, as required by section 20 of article 2 of the state Constitution of 1868, and therefore no Brown Consols issued for such refunding pursuant to said act, nor any bond or certificate, whose origin is to be traced to said Brown Consols, is a binding obligation of the state in so far as it rests thereon."

Neither the title of the act of 1878, nor that of 1879, mentions any particular debt of the state, the time for the refunding of which was extended. In both the unquestionable debt of the state was the subject of the extension, without regard to whether it was issued before or after 1866. The subject expressed in the title of the act of 1878 is clearly broad enough to embrace the declaration by the Legislature, in the body of the act, of what the unquestionable debt of the state consisted, which at the date of that act was confined to obligations issued prior to January 1, 1866. If at that time there had existed a class of obligations issued after January 1, 1866, which were considered unquestionable, it is clear that provision might have been made for refunding them also. If so, it is equally clear that it could have been made thereafter by amendment of the act; and the act of 1879 is, in effect, only an amendment of the act of 1878 (which was intended to be only of temporary force), continuing it in force and extending its provisions to another class of debts, to wit, those issued subsequent to January 1, 1866, which had been investigated and found to be valid by the special commissioner. It follows that this objection cannot be sustained.

"(c) The act of 1892, after authorizing the sale of the 4½ per cent. Redemption Brown Consols 'at not less than par or face value,' and directing the application of the proceeds thereof to the payment of the Brown Consols, and to no other purpose, authorized and required the State Treasurer to receive from the 'purchasers' of the new consols, who should surrender Brown Consols before July 1, 1893, all such consols tendered by them, and to issue new 4½ per cent. consols of equal face value in lieu of and in exchange for Brown Consols so surrendered. It was further provided that the 'holders' of the 4 per cent. Redemption Brown Consols should have the right to surrender them and receive in exchange therefor 4½ per cent. Redemption Brown Consols of equal face value 'as provided in this act.' The supplementary act of December 22, 1893, provided for surrender by the holders of all bonds and stocks refundable in Brown Consols and the issuance of 4½ per cent. Redemption Brown Consols directly in exchange therefor upon the same terms upon which they were refundable in Brown Consols. $5,401,955.86 of the 4½ per cent. Redemption Brown Consols now outstanding were issued in the fiscal year ending October 31, 1893, and the remaining $220,556.11 were issued subsequently. Of the former $5,250,000 were issued to a purchasing syndicate pursuant to a contract made in March, 1893, $150,926.57 were issued to holders of 4 per cent. consols in exchange for a like amount of such consols, and $1,029.29 were issued to holders of Brown Consols issued after July 1, 1893, in exchange for a like amount of such consols, making a total of $5,401,955.86. The syndicate purchased the new consols at 'par flat'—that is, at the face value—without including accrued interest, and made payment of $2,929,596.74 in cash and $2,320,403.26 in Brown Consols of equal face value, making a total of $5,250,000. The bonds issued to the purchasing syndicate and paid for in cash were issued at various times, beginning May 16, 1893, and ending July 8, 1893. The bonds issued to the purchasing syndicate and paid for in Brown Consols were issued at various times, beginning May 16, 1893, and ending July 10, 1893. The $5,250,000 of Redemption Brown Consols issued to the purchasing syndicate exceeded, by $20,113.80, the amount ($5,229,886.20) of Brown Consols then outstanding and refundable under the act of 1892, as shown by the first schedule appended to paragraph 18. This overissue was due to the fact that in estimating the amount of Brown Consols to be redeemed on July 1, 1893, the date of their maturity, the officers who made the contract with the purchasing syndicate allowed some margin for such Brown Consols as might be issued between the date of the contract and July 1, 1893 (there being still outstanding many bonds and stocks exchangeable for Brown Consols), and the amount of Brown Consols issued during such period was not as large as was expected. Of the $2,929,596.74 in cash received in 1893 from the purchasing syndicate for Redemption Brown Consols, sold as aforesaid, the sum of $1,746.65 still remains in the treasury; the sum of $20,919.51 was applied in 1894 to the payment of Green Consols (without authority of law), and the remainder of the cash received from the purchasing syndicate was applied to the payment of Brown Consols. The issuance of said $20,113.80 of Redemption Brown Consols in excess of the amount of Brown Consols refundable under the act of 1892 was not authorized by the act of 1892, and was an attempt to increase the debt of the state without an election, in violation of section 11 of article 10 of the state Constitution of 1895. Said $20,113.80 of invalid consols were among $22,525.55 of consols issued on July 5, 6, and 8, 1893 (after issuance of all other consols sold to the syndicate and paid for cash); and, as they cannot be distinguished by date of issue from the remaining portion of said $22,525.56 of consols, all of said $22,525.56 of consols must be deemed invalid."

State Treasurer's Report for 1893, pp. 7, 8, 114.

The following finding of the referee, as to the allegations contained in this subdivision, to which no exception has been taken, show that this ground of objection cannot be sustained.

"I therefore conclude as matter of fact: (1) That there was no overissue of Redemption Brown Consols under the act of 1892, and that the entire proceeds of said issue of bonds, with the exception of the sum of $1,746.65, now in the state treasury, has been used in the payment, redemption, and retiring of Brown Consols and 4 per cent. Brown Redemption Consols. (2) That no part of the said sum of $20,113.80, being the difference between the proceeds of sale of the Redemption Brown Consols and the amount of outstanding Brown Consols refundable under the act of 1892 as shown by the treasurer's report and alleged in said subdivision (e) of said paragraph 20 of petition, was used in the payment or redemption of Green Consols, but that the whole of said sum, with the exception of the amount now remaining in the treasury, was used for the payment, redemption, and retiring of Brown Consol Bonds and Stocks."

[19] "(j) In the present year, $1,160 of Redemption Brown Consols, were issued in exchange for coupon bonds and coupons of the issue known as Funding Bills of the Bank of the State Bonds, pursuant to an act passed in January, 1912 (27 Stat. p. 922). As said bonds matured in 1888, they and the coupons thereof ceased in 1908 to be debts of the state, by reason of the act approved February 25, 1896 [22 St. at Large, p. 183], entitled 'An act to limit the time in which coupon bonds payable to bearer and their coupons of the state may be consolidated, converted, funded or paid, and to repeal conflicting laws,' which act prohibits the refunding of coupon bonds and coupons thereof after the expiration of 20 years from the date of maturity of such bonds. The attempt to revive said debts by said act of 1912, and the refunding thereof by exchange for Redemption Brown Consols, constituted an attempt to increase the indebtedness of the state without an election, in violation of section 11 of article 10 of the state Constitution, and therefore said $1,160 of Redemption Brown Consols are not binding obligations of the state."

The effect of the act of 1893 was not to destroy any valid bond debt of the state, after the expiration of 20 years from the maturity of such bond, but it was merely to prevent the treasurer from refunding any such bond after the lapse of that time. It is a well-settled principle of law that the fact that a debt may be barred by a statute of limitations does not affect its validity, or the moral obligation to pay it. It is none the less a debt. The only effect of such a statute is to close the door of the opportunity afforded by the law to collect it. Therefore providing for the payment or refunding of such a debt does not increase the debt of the state. In numerous other instances mentioned in the petition the bar of a statute was removed by subsequent legislation.

[20] The petitioner's next contention is that, though the consols issued under the act of 1892 are all dated January 1, 1893, they were not actually issued until later dates, and as the act reserves to the state the right to redeem at any time after 20 years from "the date of issue," the commission have no right to call and redeem them until after 20 years from the dates when they were actually issued. The phrase "date of issue" means the date which the bonds and stocks bear, and not the date when they were actually issued, in the sense of being signed and delivered and put into circulation.

[21] The act of 1892 provides that the Sinking Fund Commission shall invest all sums which may come into their hands from time to time in the consols issued under that act, and hold same as assets of the sinking fund, collecting the interest thereon, and re-investing the same in said consols, so that the sinking fund should be cumulative. Petitioner therefore contends that the commission have no right to cancel the Redemption Brown Consols which they have called for payment, but should hold the same as assets of the sinking fund under the aforesaid provision of the act. That provision of the act was intended to make the sinking fund cumulative only until the time should arrive for the final redemption of the bonds and stocks for the payment of which it was set apart, when, of course, it was intended that it should be used for that purpose. That time has arrived, and, by the express terms of the act, the state now has the right to call in and pay or redeem the whole or any part of the bonds and stocks issued under that act. Therefore the commission should cancel the bonds and stocks so redeemed.

It is therefore ordered that the commission be at liberty to carry out the provision of the act of 1912 in accord with the views and principles herein announced.

1. PLEADING (§ 343*)—JUDGMENT ON PLEADINGS.

Where an order had been made by the clerk, to which no exception was taken, setting aside a default judgment for plaintiff in partition, and proceedings thereafter affecting the rights of defendants, and an answer was on file raising an issue of fraud, plaintiff was not entitled to a judgment upon the whole record, on the theory that the clerk could not make the order more than a year after the date of the judgment set aside.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 386*)—OPENING AND VACATING—FRAUD IN PREVENTING DEFENSE.

Under Revisal 1905, § 2494, providing that any party, after confirmation of a report of commissioners appointed to partition land, may impeach the proceedings and decrees for mistake, fraud, or collusion by a petition in the cause, the clerk of the superior court was authorized to set aside, on motion of defendant, a judgment in partition proceedings, and allow defendant to file his answer, where defendant was prevented by fraud of plaintiff from defending the suit.

3. DEEDS (§ 211*)—FRAUD—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence, in a partition proceeding, held to sustain a finding by the jury that a deed from defendant to plaintiff for a one-fifth interest in the land was procured by fraud.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nash County; Cline, Judge.

Suit for partition by Wiley T. Turner against Martha Ann Davis and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is a proceeding for partition of land, the plaintiff claiming to be the owner of an undivided one-fifth interest, under a deed executed by Martha Ann Davis and her children, all of whom are defendants. The summons was served on the 10th day of February, 1910, and within 10 days thereafter the plaintiff filed his complaint. The defendants filed no answer or demurrer to the complaint, nor did they enter an appearance in the proceeding until the 17th day of July, 1911, or about 17 months after the judgment had been entered adjudging the plaintiff to be the owner of one-fifth undivided interest in the land, and appointing commissioners to make partition thereof. On the 17th day of July, 1911, the defendants made a motion before the clerk of the superior court to set aside the decree adjudging the plaintiff to be the owner of an undivided one-fifth interest in the land and appointing commissioners to assign to him the same, alleging that the plaintiff had procured the deed from them by fraud, and that they were prevented by the fraud of the plaintiff from appearing and defending in said proceeding. The clerk allowed the motion as to the one-fifth of the land allotted to the plaintiff, and said defendants filed an answer, alleging that the deed to the plaintiff was procured by fraud, to which no exception was taken. The proceeding was then transferred to the civil issue docket, and when called for trial, the plaintiff moved for judgment on the whole record, for that the court was without jurisdiction or power, by a motion in the cause, to set aside the order of the clerk fixing the rights of the plaintiff in the land after the expiration of more than one year from date of the decree. The motion was overruled, and the plaintiff excepted. At the conclusion of the evidence, the plaintiff requested his honor to charge the jury that there was no evidence of fraud, which was refused, and the plaintiff excepted. The jury answered the issue of fraud in favor of the defendants, and from the judgment rendered the plaintiff appealed.

T. T. Thorne, of Rocky Mount, for appellant. M. V. Barnhill and Jacob Battle, both of Rocky Mount, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. [1, 2] The court could not, in any event, have granted the motion of the plaintiff for judgment upon the whole record, because an order had been made, to which no exception was taken, setting aside all orders in the proceeding affecting the rights of the defendants, and an answer was on file raising an issue of fraud, but we are also of opinion that the order of the clerk was fully authorized by Revisal; § 2494, which, after providing for confirmation of the report of commissioners appointed to divide land in partition proceedings, says: "Provided, that any party, after confirmation, may impeach the proceedings and decrees for mistake, fraud or collusion by petition in the cause."

[3] The exception that there is no evidence of fraud in procuring the execution of the deed under which the plaintiff claims is without merit. There is evidence that the defendants had employed the plaintiff to get them a deed for the land; that he came to them and asked them to sign a paper, which he said it was necessary for them to sign before they could get a deed and which was the deed under which the plaintiff claims; that he was asked to read the paper, and he said it was not necessary, and that he would not wrong the defendants out of anything; that the defendants did not know they were signing a deed; that the plaintiff paid nothing for the land; and that he denied to the defendants claiming any interest in the land after the execution of the deed.

There was evidence to the contrary, but we cannot pass on the weight of the evidence. No error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Perquimans County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action by W. O. Winslow against T. W. White. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The suit, instituted in 1912, was to enforce the specific performance of an agreement to convey a tract of land; the instrument being in terms as follows: "State of North Carolina, Perquimans County. February 10th, 1904. This is to certify that, if Oscar Winslow will marry my daughter, Lily, and be good and kind to her, I hereby agree to give him all that strip of land lying between the lane running through the farm and the lead ditch running through the J. P. Winslow farm, known as the middle slipe, beginning at the main road and running parallel lines to the back line, estimated at valuation of 2,000 (two thousand). To have and to hold. Witness my hand. T. W. White. [Seal.]"

Plaintiff, a witness in his own behalf, testified as follows: "That he married the daughter of the defendant in 1904; that the agreement set out in the complaint was made before the marriage in 1904, but that the paper writing was actually written and delivered in the spring of 1912; that the parol bargain was that the defendant would give the plaintiff $1,500 if he would marry his daughter, and later it was changed, plaintiff saying he would give defendant the middle-slip of land and build a house on it. The marriage took place about three or four weeks after the bargain was made, and after the marriage a house was built upon the piece of land. That since the marriage plaintiff and his wife have lived together as man and wife, and that he has always been kind to her." Upon this, the evidence chiefly relevant, the court charged the jury, if they believed the evidence, they would answer the first issue, "Yes," and the second issue, "Yes, by marrying the daughter of defendant and living with her and treating her good and kind." Defendant excepted.

Verdict was rendered as follows: "(1) Did the defendant the — day of April, 1912, execute and deliver to plaintiff the paper writing, dated February 10, 1904, marked 'Exhibit A,' in accordance with a parol contract made in 1904, as alleged? Ans. Yes. (2) Has the plaintiff complied with the terms of said contract? Ans. Yes, by marrying the daughter of defendant and living with her and treating her good and kind up to the present date. (3) What damages is plaintiff entitled to recover of defendant for rent of said land? Ans. Nothing, for that plaintiff admits that he is indebted to defendant in a sum equal to the rent of said land for the year 1912." Judgment on verdict that defendant convey the land subject to condition that plaintiff will support the wife and always be good and kind to her, etc.

Chas. Whedbee, of Hertford, and Ward & Thompson, of Elizabeth City, for appellant. E. F. Ayldett, of Elizabeth City, for appellee.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] It is well recognized that marriage is to be regarded and dealt with as a valuable consideration. Gurvin v. Cromartie, 33 N. C. 174, 53 Am. Dec. 406; Page on Contracts, § 290; 1 Bishop on the Law of Married Women, § 775. In this last citation the author quotes from Johnston v. Dillard, 1 Bay (S. C.) 232, in which marriage was said to be "the highest consideration known in law," and in the case it was further said to be "a consideration good against creditors unless done with fraudulent intent." And also from my Lord Coke as follows: "If a man had given land to a man with his daughter in frank marriage, generally a fee simple would pass without the word 'heirs,' for there is no consideration so much respected in law as the consideration of marriage in respect of alliance and posterity."

[2, 3] 2. The instrument contains an agreement on such a consideration to convey a tract of land sufficiently described.

[4] 3. The written agreement though executed long after the contract between the parties, which had been made by parol, is a sufficient memorandum to meet the provisions of our statute of frauds requiring contracts concerning land to be in writing. Magee v. Blankenship, 95 N. C. 563; 29 A. & E. p. 854. On the verdict, therefore, and under our decisions, the record presents a case calling for a decree for specific performance, the judgment entered in the cause. Combes v. Adams, 150 N. C. 64, 63 S. E. 186; Whitted v. Fuquay, 127 N. C. 68, 37 S. E. 141; Price v. Price, 133 N. C. 494, 45 S. E. 855; Boles v. Candler, 133 N. C. 528, 45 S. E. 835.

[5, 6] It was chiefly objected for defendant that this relief was not open to plaintiff by reason of the stipulation also appearing in the instrument that plaintiff, the obligee, should be good and kind to the daughter. The position being that this stipulation rendered the agreement too indefinite and uncertain to permit the remedy sought in this case and in any court; second, that the same should be construed as a condition precedent covering the entire period of the married life of the parties. We would be most reluctant to adopt either of these views, tending as they do in the one case to invalidate the instrument and in the other to defeat its evident and controlling purpose, and having due regard to the language of this stipulation, the relationship and evident purpose of the obligor, to provide for the support and kind treatment of his daughter in her married life, and the attendant circumstances of the transaction, all of them proper to be considered in arriving at the intent of the parties as expressed in the entire instrument. R. R. v. R. R., 147 N. C. 368-382, 61 S. E. 185, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 223, 125 Am. St. Rep. 560, 15 Ann. Cas. 363; Merriam v. U. S., 107 U. S. 441, 2 Sup. Ct. 536, 27 L. Ed. 531. We are of opinion that the learned judge who tried the cause has given the correct construction to the agreement in holding this feature of it to be a condition subsequent, and as such directing that the same be incorporated in the deed to be made by defendant. Such an interpretation sufficiently satisfies the language of the provision, will best effectuate the purpose of the parties, and is in accord with our decisions more directly relevant to the question presented. Helms v. Helms, 137 N. C. 206, 49 S. E. 110.

We find no reversible error in the record, and the judgment as entered is affirmed.

2. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 35*)—RIGHT TO SUE—TERMINATION OF PROSECUTION.

Plaintiff was arrested in January, 1911, on a complaint of defendant K. before a justice, and, the venue having been changed, plaintiff was discharged by the constable on the failure of the justice to appear on the date set for trial, whereupon plaintiff sued for malicious prosecution on February 7th following. On March 11th plaintiff moved in the original case to tax costs against defendant K., and that plaintiff be formally discharged. This motion was granted on March 15th, after which K. appealed to the superior court, where the case was remanded to the justice, with direction that he forthwith proceed to try the case or otherwise dispose of it, after which, at K.'s request, the costs of the criminal case were taxed against her. Held, that the criminal prosecution had not terminated when the action for malicious prosecution was instituted, and that it was therefore not maintainable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Gates County; Long, Judge.

Action by Richard Brinkley against Addie R. Knight and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

The action, instituted on February 7, 1911, against both defendants, was for malicious prosecution, and, on averment duly made that Addie R. Knight had wrongfully sued out justice's criminal warrant and caused arrest of plaintiff for entering on the lands of said Addie R. Knight, after being forbidden, and that the other defendant had instigated and abetted said prosecution. Nonsuit having been taken as to defendant Knight, the cause was tried on issues as to liability of the other defendant, and the following verdict rendered: "(1) Did the defendant cause the wrongful prosecution of the plaintiff, or assist in same, as alleged? Ans. Yes. (2) If so, was such arrest and prosecution without probable cause? Ans. Yes. (3) Was such arrest and prosecution malicious? Ans. Yes. (4) Was such arrest and prosecution terminated at the time this action was commenced? Ans. Yes. (5) What damage, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover? Ans. $225." HOKE, J. [1] It is the well-established position that, before an action for malicious prosecution can be instituted, it is necessary that the proceedings upon which it is based should have been properly terminated. Wilkinson v. Wilkinson, 159 N. C. 266, 74 S. E. 740, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1215; Stanford v. Grocery Company, 148 N. C. 419, 55 S. E. 815; Welch v. Cheek, 125 N. C. 353, 34 S. E. 531; Hatch v. Cohen, 84 N. C. 602, 37 Am. Rep. 630; Rice v. Ponder, 29 N. C. 390; Murray v. Lackey, 6 N. C. 368.

[2] After giving the case most careful consideration, we are of opinion that the facts in evidence as they are now presented do not bring the plaintiff's cause within the principle. From these facts it appears that in January, 1911, Mrs. Addie R. Knight, on affidavit, procured from a justice of the peace, G. C. Hobbs, a criminal warrant, charging present plaintiff, Richard Brinkley, with entering on her land after being forbidden, etc., etc.; that said warrant was duly returned the following day before said justice, when, on affidavit of said Brinkley, the cause was removed before another justice, C. M. Manning, to be heard a few days later at the same place. At said date and place the parties were duly present with their witnesses, and, the justice having failed to appear, the constable, at the instance of counsel for Brinkley, made the announcement that, "if any one desired to prosecute Brinkley, they must do so or he would be released," and said constable then and there told Brinkley he was released. The present action was then commenced, as stated, on February 7, 1911. "On 11th of March Richard Brinkley moved in said original cause and served a notice upon Addie R. Knight that on the 15th day of March, 1911, he would move the court to tax the cost in that action, and that the defendant be formally discharged. On 15th of March, 1911, the justice of the peace, Manning, heard the motion and discharged the said Brinkley and taxed the cost against the defendant Addie R. Knight. Said Addie R. Knight appealed from said judgment, and the same was heard at the spring term, 1911, of Gates superior court, which was some time in April. At said term the cause was remanded to the justice of the peace, with the direction that he forthwith proceed to try the case or otherwise dispose of it. Subsequent to said time the said Manning, J. P., at the request of the said Addie R. Knight, taxed her with the cost of the action."

It is thus shown that the criminal prosecution on which the present action is predicated had not been terminated on February 7, 1911, the date of commencement of this suit, but was recognized by the parties as existent at least two months after that date and was so declared by the superior court to which the cause had been carried by appeal of the prosecutrix on the question of costs. It is true that, in several of our decisions, notably in Rice v. Ponder, and Murray v. Lackey, supra, it was held that, when a defendant in a criminal prosecution had given bond to appear before the superior court and answer the charge and has so appeared and attended throughout the term, no further order or action having been taken in the cause, such prosecution may be considered as terminated within the meaning of the rule; but they were cases returnable to superior court, having stated terms, and in which the defendants had met every requirement of their bonds, and there was no longer any suit or process against them. But here was an action, as stated, of which the justice's court had final jurisdiction, in which the affidavit and warrant and order of removal before another justice were equivalent to an indictment pending, and, unless ended by order of the justice's court or some unequivocal act of the prosecutor or by lapse of time, it should not be considered as terminated. This was evidently the view taken by plaintiff and his counsel, for in their notice given in March, 1911, more than a month after action instituted, they notified the prosecutrix that they would move on March 15th, before the justice, to have the costs taxed against her and that the defendant therein be formally discharged, and, after appeal and order of superior court, remanding the cause, the present plaintiff was formally discharged from further prosecution of the criminal case. We are of opinion that on the record there was error in refusing the defendant's motion to nonsuit, and the same will be allowed.

Error.

M. H. WHITE & CO. v. WINSLOW & WHITE.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 10, 1913.)

1. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 138*)—LIEN—SCOPE.

A tenant, having mortgaged his cotton crop to plaintiff to secure advances, subject to the landlord's lien for rent, purchased a horse from defendants on credit, on defendants' agreement to sell the horse to the tenant, provided the landlord would release his lien on one bale of cotton. This the landlord did. The tenant raised 13 bales on the land, one of which was delivered by the tenant to defendants at the landlord's direction. Held, that the landlord's release of his lien on the one bale was not a relinquishment of any part of his rent, nor an assumption of liability by him for any part of the price of the horse as an advancement to the tenant, and hence such release did not impair the lien of plaintiff's chattel mortgage, which thereupon became a first lien on the bale released.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 228-236; Dec. Dig. § 138.*]

2. LIENS (§ 13*)—TRANSFER—ASSIGNMENT OF DEBT.

While one having a lien may release it to one claiming an interest or junior lien on the property, the lien is so far an incident of the debt which it secures that it cannot be assigned without at the same time transferring the debt, or at least a part thereof which the lien secures.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Liens, Cent. Dig. § 17; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Perquimans County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action by M. H. White & Co. against Winslow & White. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

This action was brought to recover the value of a bale of cotton, alleged to have been unlawfully converted by the defendant. These are the facts: William Maddrey leased a piece of land to Ferdinand Gregory for the year 1911, reserving a certain rent. The tenant mortgaged his crop to the plaintiff, M. H. White & Co., to secure advances made by them to him, and which constituted a second lien upon the crop, or, in other words, a lien subject to the rights of the landlord. The tenant then applied to the defendants, Winslow & White, to purchase a horse from them, and they agreed to sell him the horse if the landlord would sign the following release: "I hereby release to Winslow & White my claim under landlord and tenant act on the crops of Ferdinand Gregory, to be grown in the year 1911 on my lands, to the amount of one bale of cotton weighing not less than five hundred pounds." The release was executed by the landlord, William Maddrey, and the horse delivered to the tenant, Ferdinand Gregory. The latter made 13 bales of cotton on the land, and in the fall, he and his landlord had a full settlement, whereupon Maddrey directed his tenant to deliver one bale of cotton to the defendants which was done. The court held that plaintiffs could not recover, and they appealed.

P. W. McMullan, of Hertford, for appellants. Chas. Whedbee, of Hertford, for appellees.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] It will be seen that the landlord never relinquished any part of his rent, nor did he assume any liability for the price of the horse as an advancement to his tenant. He merely released his lien to the extent of 1 bale of cotton, without specifying which one of the 13. The defendants looked solely to the tenant for payment of the price, though they may have relied upon any lien acquired by the transaction, but this lien was manifestly subject to the prior right of the plaintiffs. No title to the bale of cotton passed to defendants by virtue of the release of the landlord, nor did it vest any lien in them. Their lien, if any, was given by the tenant, and the landlord simply released his prior lien, transferring it to the remaining 12 bales of cotton. This is the legal and actual nature of the transaction. It is perfectly evident that the landlord did not intend to part with any of his rent in favor of the defendants. All he did was to withdraw his lien from the 1 bale, and accept the 12 remaining bales as the only security for his rent. He did not impair the next prior right of plaintiffs, as second lien-ees, by merely removing his lien from the one bale of cotton, but, on the contrary, made it the first lien thereon. The principle of Powell v. Perry, 127 N. C. 22, 37 S. E. 71, therefore does not apply. In that case it was held that a lien may accrue for supplies, either paid for by the landlord, or advanced at his request and upon his credit. The whole theory of the defendants is based upon the wrong assumption that the landlord became, in any way, responsible for the price of the horse, so as to bring the case within the above decision. The distinction between releasing a lien and giving one must be very clear. Defendants acquired a lien by the delivery of the bale of cotton, but their right was derived from the tenant, and the landlord's release merely discharged his prior incumbrance, thereby making the second lien of plaintiffs effective.

[2] There is another view which occurs to us. A lien is so far an incident of the debt which it secures that it cannot be assigned without, at the same time, transferring the debt, or at least some part of it, which was not done here. 25 Cyc. 878. It was held in Buckner v. McIlroy, 31 Ark. 631, that "while a party holding a debt secured by lien cannot convey the lien to a stranger, without also assigning the debt, he may release the lien upon the property to one claiming an interest or junior lien on the property." The landlord surely has assigned no part of his debt for the rent.

It follows that defendant took the bale of cotton subject to plaintiffs' prior lien, and the court erred in not so holding.

Reversed.

1. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 154*)—ACTION BY DEPOSITOR—NECESSARY PARTIES DEFENDANT.

In an action by a depositor against a bank to recover the amount of a check, paid by the bank after notice not to do so, the payee of the check is not a necessary party, where plaintiff claimed no relief against him, and the bank alleged that it was not notified, and therefore paid the check properly, since if it paid the check properly it would have no cause of action against the payee.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 962*)—PARTIES (§ 51*)—BRINGING IN PROPER PARTIES—DISCRETION OF COURT.

If the payee of the check be considered a proper party, it was discretionary with the court whether he should be made a party at the instance of the bank, and the dismissal of the action as to the payee is not reviewable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Washington County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action by Julian Spruill against the Bank of Plymouth and another, in which U. S. Jackson was joined as a defendant on application of the defendants. From a judgment dismissing the action as to Jackson, the defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed.

This action was commenced against the Bank of Plymouth and Clarence Latham, before a justice of the peace, to recover the sum of $200. On the return day of the summons the defendant bank and Latham moved that U. S. Jackson be made a party, and that summons issue to Pitt county, the residence of said Jackson. The motion was granted, and the case continued. On the return day the defendant Jackson, through his counsel, entered a special appearance and moved to dismiss the action, for that the justice did not have jurisdiction over the defendant Jackson and the joining of Jackson was a fraud upon the jurisdiction. The justice reserved his ruling upon the motion until he heard the evidence. After hearing the evidence he overruled the defendant Jackson's motion, but dismissed the action upon the merits. Thereupon the plaintiff gave notice of appeal, and the case was heard by his honor, W. H. Whedbee, at the April term, 1913, of the superior court. Upon the calling of the case the defendant Jackson, through his counsel, renewed the motion to dismiss the action as to him, and thereupon his honor stated that he would hear the pleadings and the evidence before ruling upon the motion. Thereupon the pleadings were read, except the answer of U. S. Jackson. The plaintiff alleged that he had drawn a check for $200 on the defendant bank in favor of U. S. Jackson, and that the bank paid the same after notice to its cashier, the defendant Latham, not to do so. The plaintiff stated in open court that he did not demand any relief against Jackson, and the defendants, the bank and Latham, denied liability to the plaintiff, upon the ground that the plaintiff had not given the notice to refuse payment of the check. The court held that no relief was demanded or cause of action stated against the said Jackson, and thereupon dismissed the action as to Jackson, and signed the judgment set out in the record, to which ruling and judgment the defendants bank and Latham excepted and appealed to the Supreme Court.

W. M. Bond, Jr., of Plymouth, for appellant bank. Albion Dunn, of Greenville, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1] The settlement of the controversy between the plaintiff and the defendants—the bank and Latham—is dependent upon one fact, and that is whether the plaintiff notified the defendants to refuse payment of the check before it was paid, and the presence of Jackson in this action is not necessary to its determination.

It also appears that the plaintiff stated in open court that he demanded no relief against Jackson, and neither the bank nor Latham can recover against him upon the facts now presented, because they allege that they paid the check to him rightfully before notice not to pay, which, if true, would exonerate them from liability.

[2] We are therefore of opinion that Jackson is not a necessary party, and if a proper and not a necessary party, which is doubtful in view of the fact that the plaintiff makes no demand against him, and that the defendants cannot claim a liability on his part to them, except upon the ground that they wrongfully paid the check after notice not to do so, which they deny, it was discretionary with the judge to make him a party, and his action is not reviewable. Alken v. Manf. Co., 141 N. C. 339, 53 S. E. 867.

[3] We are also of the opinion that the appeal is premature, and must be dismissed. Lane v. Richardson, 101 N. C. 181, 7 S. E. 710; Emry v. Parker, 111 N. C. 261, 16 S. E. 236; Bennett v. Shelton, 117 N. C. 103, 23 S. E. 95; Gammon v. Johnson, 128 N. C. 64, 35 S. E. 185.

J. B. Ramsey and E. B. Grantham, both of Rocky Mount, for appellant. Bunn & Spruill, T. T. Thorne, and Jacob Battle, all of Rocky Mount, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. This is one of the numerous actions upon notes given to McLaughlin Bros. for the purchase of an "imported French coach horse," of which so many others are to be found in the reports of this state and also in those of other states. Attention is called to this in Winter v. Nobs, 19 Idaho, at page 28. Only one issue was submitted, "Are the defendants indebted to the plaintiff, and if so, in what amount?" The plaintiff did not tender any issues, nor except to this issue, nor for failure to submit other issues.

There were exceptions to evidence, but they do not require consideration, and indeed were not argued here. The plaintiff requested the court to charge that there was no evidence that the note was procured by fraud; and, if there was any, none that the plaintiff had notice of such fraud. These were properly refused upon the evidence.

[1] The plaintiff further requested the court to charge that, the action being upon a negotiable instrument he is presumed to be the holder thereof in due course, without notice of any equities or defenses of the defendants. This the court properly refused to give. There was allegation and proof tending to show that the execution of the note was procured by fraud, and hence the burden was thrown upon the plaintiff to show that it was a holder in due course; the credibility of the evidence being for the jury. Mfg. v. Summers, 143 N. C. 102, 55 S. E. 522; Bank v. Fountain, 148 N. C. 590, 62 S. E. 738; Park v. Exum, 156 N. C. 231, 72 S. E. 309; Bank v. Walser, 162 N. C. 63, 77 S. E. 1006; Pell's Revisal, § 2208.

[2, 3] The plaintiff further requested the court to charge the jury: "If you find the facts to be as testified to by all the witnesses, you will answer the issue as to the plaintiff being a bona fide holder for value and without notice in favor of the plaintiff." This instruction the court could not give upon the evidence. The court, however, did instruct the jury as follows: "The court instructs you, gentlemen, that if you believe all the evidence, and find the facts to be as testified by the witnesses, you should answer the issue, 'Yes, the amount of the note and interest after deducting the credits.' Otherwise you should answer the issue, 'Nothing.' The jury answered the issue "No." Whatever objections the defendants might have raised to this charge need not be considered. It is the plaintiff who appeals, and we do not see how this court can help him. The jury evidently did not believe the testimony upon which the plaintiff relied, and of its credibility the jury were the sole judges. The presiding judge had the power, and it was his duty if he thought the interest of justice required it, to set aside the verdict because "against the weight of the evidence." He did not do so, and it is not in the power of this court to review his action in that respect. Brink v. Black, 74 N. C. 329. Edwards v. Phifer, 120 N. C. 405, 27 S. #### LASSITER v. NORFOLK SOUTHERN R. CO.

1. COURTS (§ 489*) — CONFLICTING JURISDICTION—STATE AND UNITED STATES COURTS.

Where the purchasers of a railroad from the receivers appointed by a federal court agreed to pay all liabilities incurred by the receivers, a provision in the decree confirming the sale, which retained exclusive jurisdiction of the cause in the federal court to enforce the obligations assumed by the grantees, does not deprive the administrator of one killed by the negligence of the employes of the receivers of his right to sue the purchasers for damages in the state court, in view of Acts March 3, 1887, c. 373, § 3, 24 Stat. 554 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 582), which permits an action in the state court against receivers, without obtaining permission from the federal court which appointed them.

2. RAILROADS (§ 253*)—SALE OF PROPERTY—LIABILITY OF PURCHASERS.

The earnings of a railroad while in the hands of receivers are first applicable to the tort and contract liabilities incurred during its operation, even in preference to prior mortgage liens, and the purchasing company is liable to one injured by the negligence of the receivers on equitable principles, as fully as if it had been the original owner, since the application of the funds to improvements would be a wrongful diversion thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Gates County; Long, Judge.

Action by J. R. Lassiter, as administrator, against the Norfolk Southern Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. Rodman, of Washington, N. C., for appellant. Ward & Grimes, of Washington, N. C., Bond & Bond, of Edenton, and A. P. Godwin, of Gatesville, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This is an action for the negligent killing of Mattie Taylor, by an engine operated by the employes of the receivers of the Norfolk & Southern Railroad Company; the plaintiff alleging that the defendant, the Norfolk Southern Railroad Company, is liable therefor. The action was originally brought against the receivers of the Norfolk & Southern Railroad Company in Gates superior court. It was removed to the federal court, where a nonsuit was taken. Within one year thereafter, and after confirmation of the purchase of the property by and its delivery to defendant, this action was begun in the superior court of Gates against the purchaser of the property, the present defendant.

Upon the issues submitted, the jury found that the death of plaintiff's intestate was caused by the negligence of the receivers of the Norfolk & Southern Railroad Company as alleged in the complaint, that she did not contribute by her own negligence to cause said injury and death, and that the receivers by the use of reasonable care could have prevented said injury and death, and assessed the damages at $1,000. As to these issues there is no exception.

The fourth issue was, "Is the defendant, the Norfolk Southern Railroad Company liable for the tort alleged to have been committed by the Norfolk & Southern Railroad Company while operated by the receivers, as alleged in the complaint?" This issue was answered by the court, as a matter of law, "Yes," and the defendant excepted.

[1] The Norfolk & Southern Railroad Company was sold under a foreclosure in the federal court. Paragraph 11 of said decree provided: "The purchaser or purchasers shall, as a part of the consideration for such sale, and in addition to the purchase price bid, take the property purchased." Here follows several provisions, among them: "(3) And upon the express condition that such purchaser or purchasers, his or their successors and assigns, shall pay, satisfy, and discharge any unpaid indebtedness and obligation or liabilities which shall have been contracted or incurred by the receivers in respect thereto, before the delivery or possession of the property sold." The decree of confirmation, after reciting and adopting as a part of the decree of confirmation the decree of foreclosure, contained, among other things, the following: "It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that this court reserve the exclusive jurisdiction of this cause, for the purpose of enforcing and executing the provisions of the said decree of foreclosure and sale entered October 14, 1906, and for the purpose at all times of protecting said grantee or grantees, their successors or assigns, in the enjoyment of the property, assets, and franchises purchased under the said decree of foreclosure and sale, and to determine any and all controversies as to the character, extent, and validity of the possession of said grantee or grantees, their successors and assigns, acquired under the execution of said decree, and hereunder, and for the purpose of enforcing all the obligations and rights assumed by said grantee or grantees, their successors and assigns, under and by virtue of the said decree of foreclosure and sale, or any subsequent decree including this decree." The defendant earnestly contends that under this provision in the decree the plaintiff could not maintain this action in the superior court of Gates. We do not understand that the right which the plaintiff has under the federal and state statutes to bring this action in the state court can be impaired by this decree of the federal court, nor do we think that such decree was intended to have that effect.

[2] Inasmuch as an action can be brought in the state court against the receivers in the federal court, without obtaining permission of that court (U. S. Compiled Statutes, § 721[3], Acts March 3, 1887, c. 373, § 3, 24 Stat. 554), a fortiori an action can be brought in the state court against the purchaser, after confirmation of the sale and delivery of the property to such purchaser, without permission of the federal court. The liability of the purchaser is a matter of law which can be adjudicated in the state court. The earnings of the road, while in the hands of the receivers, are first applicable to the tort and contract liabilities incurred during their operation, even in preference to prior mortgage liens (which doctrine as to torts is a provision of the North Carolina statute also), and their application to improvements would be a wrongful diversion of the fund, and the purchasing company is liable to the plaintiff on equitable principles as fully as if it had been the original owner.

This matter is fully discussed in Railroad v. Johnson, 151 U. S. 81 at page 99, 14 Sup. Ct. 250 at page 255 (38 L. Ed. 81), in which case Chief Justice Fuller says: "The company was held liable upon the distinct ground that the earnings of the road were subject to the payment of claims for damages, and that as, in this instance, such earnings * * * had been diverted into betterments, of which the company had the benefit, it must respond directly for the claim. This was so by reason of the statute, * * * and, irrespective of the statute, on equitable principles applicable under the facts." That case is a full discussion of the points involved in this, and holds that the state court is authorized to try actions against the receivers of the purchasing company upon the facts similar to those in this case. It was further held therein that where such plaintiff did not intervene in the federal court and collect its judgment before the property was turned over to the purchasing company, he is not precluded from bringing his action in the state court. That decision has been approved in numerous cases cited in 12 Rose's Notes, 479. To same effect, Railroad v. Manton, 164 U. S. 636, 17 Sup. Ct. 216, 41 L. Ed. 580, which holds that an action for damages for personal injuries, brought against the receiver and the railroad company, and pending after the restoration of the property, is not cut off, by failure to prosecute the claim by intervention in the receiver's proceedings, because of an order of the court requiring such claims to be presented by a specified date or be barred. For cases citing and approving this decision, 12 Rose's Notes, 916.

In Railroad v. Crawford, 88 Tex. 277, 31 S. W. 176, 28 L. R. A. 761, 53 Am. St. Rep. 752, it is held: "If a railroad in the hands of a receiver appointed by the United States Circuit Court, is sold by order of that court, but possession is retained by the receiver, one who claims damages for injuries received while the railroad was in the hands of the receiver may sue the receiver in the state court without the consent of the United States court, and after the circuit court has discharged the receiver and turned the property over, the jurisdiction of the federal court ceases, and the state court, though, the suit was commenced prior to such delivery, has the power to proceed to adjudicate the rights of the parties, and to enforce its own judgment according to the laws of the state." This case is there copiously annotated, and, among others, has the following citation: "The discharge of the receiver, and return of the property to the owner leaves the property subject to any claim or charge legally resting upon it; and this may be enforced by any court having jurisdiction. Railroad v. Johnson, 76 Tex. 421 [13 S. W. 463], 18 Am. St. Rep. 60." This was the case which was taken by writ of error to the United States Supreme Court, in which the opinion of Fuller, C. J., 151 U. S. 81, 14 Sup. Ct. 250, 38 L. Ed. 81, above cited, was rendered, affirming the action of the Texas court and holding: (1) Whether there was actionable negligence committed while the receiver was in charge is a question of general law for the state court to pass upon; (2) that a provision in the order of the United States court reserving the proceedings for the disposition of pending interventions, and such as might be filed within a time fixed, does not preclude one having a cause of action for the negligence of the receivers from bringing his action in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Our conclusion is that the superior court of Gates had jurisdiction of this cause of action under the statutes, state and federal, and that the provision of the decree of confirmation of the sale in the federal court did not have the effect, and was not intended to have the effect to deprive the plaintiff of his right to maintain this action in the state court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Perquimans County; H. W. Whedbee, Judge.

Action by Newby & White against the Board of Drainage Commissioners of Bear Swamp Drainage District and others. Judgment was entered for plaintiffs against the defendant board, and denied as to the individual members, and defendant board appeals; plaintiffs also appealing from the denial of judgment against the members individually. Reversed and remanded.

In 1909 sundry landowners in Chowan and Perquimans counties filed before the clerk of the superior court of Chowan county a petition for the establishment of a drainage district under chapter 442 of the Public Laws of 1909. J. P. and L. A. Goodwin were signers of this petition. Proceedings were had conformable to the provisions of the drainage act, and a preliminary report of the board of viewers was considered on the 11th day of September, 1909, and the decree entered establishing the district, to be known as Bear Swamp drainage district.

The final report of the board of viewers was considered on the 30th day of November, 1909, and duly confirmed. On the 3d day of January, 1910, the petitioners J. P. and L. A. Goodwin sold and conveyed to the plaintiffs herein the land described in the complaint, which land was embraced in the Bear Swamp drainage district. Subsequently the commissioners of the drainage district proceeded through a contractor to construct the canals and ditches called for in the survey and report of the board of viewers, and plaintiffs allege that in the construction of the main canal a large amount of valuable timber on the lands of plaintiffs described in the complaint was wrongfully and unlawfully destroyed, and that the cost of removing the balance of the timber had been greatly enhanced, and that by reason of these things the plaintiffs had been endamaged in a large sum.

Evidence was introduced by the plaintiffs tending to support these allegations, and at the close of the plaintiffs' testimony the defendant moved for a nonsuit. This motion was overruled, and the defendant board introduced in evidence the entire record in the proceedings for the establishment of the drainage district, and also evidence tending to show that plaintiffs had, in fact, sustained no damage. There was a verdict and judgment against the defendant board, from which judgment the board appeals to this court.

Pruden and Pruden, of Edenton, S. Brown Shepherd, of Raleigh, and W. S. Privott, of Edenton, for appellant. Bond & Bond, of Edenton, and P. W. McMullan, of Hertford, for appellees.

BROWN, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] Upon the foregoing facts we are of opinion that this action was improvidently brought, and should be dismissed. There is no contention that the Drainage Act of 1909 is obnoxious to either the state or the federal Constitution. This question was settled by our decision in Sanderlin v. Luken, 152 N. C. 738, 68 S. E. 225.

[2] But, conceding the validity of the law, plaintiffs maintain that there has been no compliance with its provisions, and that the board of drainage commissioners were trespassers upon their lands. If, by this charge, plaintiffs mean to challenge the existence of a lawful drainage district, then they are in the anomalous position of insisting upon a judgment against a body corporate that does not, in fact, exist. If the defendant board was without authority in entering upon the lands of plaintiffs, it is equally without authority to levy assessments for any purpose, and the judgment plaintiffs recovered below would be a thing of no value. But the conclusive answer to this suggestion is that a drainage district is a quasi municipal corporation, and neither its existence nor the regularity of its proceedings can be collaterally impeached.

In Sanderlin v. Luken, supra, it is held that these drainage districts are regarded as quasi public corporations, partaking to some extent of the character of a governmental agency. They are not unlike special road and school districts, and it is elementary that the validity of such districts cannot be collaterally attacked.

In 14 Cyc. 1029, it is said in the text that the legality of the organization of a drainage district cannot be attacked collaterally as in an action by it to enforce assessment. This must be equally true in an action against it for damages for assuming to exercise the rights and powers of a lawfully constituted drainage district.

In Parker v. Harris County Drainage District, 148 S. W. 360, the Texas Court of Civil Appeals says: "There can be, we think, no question that drainage districts organized under the act in question are public, or quasi public, corporations." Fallbrook v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 17 Sup. Ct. 56, 41 L. Ed. 369; People v. La Rue, 67 Cal. 526, 8 Pac. 84. And continuing, the court says: "It is a firmly established doctrine that, when the law provides for the creation of such districts by the action of any public body, as the commissioners' court, in the present drainage law, the validity of such action in the creation and organization of such districts cannot be questioned except by district proceeding in quo warranto, at the suit of the state, for mere irregularities in, or failure to comply with, the prescribed procedure."

A case much in point is Smith v. Claussen Park Drainage District, 229 Ill. 155, 82 N. E. 278. In this case the court says: "The question whether the appellee drainage district had been legally organized did not and could not arise in the proceeding for the condemnation of a right of way for the ditch across the lands of the appellant company. * * * Whether it (the district) correctly exercised such power or jurisdiction could not be considered in this a collateral proceeding. * * * The legality of the organization of the drainage and levee district can be attacked and brought under judicial review only in a direct proceeding by quo warranto."

If plaintiffs concede that the defendant is a lawfully constituted drainage district, but attack the regularity of its proceedings, again, both reason and authority block the way.

[3] The statute affords ample opportunity to every party in interest to assert his rights, and adequate machinery for maintaining them. Like a general practitioner of the olden time, the drainage act carries its remedies in its own saddle bags, and advertises that there are none other. "The remedies provided for in this act shall exclude all other remedies." Drainage Act, § 37.

[4] Section 11 of the act makes it the duty of the engineer and viewers to assess the damages claimed by any one for lands taken or for inconvenience imposed. It will be seen, therefore, that the grantors of plaintiffs had abundant opportunity to set up the very claims which they attempt to assert in this action. They were before the court; they were moving parties in the cause. If they had claimed damages, and had been dissatisfied with the amount awarded, they had their right of appeal to the superior court. They have had their day in court, and, "not having spoken when they could have been heard, they cannot now be heard when they should be silent." White v. Lane, 153 N. C. 16, 68 S. E. 896.

In courts of justice there comes a time when a man is called upon to speak or else forever thereafter hold his peace. The statute, in terms, declares that the order of the court confirming the final report of the viewers "shall be conclusive and final; that all prior proceedings were regular and according to law, unless they were appealed from." And this statutory declaration that the regularity of the proceedings shall not be subject to collateral attack is in line with the decisions of the courts and text-writers of good repute.

In discussing these drainage districts, Farnham, in his work on Waters and Water Rights, says: "An adjudication by the proper tribunal that the proceedings conform to the statute cannot be inquired into in a collateral proceeding; nor can the various steps which are taken in proceedings after jurisdiction has been acquired be questioned. That the lands in a reclamation district were swamp and overflowed, and that lands assessed for reclamation purposes would be benefited thereby, being jurisdictional facts, which the board of supervisors necessarily determine in approving the petition for the formation of the district, its judgment on those questions where all the parties were brought before it by proper notice is conclusive, and cannot be collaterally attacked." People v. Wasson, 64 N. Y. 167; Wabash Eastern R. Co. v. East Lake Fork Special Drainage District, 134 Ill. 384, 25 N. E. 781, 10 L. R. A. 285; Auditor General v. Melze, 124 Mich. 285, 82 N. W. 836; Barker v. Vernon Twp., 63 Mich. 516, 30 N. W. 175; Oliver v. Monona County, 117 Iowa, 43, 90 N. W. 510; Ithaca v. Babcock, 36 Misc. Rep. 49, 72 N. Y. Supp. 519; Jebb v. Sexton, 84 Ill. App. 45; Reclamation Dist. No. 542 v. Turner, 104 Cal. 834, 37 Pac. 1038.

A case directly in point is Oliver v. Monona

County, supra, where it is held that the failure of a board of supervisors, in proceedings to establish a ditch for the drainage of a tract of land, to award and pay the damages to the property through which the ditch was to pass, before locating it, is not jurisdictional, and cannot be made the basis of a collateral attack.

The plaintiffs, of course, stand in the shoes of their grantors, who were parties to the proceeding for the establishment of the district, as a pendency of the proceeding is noticed with respect to all lands embraced in the district.

Upon consideration of the whole case we think the action should be dismissed, and it is so ordered. This disposes of both appeals.

1. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—SALES OF STANDING TIMBER—TIME FOR REMOVAL—EXTENSION.

Under a contract for the sale of standing timber, which authorized removal within seven years from the date thereof, and provided for an extension of the time of removal for a term of three years at the option of the vendee, provided notice of intention to extend it should be given to the vendor before the end of the seven years, the vendee, to entitle it to the extension, was required to give the notice and make a proper tender of the consideration for the extension before the end of the seven years, since a unilateral contract of that kind, binding the owner of the land without any corresponding obligation or duty on the other party, and regarded in its essence as a mere option, is strictly construed, and exact compliance will be required.

2. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—SALES OF STANDING TIMBER—TIME FOR REMOVAL—EXTENSION.

Under a contract conveying standing timber, which authorized the vendee at its option to extend the time for removing it by giving notice to the vendor within the time originally specified, the vendee did not exercise due diligence, as a matter of law, to give such notice within the time required, by placing the consideration for the extension in the hands of the sheriff, with instructions to deliver it to the vendor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action by the Eureka Lumber Company against Major Whitley. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This action was brought to compel the defendant to execute a deed for the renewal of a timber contract, which had expired. On January 2, 1905, William J. Cutlar, being the owner of a tract of land, conveyed to the plaintiff the timber thereon, with the privilege of cutting and removing the same within seven years from the date of the deed; that is, on or before January 2, 1912. There was a clause for the extension of the time, at the option of plaintiff, for the term of three years, provided notice of the intention to extend it should be given to vendor or his assigns before the expiration of the seven years fixed by the original contract for cutting and removing the timber. Notice was not given until January 5, 1912, or three days after the last day allowed for giving it. Plaintiff alleges that he was excused from a strict compliance with the contract, because defendant had left Beaufort county, the place of his former residence, in November, 1911 and he could not find him to serve the notice. The defendant went to Rocky Mount, N. C., and made a short visit to Florence, S. C., returning to Rocky Mount about the middle of December, 1912. Horton Cutlar, agent of plaintiff having charge of the matter, had a deed of extension prepared for execution by defendant, and afterwards, in November, 1912, met the defendant, on a Sunday, but said nothing to him about executing the deed. On December 15, 1912, this agent was told by defendant's brother, B. H. Sheppard, that defendant was in Rocky Mount, but it does not appear that any steps were taken to have the contract renewed, or the time for cutting the timber extended. There was other evidence in the case. The jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Was the plaintiff ready, able, and willing to pay the defendant the sum provided in the contract introduced in evidence for the extension of time in which to cut said timber, on the 2d day of January, 1912? Answer: Yes.

"(2) If so, was plaintiff's failure to do so, until January 5, 1912, due to its inability to find the defendant, after using due diligence? Answer: No."

The judge charged the jury fully as to what, in law, was due diligence, and left it to the jury as an open question of fact to decide, upon the issues, whether the plaintiff had exercised proper care and diligence, under the circumstances. Plaintiff appealed from the judgment upon the verdict.

Rodman & Bonner, of Washington, N. C., for appellant. Ward & Grimes, of Washington, N. C., for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] There can be no doubt now that the plaintiff, in order to avail itself of the privilege to extend the time of cutting, must have given notice and made a proper tender of the consideration therefor, before the expiration of the first period allowed for cutting and removing the timber, and this is recently so decided in Rountree v. Cohn-Bock Co., 158 N. C. 153, 73 S. E. 796. See Bateman v. Lumber Co., 154 N. C. 248, 70 S. E. 474, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 615; Powers v. Lumber Co., 154 N. C. 405, 70 S. E. 629; Product

Co. v. Dunn, 142 N. C. 471, 55 S. E. 299. A unilateral contract of this kind, binding the owner of the land without any corresponding or correlative obligation or duty of the other party to him, and regarded in its essence as a mere option, is strictly construed, and exact compliance will be required. Alston v. Connell, 140 N. C. 486, 53 S. E. 292.

[2] The only question, therefore, is whether there has been such compliance. The court instructed the jury correctly as to what constituted due diligence, and the jury have found, upon the evidence, that there was not such diligence, and we think the verdict was the only one the jury could well have rendered in the face of the facts and circumstances. The plaintiff not only failed to show due diligence, but the evidence rather tended to prove the contrary. It is singular that the plaintiff should have been so remiss in caring for its interests, if it really intended to renew the contract for the extended period. Placing the money in the hands of the sheriff, with instructions to deliver it to defendant, does not alter the case, and was not, in itself, diligence as matter of law. The judge allowed it to be considered by the jury as a circumstance on the question of due diligence. There is nothing in the case, we think, but a pure question of fact, which the jury have settled against the plaintiff.

No error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Perquimans County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action by W. B. Basnight and another against P. H. Small. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

This is an action to recover damages for entering upon the land of the plaintiff and removing a logging road therefrom. On December 31, 1910, the defendant conveyed the land to the plaintiffs, reserving all the pine timber that would measure 10 inches across the stump when cut, provided the same was cut within 10 years. The plaintiff W. B. Basnight testified as follows: "I am one of the plaintiffs. Cason and I bought the land described in deed from Small for $10,000. About one-third of it was woodland. Besides the pine reserved by Small, there was some poplar, and a good bit of gum and oak. At the time the bargain for the land was made, and when the deed was made, both, there was a logging road upon the land. This road started at the sound and ran back, through the woods on edge of the pasture and into the swamp, for about a mile. All of the road was on this tract of land, and was built for the purpose of getting out the timber on this tract. This road was just an ordinary logging road. First the ties were laid and then the rails. A few of the ties were entirely underground, others filled in with dirt, so as to make the road level. Road was made level enough for mules to walk upon. There were two trestles, one 30 and one 40 yards in length. The 30-yard one was about four feet high. On these trestles the ties were laid on posts or piling, right close together, joining so as to make it solid. The rails were 12-pound rails, and were fastened to the ties with spikes. Ties were pinesap pine, I think, and would have lasted four or five years. At the time of Small's deed to Cason and me, there was timber upon this tract, other than the pine reserved by Small, large enough to cut, and we could have used this road beneficially in getting out this other timber. Small moved this road. This after his deed to plaintiffs was made. Tore up the road and hauled the rails away. The land was worth $1,500 less after the road was removed, than it was with the road there, as it was when plaintiffs bought it. Small moved but a few pines after plaintiffs bought land. Don't know whether he hauled them over road or in wagons. He used road for hauling pines before he sold land to me. After Small moved road, he sold me the pine timber (reserved in his first deed) for $2,000. Don't remember whether this was before or after this suit was brought—some time in July or August last year." Plaintiffs then introduced the following admissions: "It is admitted that Miles Goodwin, if present, subject to competency and relevancy, would swear that he has had much experience in cutting out rights of way through woods, similar to that spoken of in complaint, and that the cost of cutting out such right of way and laying ties and iron on it, in making a timber road, would be from 25 cents to 30 cents per yard, in making a mile of road." Plaintiffs rested. At the conclusion of the plaintiffs' evidence, the defendant moved for judgment as of nonsuit, which was allowed. Plaintiffs excepted, and appealed to the Supreme Court.

Bond & Bond, of Edenton, and P. W. McMullan, of Hertford, for appellants. Ward & Thompson, of Elizabeth City, and Chas. Whedbee, of Hertford, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1] If there is any evidence that the logging road was a fixture, there was error in entering the judgment of nonsuit, because, if a fixture, it passed to the plaintiff by a conveyance of the land, and he would be entitled to recover damages for its removal, and we are of opinion there is such evidence. The logging road was annexed to the soil, and if the testimony of the plaintiff is true, it was built for the better enjoyment of the land, and was adapted to that purpose, thus meeting the rule stated by Justice Walker in State v. Martin, 141 N. C. 832, 53 S. E. 874, which, while correct as applied to the facts then being considered, is more favorable than the one adopted by our court, as applicable between vendor and vendee, which is the relationship of the plaintiffs and the defendant.

[2] In Overman v. Sasser, 107 N. C. 495, 12 S. E. 64, 10 L. R. A. 722, substantially all of the cases bearing directly on this question are collected by the present Chief Justice, and the court there adopts the rule laid down by Lord Ellenborough in Elwes v. Mawe, 8 East, 38, that as between vendor and vendee "the common-law rule that whatever is affixed to the freehold becomes a part of it and passes with it is observed in full vigor."

[3] The defendant contends, however, that, although this may be the rule usually applied between vendor and vendee, the fact that the logging road was built for the removal of the timber, and that the pine timber is excepted in the deed, takes this case out of the rule, and that when the character of the road is considered, it appears that it was not the intention of the parties that the logging road should pass by the deed. The answer is that if he built the road for the sole purpose of removing the timber, he was at that time the owner of the timber, and if he then made the road a part of the land by annexation, he could not afterwards change its character by selling the land, reserving the timber. It also appears from the evidence of the plaintiff, that there was other timber on the land, not reserved, large enough to cut, and that the plaintiffs could have used the road beneficially in getting out this timber. The reservation in the deed, instead of strengthening the contention of the defendant, refutes it, upon the familiar maxim, "Expressio unius exclusio alterius." The conclusion is almost irresistible, that when the attention of the defendant was called to the reservations he wished to make by mentioning the pine timber, he would have also included the logging road if he had not intended it to pass by the deed.

There is error.

BEASLEY et al. v. BYRUM.

TRESPASS (§ 7*)—ACTS CONSTITUTING TRESPASS.

The entry by defendant, armed with a shotgun, and killing plaintiff's dog, chained to a stake near the porch, in the presence of plaintiff's wife, and under her protest, was not only a trespass, but a forcible trespass, an indictable offense.

Appeal from Superior Court, Chowan County; Long, Judge.

Action for trespass by V. Beasley and others against O. C. Byrum. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

The issues submitted and the answers of the jury thereto were as follows:

"(1) Did defendant, Byrum, wrongfully and unlawfully enter on the premises of the plaintiff and trespass as alleged in complaint? Answer: No.

"(2) What damages, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover on account of said alleged trespass? Answer: —."

The plaintiffs appealed.

E. F. Aydlott, of Elizabeth City, and Bond & Bond, of Edenton, for appellants. Pruden & Pruden, of Edenton, S. Brown Shepherd, of Raleigh, and W. S. Privott, of Edenton, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The plaintiffs requested the court to charge the jury that if the evidence is believed to answer the first issue, "Yes." To the refusal to so charge plaintiffs excepted, and duly assigned error. We think that upon the evidence as presented the prayer should have been given. The action is brought to recover damages for a forcible and high-handed invasion of plaintiffs' home. The evidence, if believed, establishes a forcible trespass, an indictable offense.

The defendant entered upon plaintiffs' premises armed with a shotgun, and shot and killed the plaintiffs' dog when chained to the piazza, and in the wife's presence and against her protest. She offered evidence tending to prove that she was old, afflicted with heart disease, and that the alarm and shock caused by defendant's conduct had caused her great suffering. There is no evidence in the record that the dog was a mad dog, or had been bitten by one within the purview of section 3305 of Revisal, and there is no evidence that his immediate destruction was necessary. 2 Cyc. 416. If such was the case, the owner could be compelled to destroy the dog, or subject himself to the possibility of fine and imprisonment, and under such conditions the dog could be destroyed by order of the justice issuing the warrant under said section. The dog at the time was safely chained up, and for the defendant to enter the home of plaintiffs with a shotgun and kill the dog almost at the wife's feet is not only a trespass, but well calculated to bring on very serious consequences. Perry v. Phipps, 32 N. C. 259, 51 Am. Dec. 387; Wallace v. Douglas, 82 N. C. 79.

BONNER v. RODMAN.

1. MORTGAGES (§ 338*)—CONDITIONS ON GRANTING.

Where, in an action for an accounting to ascertain the amount due under a deed of trust, plaintiff admitted there was due $436, the court could require payment by plaintiff of the amount so admitted, as a condition of enjoying a sale under the deed of trust, since he who asks equity must do equity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 1026-1035; Dec. Dig. § 338.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 447*)—EFFECT OF APPEAL—INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL.

The denial of a motion for a restraining order for want of some material averment, or because the evidence is insufficient, does not prevent the renewal of the motion; but the motion cannot be made on the same facts after an appeal from the first order.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2207; Dec. Dig. § 447.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action by D. D. Bonner against W. C. Rodman, trustee. From an order granting an injunction upon condition that plaintiff pay into court an amount admitted to be due, plaintiff appeals, and from an order granting an injunction upon the condition that plaintiff so pay into court, defendant appeals. Affirmed on plaintiff's appeal, and reversed on defendant's appeal.

This is an action for an accounting to ascertain the amount due under a deed of trust, executed by the plaintiff to the defendant, Rodman, on April 19, 1905. The trustee advertised the property conveyed in the deed of trust for sale, under the power in the deed, and the plaintiff, on May 15, 1913, applied for a restraining order, which was granted by Judge Whedbee; but he required the plaintiff to pay into court, on or before June 15, 1913, the amount he admitted to be due. The plaintiff failed to pay said amount, as provided in the order of Judge Whedbee, and the trustee again advertised the property for sale, and the plaintiff again applied for a restraining order before Judge Bragaw, upon substantially the same facts presented before Judge Whedbee. Judge Bragaw granted the restraining order, but upon condition that the plaintiff pay into court the amount admitted to be due by October 1, 1918.

W. B. Rodman, Jr., of Washington, N. C., for appellant. Harry McMullan, of Washington, N. C., for appellee.

Plaintiff's Appeal.

ALLEN, J. [1] The plaintiff admitted that he owed the defendant $436, and it was therefore within the power of the court, upon the facts appearing in this record, to require the payment of this sum within a reasonable time before granting equitable relief, upon the familiar principle that he who asks equity must do equity, although a case might arise in which the court could refuse to impose such a condition. An order similar to the one appealed from was approved in Pritchard v. Sanderson, 84 N. C. 299.

Affirmed.

Defendant's Appeal.

The appeal from the order of Judge Bragaw presents the question of the right of a party to renew his motion for a restraining order, upon substantially the same facts presented on his first application, and after he has appealed from the first order.

[2] The denial of a motion for a restraining order for want of some material averment, or because the evidence is insufficient, does not prevent the renewal of the motion (Halcombe v. Com'rs, 89 N. C. 346); but it has been uniformly held in this court that the motion cannot be made on the same facts after an appeal from the first order. Jones v. Thorne, 80 N. C. 72; Pasour v. Lineberger, 90 N. C. 161; Penniman v. Daniel, 91 N. C. 431; Green v. Griffin, 95 N. C. 50; Henry v. Hilliard, 120 N. C. 487, 27 S. E. 130; Combes v. Adams, 150 N. C. 70, 63 S. E. 186.

In the last case cited, which was an appeal from an order denying a second motion for a restraining order, after an appeal from the first order, Justice Hoke says: "While the court has held that an appeal from an interlocutory order leaves the action for all other purposes in the court below, the decision is also to the effect that the disposition of the interlocutory order and all questions incident to and necessarily involved in the ruling thereon are carried by the appeal to the appellate court, and the judge below therefore had no power to entertain or act upon appellant's motion."

We are therefore of opinion there is error. Reversed.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 10, 1913.)

LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 2*)—EXCEPTIONS—RESERVATIONS.

A grantor conveyed certain timber on her land with right to the grantee to enter, etc., within 10 years, with privilege of an extension for 5 more years, if desired by grantee. The grantor afterwards conveyed the land, but expressly excepted the timber previously conveyed, and referred to that deed. Before the expiration of the 10 years in which to remove the timber, and after she had parted with title to the land, she granted to the assignee of the original grantee of the timber the extension of 5 years as provided. Held that, as there was a reservation of the right, her grant of the extension was valid.

Action by Samuel Powell against the Fosburg Lumber Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and injunction set aside.

W. E. Daniel, of Weldon, Jos. P. Pippen, of Littleton, and E. L. Travis, of Halifax, for appellant. Finch & Vaughan, of Nashville, and Jacob Battle, of Rocky Mount, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. Mary E. Sumner July 3, 1901, conveyed to W. W. Cummer all the pine, oak, and poplar timber on a certain tract of land (duly described) measuring 10 inches in diameter when cut, with right to enter, etc., within 10 years from that date, with the privilege of an extension of 5 more years, if desired by the grantee, upon payment of a specified sum. Cummer conveyed his interest in said contract to the defendant. On November 29, 1901, Mary E. Sumner conveyed a part of said land to Solomon Arrington and the balance to Lewis Foreman; the deeds containing the following: "Excepting from this conveyance the timber sold by said Mary E. Sumner on said land and by her conveyed to W. W. Cummer by deed recorded, Book 122, page 21, Nash County Registry, to which reference is made." By mesne conveyances the plaintiff became the owner of the lands thus conveyed by Mary E. Sumner to Arrington and Foreman. Mary E. Sumner, before the expiration of the 10 years which was allowed W. W. Cummer in which to cut and remove the timber, granted to the defendant, Cummer's assignee, an extension of 5 years from July 3, 1911, in which to cut said timber, in consideration of the amount stipulated for in the deed to Cummer.

Upon these facts the continuance of the injunction to the hearing was improvidently granted. Mary E. Sumner, in her conveyance of the land, reserved the right to Cummer to have the timber for 5 additional years, and her grant thereof to the defendant, the assignee of Cummer, was valid. The cases relied upon by the plaintiff are not in point. In Bateman v. Lumber Co., 154 N. C. 248, it was held that timber not cut within the time prescribed goes with the land, and that on expiration of the time limited the subsequent purchaser and owner in fee of the land becomes the owner of the timber. In that case the grantee of the timber did not procure an extension of time under his option, nor offer payment therefor till after his lease had expired. In Hornthal v. Howcutt, 154 N. C. 228, 70 S. E. 171, there was no extension clause or option reserved in the deed by the grantor, and it was held that the grantee of the land became the owner of the timber remaining uncut at the termination of the lease. In Kelly v. Lumber Co., 157 N. C. 175, 72 S. E. 957, it was held that, when the conveyance reserves to the grantor the timber, without specifying in what time it is to be removed, the grantor must cut and remove it within a reasonable time after notice to do so given by the grantee of the land. And his grantee of the timber holds such reservation of the timber in the same plight as the grantor held it. But here the conveyance of the land reserved the timber in accordance with the terms of the deed to Cummer for the timber, which deed is specifically referred to. That reservation was for 10 years, with the option in Cummer of an extension for 5 years. This 5 years the grantor, Mary E. Sumner, granted to Cummer's assignee before the expiration of the 10 years. The grantee of the land had full notice of the terms of this reservation by his deed and the plaintiff holding by mesne conveyances under said grantee holds the land in the same plight. The injunction should be set aside.

Reversed.

GRISWOLD v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 24, 1913.)

TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 37*)—DELIVERY OF MESSAGES—DELIVERY AFTER OFFICE HOURS.

When a telegram is received by an agent of a telegraph company after office hours, it is his duty to make reasonable efforts to deliver it, and if he cannot do so he must endeavor to notify the sender of its nondelivery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. §§ 23, 24, 29, 30, 32; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Chatham County; Daniels, Judge.

Action by J. M. Griswold against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The action is to recover damages for mental anguish for negligent failure to deliver a telegram reading: "Merrit Griswold, Bear Creek, N. C. Father died at 12 today. Burial tomorrow evening church. [Signed] Oscar Griswold."

The telegram was filed with the Postal Telegraph Company's agent at Wendell, N. C., on Sunday afternoon, February 4, 1912, at about 4 p. m. It was delivered by Oscar Griswold, nephew of plaintiff, and the agent explained to him that it was doubtful if the message could be gotten through. The agent sent the message off, closed his office, and never went back until Monday morning. The message was received at Bear Creek, N. C., about 6:15 p. m. of the same day by the agent of the defendant and was not delivered to the plaintiff until the forenoon of Monday. The agent at Bear Creek was in his office when call was made for him, though his Sunday hours were from 8 to 10 in the morning, and 1:30 to 3:30 in the afternoon, and he made no effort to deliver the same or send a service message until the next forenoon. The deceased was brother of the plaintiff and father of the sender of the message. He died about noon on February 4, 1912, and was buried at the church about 4 p. m. February 5, 1912, several miles in the country from Wendell.

There was evidence tending to show that plaintiff could and would have driven to Sanford the night of the 4th, caught a midnight train on the Seaboard for Raleigh, and reached the funeral and burial in time.

The defendant moved for judgment as in case of nonsuit at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, and at the close of the whole evidence renewed the motion. The motion was denied. The defendant also excepted to so much of his honor's charge as related to the duty of the defendant's agent at Bear Creek to use reasonable effort to deliver the message on Sunday evening after its receipt by him.

The exceptions taken by the defendant bear upon only one point, and that is what duty the defendant owed to the plaintiff to make any effort to deliver the message to him, after it had received the same at Bear Creek, N. C., several hours after the closing of the defendant's office at that point, in accordance with its office hours for Sunday.

Rose & Rosa, of Fayetteville, and Hayes & Bynum, of Pittsboro, for appellant. H. A. London & Son, of Pittsboro, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. The appeal presents the single inquiry as to the correctness of the rule that when the telegram is received by the agent of the telegraph company, although outside of reasonable office hours, it is his duty to make reasonable efforts to deliver it, or if he cannot do so he must endeavor to send a message to the sender notifying him of nondelivery, and is controlled by Carter v. Telegraph Co., 141 N. C. 374, 54 S. E. 274, Suttle v. Telegraph Co., 148 N. C. 480, 62 S. E. 593, 128 Am. St. Rep. 631, and Carswell v. Telegraph Co., 154 N. C. 112, 69 S. E. 782, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 611, which have been affirmed at this term in Ellison v. Telegraph Co., 79 S. E. 277.

No error.

WATKINS v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 24, 1913.)

EVIDENCE (§ 471*)—OPINION EVIDENCE.

In an action against a railroad company for negligently burning timber by sparks from a passing engine, it was error to refuse to permit a witness, who had operated engines and had much experience in observing how far sparks would fly from them, to testify how far sparks would be thrown, since this was not opinion evidence but a statement of a fact by a person qualified to so testify.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2149-2185; Dec. Dig. § 471.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Lee County; Bragaw, Judge.

Action by E. F. Watkins against the Seaboard Air Line Railway. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

McIver & Williams and A. A. F. Seawell, all of Sanford, for plaintiff. W. H. Neal, of Laurinburg, for defendant.

BROWN, J. Plaintiff sues to recover damages for negligently burning his timber by sparks escaping from a passing engine. The fire started off the right of way and, according to defendant's witness, 881 feet from the track. There was much evidence offered on both sides as to whether the fire originated from a spark from an engine.

Defendant offered one Holland, who testified that he reached the fire within five minutes after it started, at a point the above distance from the track; train had passed about an hour previous; that he had operated engines, wood and coal burners, and had much experience in observing how far sparks would fly from them under similar conditions. The defendant asked the witness this question: "From what you saw, how far would you say sparks would be thrown from one of those locomotives?" The question was excluded. Defendant excepted.

The point is decided in Caton v. Toler, 160 N. C. 105, 75 S. E. 929, opinion by Justice Hoke, wherein the distinction between expert and nonexpert evidence is clearly pointed out and many authorities cited. In that case it was held competent for nonexpert witnesses, qualified from observation and experience, to testify as a statement of fact relative to the inquiry that burning lightwood stumps under the condition indicated were not dangerous and not likely to throw sparks any distance.

Deppe v. Railway Co., 154 N. C. 523, 70 S. E. 622, relied upon by the plaintiff, is easily distinguishable for the reason given in the above-cited case, viz.: "The answer sought was a deduction of the witness from facts in evidence and involving clearly an opinion of the witness on the very question the jury were called on to decide."

New trial.

STATE v. EVERETT.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 10, 1913.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 982*)—SUSPENSION OF SENTENCE—POWER OF COURT.

A court has power to suspend sentence upon one convicted or pleading guilty to a crime, upon reasonable terms and conditions imposed at the time sentence is suspended.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 982*)—SUSPENSION OF SENTENCE—PRESUMPTION.

Where a defendant is present in court at the time an order suspending sentence upon certain conditions is made, and does not object thereto, it will be presumed that the order was entered with his consent, if not at his request.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1134*)—SUSPENSION OF SENTENCE—DURATION OF SUSPENSION.

Where the court suspended sentence upon one who had pleaded guilty to a charge of unlawfully selling intoxicating liquors, on condition that he pay the costs, and appear at each criminal term for two years and show that he demeaned himself as a law-abiding citizen, a contention that if the court could suspend sentence at all it might do so indefinitely need not be considered, since the suspension for two years was not an abuse of the court's discretion as to the time of suspension.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 982*)—SUSPENSION OF SENTENCE—COMPLIANCE WITH CONDITIONS.

The payment of the costs in such a case does not amount to a compliance with the terms of the suspension, so as to deprive the court of the power thereafter to proceed to judgment when he ascertained that the defendant had again become a common retailer of intoxicating liquors.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 982*)—SUSPENSION OF SENTENCE—CONDITIONS.

The condition in an order suspending sentence on conviction of defendant, that he appear at each term and show that he had demeaned himself as a law-abiding citizen, did not render the judgment uncertain as an alternative judgment.

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 982*)—SUSPENSION OF SENTENCE—VIOLATION OF CONDITIONS.

Where the court suspended sentence on one convicted of the illegal sale of intoxicants, on condition that defendant appear at each criminal term for two years and show good behavior on his part, a sentence imposed at a subsequent term, at which the court ascertained, after hearing testimony on both sides, that the defendant had been again engaged in the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors, was a sentence for the former offense and not for the subsequent conduct, which only was considered to show that the defendant was no longer entitled to clemency.

7. JURY (§ 21*)—RIGHT TO TRIAL BY JURY—VIOLATION OF CONDITIONS OF SUSPENDED SENTENCE.

A defendant is not entitled to a jury trial to determine whether he had violated the conditions upon which sentence had formerly been suspended.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 134-142; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 982*)—SUSPENSION OF SENTENCE—DISCRETION OF COURT.

The power to suspend judgment should be exercised fairly and reasonably, so as not to deprive the defendant of the right to assign errors and review the proceedings in the court below; but, where the court, with the consent of the defendant and for his benefit, suspended sentence upon a plea of guilty to a charge of unlawfully selling intoxicating liquors, conditioned upon payment of the costs and a showing of good behavior at each criminal term for two years, there was no abuse of the court's discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2500, 2501; Dec. Dig. § 982.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Edgecombe County; Cline, Judge.

D. E. Everett pleaded guilty to the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor, and sentence was suspended by the court during good behavior. At a subsequent term the court, having satisfied itself that the defendant had again engaged in selling intoxicating liquor, imposed sentence upon the former plea of guilty, and the defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The defendant was indicted in three cases for unlawfully selling liquor, and pleaded guilty to each indictment at September term, 1911. Judgment was prayed by the solicitor, and the court adjudged that defendant pay a fine of $150 and the costs in the first case, suspended judgment on payment of the costs in the second, and entered the following order in the third: "It is ordered that judgment be suspended on the payment of costs, and further that the defendant enter into a bond in the sum of $200 for his appearance at each criminal term of this court for the next two years and show that he has demeaned himself as a good and law-abiding citizen." The defendant appeared from term to term of the court, and at March term, 1913, on the suggestion of the solicitor that the defendant had violated the terms imposed by the court for the suspension of judgment at September, 1911, by unlawfully selling liquor, the court, in the presence of defendant, heard testimony from both sides upon the accusation, and, on due consideration thereof, found as a fact that the defendant had engaged in the unlawful sale of liquor, in violation of the condition upon which the judgment of the court had been suspended. The court thereupon, and for the same cause, adjudged, in said case, that defendant be imprisoned in the county jail for the term of nine months, with directions that he be assigned by the county commissioners to work on the public roads, and from this judgment he appealed.

Jno. L. Bridgers, of Tarboro, for appellant. Attorney General Bickett and T. H. Calvert, of Raleigh, for the State.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The practice of suspending judgment upon convictions in criminal cases and upon reasonable terms has so long prevailed in our courts that we would be loath to disturb it, except for the most convincing reason, supported by the clearest authority showing its illegality. We are satisfied, after the most careful examination of the question, that no such reason can be presented, and that no such precedent can be found. Recent decisions of this court are strongly in favor of the power as existing in the court, when it is fairly and not unreasonably or oppressively exercised. In this case the learned and enlightened judge, who presided and imposed the sentence, proceeded with great caution after a final hearing of both sides, and we concur in his finding of fact and his conclusion that this was a proper case for the use of the power residing in him, in order to punish the defendant for a violation of the criminal law, which he had confessed in open court, and of which he had been adjudged guilty; he having shown himself no longer entitled to the clemency of the court.

Before discussing the general question as to the power of the court to suspend judgment upon terms and conditions imposed at the time, it will be well to notice the objections made by the learned counsel for the defendant in his brief and argument. As we understand, they are the following: (1) If the court can suspend the judgment, it may do so indefinitely. (2) The suspension was really, and in law, conditioned upon the payment of costs only, and, when the costs were paid, the power of the court to proceed further was terminated, for the condition annexed was no part of the punishment. (3) The conditional terms imposed render the judgment uncertain, as in the case of alternative judgments. (4) The court has punished the defendant for what he has done since the suspension of the judgment, and not for the original offense, and for which he has not been tried upon indictment and convicted by a jury. We do not think any of these objections are tenable. It would be useless for us, in this case, upon a suspension for only two years, to inquire what would be the legal effect of an indefinite suspension, as there has been no such exercise of the conceded power.

[2] It must not be overlooked that the suspension of judgment, upon terms expressed therein, at September term, 1911, was entered with the defendant's implied assent at least; he being present and not objecting thereto. This court said in State v. Crook, 115 N. C. 760, 20 S. E. 513, 29 L. R. A. 260, that such an order is not prejudicial but favorable to a defendant, in that punishment is put off, with the chance of escaping it altogether, and it is presumed that he was present and assented thereto, if he did not ask for it as a measure of relief from impending punishment. The court also expressed some surprise at the suggestion that the rights of a defendant are infringed or his interests impaired by allowing him to escape for the present the tolls of the law, by suspending immediate action and affording him an opportunity for reformation as a basis for permanent clemency, instead of requiring him at once to undergo the punishment of the law, for the offense of which he had been convicted. And we repeat that it is strange he should complain of the merciful consideration which the law thus extends to him.

The practice of suspending judgment upon terms prescribed has been sanctioned in our courts for a long time, and it seems to have been recognized in England, for in 4 Blackstone, 394, it is said that: "A reprieve (from reprehendere, to take back) is the withdrawing of a sentence for an interval of time, whereby the execution is suspended. This may be, first, ex arbitrio judicis, either before or after judgment, as where the judge is not satisfied with the verdict, or the evidence is suspicious, or the indictment is insufficient, or he is doubtful whether the offense be within clergy, or sometimes, if it be a small felony, or any favorable circumstance appear in the criminal's character, in order to give room to apply to the crown for either an absolute or conditional pardon." And to the same effect we find the law thus stated in Chitty's Cr. Law, 75: "The more usual course is for a discretionary reprieve to proceed from the judge himself, who, from his acquaintance with all the circumstances of the trial, is most capable of judging when it is proper." The power of granting this respite belongs, of common right, to every tribunal which is invested with authority to award execution. And this power exists even in cases of high treason, though the judge should be very prudent in its exercise." "At common law every court invested with power to award execution in criminal cases has inherent power to suspend the sentence." Clark's Cr. Pro. 496. In Com. v. Dowdican's Bail, 115 Mass. 183, it was held to be proper and within the power of the court, after conviction in a criminal case, "when the court is satisfied that, by reason of extenuating circumstances, or of the pendency of a question of law in a like case before a higher court, or other sufficient cause, public justice does not require an immediate sentence, to order, with the consent of the defendant and of the attorney for the commonwealth, and upon such terms as the court in its discretion may impose, that the indictment be laid on file, and this practice has been recognized by statute. * * * Such an order is not equivalent to a final judgment, or to a nolle prosequi or discontinuance, by which the case is put out of court, but is a mere suspending of active proceedings in the case, which dispenses with the necessity of entering formal continuances upon the dockets, and leaves it within the power of the court at any time, upon the motion of either party, to bring the case forward and pass any lawful order or judgment therein. Neither the order laying the indictment on file, nor the payment of costs, therefore, in any of the four cases, entitled the defendant to be finally discharged." Sometimes the judge reprieves, said Lord Hale, "as where he is not satisfied with the verdict, or the evidence is uncertain, or the indictment is insufficient, or doubtful whether within clergy. Also when favorable or extenuating circumstances appear, and when youths are convicted of their first offense. And these arbitrary reprieves may be granted or taken off by the justices of gaol delivery, although their sessions be adjourned or finished, and this by reason of common usage." 2 Hale, P. O. c. 58, p. 412. Our courts, of course, can only act in such matters during their sessions and not in vacation. The power of suspending or respiting the sentence belonged of common right to every tribunal invested with authority to award execution in a criminal case. People v. Court of Sessions, 141 N. Y. 292, 36 N. E. 386, 23 L. R. A. 856, citing 1 Chitty, Cr. Law (1st Ed.) 617, 758; Bishop's New Cr. Pro. § 1299; Com. v. Maloney, 145 Mass. 205, 13 N. E. 482; 2 Hawkin's Pleas of the Crown, p.

657, § 8. It was held in Fults v. State, 2 Sneed (Tenn.) 232, that the courts have control of their judgments in criminal cases, so far as to suspend the execution thereof on sufficient reason appearing. And if such suspension be had upon application of defendant, it constitutes no error of which he can take advantage. The courts will be presumed to have exercised such discretion in a proper case.

We have already seen that there is a presumption that the order of suspension was made with the defendant's consent, if not at his request. The record here evidently implies that the order in question was made at defendant's solicitation, as an act of mercy to him, so that he might qualify himself by his good behavior to receive further clemency from the court, and thus avoid the rigor of the law. Allen v. State, 8 Tenn. (Mart. & Y.) 294; State v. Addy, 43 N. J. Law, 113, 39 Am. Rep. 547. In the case last cited, the court said: "It would seem that it is stating the matter too broadly to assert that it is always the imperative duty of a court to render judgment upon a conviction of crime, unless some legal proceeding for review be interposed. Considerations of public policy may induce the court to stay its hand." The case of State v. Hilton, 151 N. C. 687, 65 S. E. 1011, does not controvert these views, but is in perfect harmony with them. The capital distinction between the two cases is that in Hilton's Case the court had previously investigated the conduct of the defendant, and, after finding as a fact that he had fully complied with the condition of the suspension, he was discharged, while here, unfortunately for the defendant, the court has found the other way, after hearing both sides, that is, it has declared, after hearing the evidence, that the defendant has sold liquor unlawfully, in clear violation of the terms of suspension, to which he agreed. In the Hilton Case, the court fully recognized the existence of a valid power in the court to suspend judgment on condition that the good behavior of the defendant, and his obedience to the law, be shown by him from term to term, for a reasonable period, citing many authorities to sustain the ruling by which it approved the long-standing practice of our tribunals in this respect. Justice Hoke, for the court, thus comments upon this method of procedure in our criminal courts: "In this state, as shown in State v. Crook, 115 N. C. 760 [20 S. E. 513, 29 L. R. A. 260] the power to suspend judgment and later impose sentence has been somewhat extended in its scope, so as to allow a suspension of judgment on payment of costs, or other reasonable condition, or continuing the prayer for judgment from term to term to afford defendant opportunity to pay the cost or to make some compensation to the party injured, to be considered in the final sentence, or requiring him to appear from term to term, and for a reasonable period of time, and offer testimony to show good faith in some promise of reformation or continued obedience to the law. These latter instances of this method of procedure seem to be innovations upon the exercise of the power to suspend judgment as it existed at common law, and, while they are well established with us by usage, the practice should not be readily or hastily enlarged and extended to occasions which might result in unusual punishment or unusual methods of administering the criminal law." He refers to the cases hereinbefore cited, and also to State v. Bennett, 20 N. C. 170; Com. v. Maione, 145 Mass. 205, 13 N. E. 482; Gibson v. State, 68 Miss. 241, 8 South. 329; Ex parte Williams, 26 Fla. 310, 8 South. 425; Revisal of 1905, §§ 1293, 1294. See, also, State v. Whitt, 117 N. C. 804, 23 S. E. 452; State v. Crook, 115 N. C. 760, 20 S. E. 513, 29 L. R. A. 260; State v. Sanders, 153 N. C. 624, 69 S. E. 272.

[3] There was no indefinite suspension of judgment in this case, but only for a definite time with the consent of the defendant, upon a condition which he impliedly promised to perform, but which he most flagrantly disregarded. We need not, therefore, decide upon the lawfulness of an indefinite suspension, for we have no such case. There was no abuse of the court's discretion, and this is a sufficient answer to the first contention.

[4] Nor has the second any greater force. The payment of the costs was not a full compliance with the terms of the suspension, and did not take away the power of the court to proceed to judgment, if it found that the defendant had not complied with the condition, but on the contrary had become, since the date of the judgment, a common retailer of liquors, in open violation and defiance of the law.

[5] The next contention, that the condition rendered the judgment uncertain, as in the case of alternative judgments, cannot be sustained. The judgment is certain and definite in its terms, and does not impose alternative duties or obligations.

[6] Nor can it be well argued that the judge had, by the judgment, punished the defendant for his subsequent conduct. This is a misapprehension of its legal effect. He has simply punished him for the crime he had confessed, because he has violated the terms upon which clemency was impliedly promised. But this is merely the reason for awarding punishment in the original case, and is no part of the offense for which it was inflicted. This very point was urged in the similar case of Sylvester v. State, 65 N. H. 193, 20 Atl. 954, where the defendant was indicted for the illegal sale of liquor, and the mittimus was ordered to be stayed "while he does not sell liquor," and it was held that "the enforcement of the judgment of mittimus was not a punishment for subsequent offenses, or for breach of the condition on which execution was stayed."

[7] It must be clear that the defendant was not entitled to a jury trial to determine whether or not he had violated the conditions upon which the judgment had been suspended. He was not on trial for any new offense, nor for any offense whatever. When the judgment was suspended the defendant assumed the obligation of showing, to the satisfaction of the court, from time to time, that he had demeaned himself as a good citizen and was worthy of judicial clemency. Whether or not he had so demeaned himself was not an issue of fact to be submitted to a jury, but a question of fact to be passed upon by the court. It was a matter to be determined by the sound discretion of the court, and the exercise of that discretion, in the absence of gross abuse, cannot be reviewed here.

The case of State v. Sanders, 153 N. C. 627, 69 S. E. 272, cited by the defendant in support of the position that the defendant must have been convicted of the subsequent offense, and that the record of conviction is the only competent evidence of the violation of the condition, is not in point. The court, in that case, was deciding as to the forfeiture of a recognizance given for a defendant's appearance, where the statute prescribes the method of proving a breach, that is, by the record of a conviction. It was not a proceeding to enforce a former suspended judgment by punishing the defendant.

[8] The power to suspend judgment exists, but should be exercised fairly and reasonably, so as not to deprive the defendant of the right to assign errors and review the proceedings in the court below, if he desires to do so, and with due regard to his other rights. He must not be oppressed or unduly burdened by the suspension. There was no abuse of discretion in this case, nor did the court exceed its authority. The suspension was made with the consent of the defendant, and for his benefit, and he has now no reason to complain, having violated his own voluntary promise to demean himself as a good citizen should do.

No error.

ELLISON v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 66*)—ACTIONS FOR DAMAGES—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—NEGLIGENCE OF COMPANY.

In an action against a telegraph company for mental anguish caused by delay in the delivery of a message notifying plaintiff of the death of her foster mother, evidence held sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the company negligently delayed sending the message, and that plaintiff was thereby prevented from taking an earlier train to her foster mother's home.

2. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 66*)—ACTIONS FOR DAMAGES—PRESUMPTION—DELAY IN TRANSMISSION.

After the receipt by a telegraph company of a message for transmission is shown, there is a presumption of negligence from a delay in transmitting it extending from 5:30 p. m. until noon the next day, in the absence of a satisfactory explanation of the delay by the company.

3. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 73*) — DAMAGES FOR MENTAL SUFFERING — DELAYED MESSAGE ANNOUNCING DEATH.

Where there is no blood relationship between the person to whom a message is addressed and the one of whose death the message gives information, so that the law will not presume mental anguish from a delay in delivery of the message, but there is evidence of actual mental anguish, it is proper to submit the question of damages for such anguish, suffered after the receipt of the message, to the jury.

4. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 38*)—DELAY IN DELIVERY—CONTENTS OF MESSAGE.

A message reading: "W. is dead. Come on the night train"—is of such a character as to inform the telegraph company that it was of great importance and that mental anguish would probably result from negligence in failing to transmit it with reasonable promptness, even though the company had no knowledge of the relationship existing between the parties.

5. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 38*)—DELAY IN DELIVERING MESSAGE — COLLECT MESSAGE.

Where the agent of a telegraph company did not ask for prepayment of a message, the right of prepayment was waived and cannot be urged as a defense to an action for delay in delivery of the message.

6. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 38*)—DELAY IN DELIVERY OF MESSAGE — MESSAGE RECEIVED AFTER HOURS.

Where the agent of a telegraph company actually received a message and undertook to transmit it, the company cannot defend an action for delay in the delivery of the message on the ground that it was received by the agent after regular office hours.

7. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 38*)—DELAY IN DELIVERING MESSAGE — DUTY TO NOTIFY SENDER.

It is the duty of a telegraph agent, when he finds that he cannot deliver a message, to notify the sender at once so that an attempt may be made to transmit it in some other way.

8. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 38*)—DELAY IN DELIVERING MESSAGE—DEFENSES.

It is no defense, to an action against a telegraph company for delay in transmitting a message, that the agent of the company was also the agent of the railroad company and was busy with his railroad duties, since it is the duty of the company to have sufficient employees to discharge properly the duties it assumes with regard to the transmission of messages.

Appeal from Superior Court, Washington County; B. F. Long, Judge.

Action by Aline Ellison against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This and the case of Harrison v. Telegraph Co., 79 S. E. 281, involving practically the same questions and arising out of the same transaction, were consolidated in this court and argued together.

There was evidence for the plaintiffs, Aline Ellison and Annie Harrison, that they were adopted by Sue Wright as her daughters and reared and educated by her; Annie being her niece and Aline her husband's niece. They lived in her home from a very tender age, three and seven years, respectively, and were treated as her children and lived there as sisters. In January, 1911, Sue Wright became very ill, and Aline went from her home in Jamesville to her foster mother's home in Plymouth to see her. As her condition was improved on January 25, 1911, Aline returned to her home in the afternoon of that day and arrived at Plymouth about 4:30 o'clock the same day; the two places being only 15 miles apart. Shortly after she left, Sue Wright grew worse and died about 5 o'clock. A little after 5 o'clock p. m. Annie Harrison asked Bettie Ellis, wife of Henry Ellis, to go to the defendant's office and send this message to Aline Ellison: "Sue Wright is dead. Come on the night train." Bettie Ellis asked her husband, who was employed at the railroad station, to give the message to the operator, who was also agent of the railroad company, and he did so at once. This was about 5:30 p. m. The message was not sent that evening and not until after 10 o'clock the next morning and was not received by Aline Ellison until 12 o'clock, at the time she heard the mill whistle blow for that hour. She left by the first train but did not reach Plymouth until 4:30 p. m. If the message had been sent when it was received by the operator, on that afternoon, she would have received it in time to have taken the 7 o'clock p. m. train and would have reached Plymouth at 7:30 p. m. on January 25th, and she would have taken that train if she had received the message in time. There was an understanding and arrangement between Annie and Aline that the former would wire the latter if their foster mother's condition grew worse, and that Aline would come to Plymouth, but there was no evidence that this was known to the defendant's operator, except such notice of it as he could derive from the message. The agent knew that Annie Harrison lived with Sue Wright.

The agent, J. A. Griffin, testified that he accepted the message after office hours and promised to send it as a matter of accommodation and if he found that it could be sent that evening, but that the office at Plymouth closed at 6 o'clock p. m. and he might not be able to get an answer from the operator, though he would try to do so. He tried the wires and the telephone connecting the two places but failed to get any response. The next morning he told Henry Ellis that he would destroy that message and send a new one, which he did, it being the one received by Aline Ellison at 12 o'clock the next day. He was both agent of the railroad company and operator of the telegraph company, but as operator he was not required to be in his office after 6 o'clock p. m., though as agent of the railroad company he was required to be in his office until 7:30 o'clock p. m., when the train arrived from Plymouth, and the agent of the railroad company at Plymouth, who was also telegraph operator, was required to be in his office until 7 o'clock p. m., when the train from Rocky Mount leaves Plymouth for Jamesville. J. A. Griffin denied that he knew where Annie Harrison lived. This witness was not corroborated by Henry Ellis, though the latter did not positively contradict him, but merely stated that he did not recollect that the transaction was as related by the operator. The railroad and telegraph offices were the same. The defendant read in evidence the seventh section of the Harrison complaint, in which it is alleged that the plaintiff sent the message after 4 o'clock p. m. on January 25th and told the defendant's agent of the facts and agreement between her and Aline Ellison and requested the agent to send the message to her at Jamesville, notifying her of the death of Sue Wright, and that she paid the toll for the same, but this is not important, as the case is viewed by the court.

It is stated in the record "that the court charged the jury fully on the law of the case, and no exception was taken to the charge. At defendant's request, the court gave the following instructions:

"(1) The plaintiff is not entitled to recover any damages because of any delay in getting the coffin, or casket, from Jamesville, and the jury will not consider this in making up their verdict on the second issue.

"(2) The plaintiff cannot recover any damages because of the offensive condition of the corpse at or before the burial, and the jury will not consider this in making up their verdict as to damages.

"(3) There is no evidence that the defendant had any notice of any arrangement between plaintiffs that Aline Ellison should furnish coffin, and no damages can be given by the jury on account of that.

"(4) Henry Ellis, in having the message prepared and offered for transmission, if you find he did so, was the agent of the plaintiff and not of the defendant, and defendant cannot be held responsible because of any damage or hurt suffered by his negligence, if you find he was negligent.

"(5) The jury can give no damages by way of punishment to the defendant."

The defendant, also in writing, further requested the court to charge the jury as follows:

"(6) Upon all the evidence introduced, the jury should answer the issues in favor of defendant."

This instruction the court declined to give, and defendant excepted. There was a verdict for the plaintiff in each case, and judgment having been entered thereon, defendant appealed.

Pruden & Pruden, of Edenton, and S. B. Shepherd, of Raleigh, for appellant. Winston & Matthews, of Windsor, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] It appears that there was sufficient evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant in failing to send the message on the afternoon of January 25th. It was shown that both agents were in their offices until 7 o'clock p. m.; and, while the operator at Plymouth testified that he called the office at Jamesville and failed to get any response, this was not conclusive upon the jury, and they could find upon all the facts and circumstances that no effort was made to send the message. It is a suspicious circumstance, which they might consider, that the agent at Jamesville was not called by the defendant to corroborate the Plymouth operator.

[2] The burden was upon the defendant to account for the delay, after the receipt of the message for transmission was shown. It was solely within its power to do so, and there must be a presumption of negligence raised by so long a delay, in the absence of any sufficient or satisfactory explanation. Hoaglin v. Telegraph Co., 161 N. C. 390, 77 S. E. 417. It was held in Sherrill v. Telegraph Co., 116 N. C. 655, 21 S. E. 429, that when the plaintiff shows the delivery of a message to the telegraph company, "with the charges prepaid (and it would have been the same if the defendant had accepted the message with charges to be collected), and the failure to deliver the message, a prima facie case was made out and the burden rested on the defendant to show matter to excuse its failure"—citing Thompson on Electricity, § 274, and cases; Bartlett v. Telegraph Co., 62 Me. 209, 16 Am. Rep. 447; Pearsall v. Telegraph Co., 124 N. Y. 256, 26 N. E. 534, 21 Am. St. Rep. 662. It is not necessary that we should discuss the evidence, as there was plainly enough to satisfy the jury, if they accepted it as true, that the defendant had negligently delayed to send the message, and that this prevented the plaintiff, Aline Ellison, from leaving on the earlier train.

[3] The court properly confined the assessment of damages to mental anguish suffered after the message was actually delivered to her. There was affirmative evidence that mental anguish had been caused to both plaintiffs by the negligence of the defendant.

[4] In Harrison v. Telegraph Company, 143 N. C. 147, 55 S. E. 435, 10 Ann. Cas. 476, we stated the rule to be that there can be no recovery of damages for mental suffering in such cases, unless it is shown "that the defendant could reasonably have foreseen from the face of the message that such damages would result from a breach of its contract or duty to transmit correctly, or that it had extraneous information which should have caused it to anticipate just such a consequence from a neglect of its duty towards the plaintiff." The message in this case was of a character sufficient to inform the defendant of its great importance, and that mental anguish would probably result from its negligence in failing to transmit it with reasonable promptness. "It has repeatedly been decided by this court, in cases where the relationship of the parties was not disclosed and the special purport of the message could not possibly have been understood, that it was not necessary for the company to know the relation between the sender and sendee from the terms of the message, or to know anything more than that the message is one of importance, and that this should always be inferred from the fact that it relates to the illness or death of a person. When this is the case, it is sufficient to put the company on notice that a failure to deliver will result in mental suffering for which damages may be recovered. Lyne v. Telegraph Co., 123 N. C. 129 [31 S. E. 350]; Sherrill v. Telegraph Co., 109 N. C. 527 [14 S. E. 94]; Hendricks v. Telegraph Co., 126 N. C. 310 [35 S. E. 543, 78 Am. St. Rep. 658]." We further said in the Bright Case, 132 N. C. 317, 43 S. E. 841: "The law does not regard so much the technical relation between the parties or their legal status in respect to each other as it does the actual relation that exists and the state of feeling between them. It does not raise any presumption of mental anguish when there is no relation by blood; but, if mental suffering does actually result from the failure to deliver a message where there is only affinity between the parties, it may be shown and damages recovered." But here, as we have shown, there was actual proof of mental anguish, and the case was submitted to the jury upon that proof. Not only is the Bright Case an authority sustaining the validity of the rulings in regard to mental anguish, but Harrison v. Telegraph Co., 143 N. C. 147, 55 S. E. 435, 10 Ann. Cas. 476, is directly in point, and there we said: "There is no presumption of mental anguish growing out of the relation of stepmother and son, but under our decisions it is a fact the plaintiff may prove, if she can, to the satisfaction of the jury, for the state of the mind is as much susceptible of proof as the condition of the stomach." See, also, Cashlon v. Telegraph Co., 123 N. C. 267, 31 S. E. 493. In our case there was blood relationship between the plaintiff, Annie Harrison, and the deceased, but none between the latter and Aline Ellison, and, if the relation the parties actually sustained did not raise any presumption of mental anguish, the proof supplied its place.

[5] We have seen in Sherrill v. Telegraph Co., supra, cited already for another purpose, that the prepayment of the charge for sending the message is not a condition precedent to the right of recovery. The agent could have demanded payment of the toll in advance, but not having done so, and electing to trust the sendee for the payment of it, the defendant cannot now avail itself of his failure to do so as a defense to the action. The right to prepayment was clearly waived. Miller v. Telegraph Co., 159 N. C. 502, 75 S. E. 795.

[6] The defense that the message was not tendered to the defendant's agent during of-five hours is equally untenable. The agent received it and undertook, and actually attempted, as he testified, to send it over the wires and by telephone. It did not occur to him, at the time he was doing so, that the office hours had closed and he was not bound to transmit the message. If the provision as to office hours was available to defendant, under the circumstances of this case, it was waived by the conduct of its agent. Bright v. Telegraph Co., supra; Hood v. Telegraph Co., 135 N. C. 622, 47 S. E. 607; Carter v. Telegraph Co., 141 N. C. 374, 54 S. E. 274; Suttie v. Telegraph Co., 148 N. C. 480, 62 S. E. 593, 128 Am. St. Rep. 631. We held in Carter's Case, supra: "Where a message on its face appears to be urgent, the fact that it is offered for transmission after office hours will be no defense to the company if the agent accepted it without reserve"—or, in other words, without insisting on the exemption from the service at the time. And in the Suttie Case it was said: "When the agent of a telegraph company receives a message for transmission, and undertakes with the sender to deliver it at a time not within its reasonable office hours at its destination, the benefit of the office hours is waived."

[7] If the agent was not able to transmit the message, it was his plain duty, under the law, as we have so often declared it, to notify the sender, Annie Harrison, of the fact, so that she could have taken steps to communicate to her foster sister in some other way. Its failure to do so was evidence of negligence. Hendricks v. Telegraph Co., 126 N. C. 311, 35 S. E. 543, 78 Am. St. Rep. 658; Hood v. Telegraph Co., 135 N. C. 622, 47 S. E. 607; Oogdell v. Telegraph Co., 135 N. C. 431, 47 S. E. 490; Woods v. Telegraph Co., 148 N. C. 1, 61 S. E. 653, 128 Am. St. Rep. 581; Hoaglin v. Telegraph Co., 161 N. C. 395, 77 S. E. 417.

[8] It was no excuse for the delay in sending the message that its operator was also agent of the railroad company and had other duties to perform for it. If the defendant employs an agent on joint account with the railroad company, it must abide the consequences of a conflict of duty upon the part of the agent. The contract of the telegraph company is for prompt delivery. It is no defense that its agent had other duties to attend to as agent for another company any more than it would be an excuse that it had so much business of its own that one agent or the messengers it had could not promptly and properly handle it. In both cases the defendant is negligent if it does not have sufficient employees to discharge properly the duty it contracts to do and is chartered and paid to do. Kernodle v. Telegraph Co., 141 N. C. 438, 54 S. E. 423, 8 Ann. Cas. 469; Mott v. Telegraph Co., 142 N. C. 532, 55 S. E. 363; Carter v. Telegraph Co., supra; Dowdy v. Telegraph Co., 124 N. C. 522, 32 S. E. 802.

[9] We cannot assent to the position that there was no evidence of the agent's acceptance of the message for transmission, even his unconditional acceptance of it for that purpose. It was for the jury to settle any conflict in the evidence, and they have done so in this instance favorably to the plaintiffs.

[10] Nor can we sustain the motion for nonsuit, for there was ample evidence, if found to be true, upon which to base the verdict.

The court carefully distinguished, in its charge, between mental anguish and mere grief or regret at the death of plaintiffs' relative and foster mother, and its instructions are fully supported, in this respect, by Dayvis v. Telegraph Company, 139 N. C. 83, 51 S. E. 898, and Hancock v. Telegraph Co., 137 N. C. 497, 49 S. E. 952, 69 L. R. A. 403, cases relied on by the defendant.

[11] The evidence as to the ability of Annie Harrison to purchase a coffin, and all the testimony on that subject, if it was erroneously admitted, was fully eliminated by the court in its charge, and the error, if any, was cured.

[12] It was competent to show the arrangement between Annie Harrison and Aline Ellison, before the latter left Plymouth, that she should be notified by wire if Sue Wright should become worse, not as charging defendant with any knowledge of it, for there was no such evidence, but as tending to show that Aline Ellison would have come to Plymouth on the 25th of January if she had received the message.

[13] The charge is not in the record and we must presume, in the absence of it, that it correctly stated the law.

Upon a review of the entire case and a careful consideration of the several exceptions, we have not been able to discover any error in the trial.

No error.

WARNER LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 10, 1913.)

COMPROMISE AND SETTLEMENT (§ 2*)—DEMANDS NOT INCLUDED.

Where an amount is tendered in full payment of a claim, its acceptance by the creditor is a settlement of that claim, but it has no application where the amount accepted does not purport to cover the amount in controversy, or when it is transmitted under circumstances showing that it was not the purpose to pay an amount admitted by the party charged to be due, but to make a payment on an indebtedness which was thereafter to be adjusted by the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Compromise and Settlement, Cent. Dig. §§ 1-4; Dec. Dig. § 2*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wilson County; Cline, Judge.

Action by the Bryant Lumber Company against the Coppock-Warner Lumber Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This action is to recover $829.71, alleged to be due the plaintiff for lumber delivered and services rendered to the defendant.

By consent the issues raised were tried by a referee, who filed the following report:

"(1) That on or about the 1st of July, 1910, plaintiff and defendant had a settlement and adjustment of their mutual accounts, except as to the 'Booth cars' hereinafter noted and explained.

"(2) That at the time of said settlement and adjustment, the defendant owed the plaintiff the sum of $910.85 (not including the 'Booth cars'), and paid to plaintiff at said time the sum of $900, leaving a balance due to plaintiff of $10.85.

"(3) That thereafter defendant became indebted to plaintiff as follows:

July 18. Work on lumber.....	$ 18 24
July 20. Work on lumber.....	30 93
July 21. Work on lumber.....	37 39
July 21. Car lumber, No. 18104....	236 28
July 21. Car lumber, No. 23157....	232 95
July 22. Car lumber, No. 26268....	231 68
July 27. Car lumber, No. 4441.....	228 96
July 30. Car lumber, No. 70121....	354 10
Freight advanced .....	15 00
Amount previously due and unpaid..	10 85

Total indebtedness for above items $1,446 95

"(4) That on account of the above, defendant paid to plaintiff as follows:

July 28. Check for.....	$773 01
Sept. 28. Check for.....	162 40
Freights admitted by plaintiff in evidence.....	202 40
	$1,137 81

Leaving balance due to plaintiff on above..... $ 309 14

"(5) That as to the 'Booth cars,' defendant owes plaintiff therefor the sum of $340.95. As to these cars, the referee finds in connection therewith that these cars, not containing the quality of lumber ordered and bought by defendant of plaintiff, plaintiff agreed with defendant that they might sell same to the best advantage they could, and pay the net proceeds thereof to plaintiff, and the referee finds the net proceeds thereof to be $340.95, and this sum is now due by defendant to plaintiff on account thereof.

"Conclusions of Law.

"(1) That the check of September 28, 1910, from defendant to plaintiff for $162.40, was in full settlement of all sums due by defendant to plaintiff (except the 'Booth cars') to that date, and, being accepted by plaintiff, was, as a matter of law, full payment as stated. Aydlott v. Brown, 153 N. C. 334, 69 S. E. 243, and citations.

"(2) That defendant is indebted to plaintiff only for the sum of $340.95, the net proceeds of the 'Booth cars,' with interest thereon and costs."

The check for $162.40, referred to in the first conclusion of law, and which is the payment referred to in finding of fact No. 4, was inclosed in a letter, which is as follows: "Bryant Lumber Company, Wilson, N. C. September 28, 1910. Gentlemen: We beg to inclose herewith our statement and check for $162.40, balance due you on this statement. According to our books, this includes all the shipments which you have made since we squared up your old account the latter part of March. This statement also includes the cars on which we paid you $900 when you were here on July 1st. Of course, when we say this takes in all your cars to the present date, we mean with the exception of the two Booth cars. We paid you on account of one of the Booth cars, amounting to $150, and we applied this amount on car No. 20020, which you billed us on June 15th. This latter car is included in this statement. Kindly go over this statement very carefully, and if same does not agree with your books, advise us, and we will take the matter up with you later. Yours truly, Coppock-Warner Lumber Company." The statement referred to in said letter was not inclosed in the letter, nor was there any evidence that the books mentioned therein included the items in finding of fact No. 3.

The plaintiff excepted to the first conclusion of law, which was sustained, and the defendant excepted and appealed from the judgment rendered.

Finch & Connor, of Wilson, for appellant. Daniels & Swindell and W. A. Lucas, all of Wilson, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. So far as the record discloses, the defendant does not deny that it owes the plaintiff $650.00, the amount of the judgment appealed from, but it says it cannot be compelled to pay $309.14 of this amount, made up of the items in finding of fact No. 3, because the plaintiff accepted the check of $162.40, inclosed in the letter of September 28, 1910. The principle relied on, as illustrated by Petit v. Woodlief, 115 N. C. 125, 20 S. E. 208; Kerr v. Sanders, 122 N. C. 638, 29 S. E. 943, and Aydlett v. Brown, 153 N. C. 334, 69 S. E. 243, is well settled, but it has no application when the amount accepted does not purport to cover the amount in controversy, or when it is transmitted under circumstances showing that it was not the purpose to pay an amount admitted by the party charged to be due, but to make a payment on an indebtedness which was thereafter to be adjusted by the parties. In the record before us, as the statement referred to in the letter of September 28, 1910, was not inclosed, and the books were not introduced in evidence, there is nothing to show that the check of $162.40 purported to cover the items in finding of fact No. 3, nor is there anything that would justify us in denying to the plaintiff the right to recover $309.14, which the referee finds the defendant owes the plaintiff, to which finding the defendant does not except. Again, the latter part of the letter of September 28th shows that the check was not sent in adjustment of account, or in payment of balance due, but "on account," the amount actually due to be thereafter adjusted by the parties.

We have carefully examined the record, but it was not necessary to do so, as the appeal might be dismissed for failure to assign error.

Affirmed.

LEWIS v. NORFOLK SOUTHERN R. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 10, 1913.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 419*)—INJURY TO ANIMALS ON TRACK—SIGNALS.

A railroad company was negligent in failing to sound the alarm whistle when turkeys were on the track which were seen, or should have been seen, by the engineer in time to sound the whistle.

2. RAILROADS (§ 446*)—QUESTION FOR JURY—PROXIMATE CAUSE OF INJURY.

Evidence, in an action against a railroad company for running over and killing turkeys, held sufficient to take to the jury the question whether defendant's failure to sound the alarm whistle was the proximate cause of the injury.

3. TRIAL (§ 165*)—NONSUIT—DETERMINATION.

Upon motion for a nonsuit the evidence must be taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiff and with all the inferences which may be reasonably drawn therefrom in his favor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Washington County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action for damages by G. V. Lewis against the Norfolk Southern Railroad Company. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Gaylord & Gaylord, of Plymouth, for appellant. W. M. Bond, Jr., of Plymouth, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. [1,2] It was in evidence that "about midday the defendant's train passed plaintiff's house, which was about 60 yards from the track. The train was 20 minutes late and going extra fast. The engine ran over and killed 6 of plaintiff's turkeys which were 250 yards further down the track. Those in charge of the train could have seen the turkeys a distance of 500 yards. No whistles were blown and the train made no other noise than that usually made in running. The engine did not let off any steam. There were no obstructions on the track to prevent the turkeys being seen." Upon this evidence it was error to grant a nonsuit. From the known characteristics of turkeys, a flock of them feeding on or crossing a track might not notice that the train was approaching or attempt to fly. But as when a gun is discharged close by, if there had been the sharp blow of the whistle, the turkeys would doubtless have taken to wing or have run. They are very timid, if alarmed, but they are not alert to perceive danger.

It has been repeatedly held that it is error not to sound the whistle when cattle or horses are on the track, which are seen by the engineer in time, or which should have been seen by him in time, to give warning by the whistle. Turkeys would be much less likely to notice the approach of a train than cattle or horses and would be more likely to save themselves by flight when a whistle is sounded. As already said, they have less intelligence to perceive the danger of an approaching train and would be more easily frightened by the sudden sharp blow of the whistle. They can escape, too, more quickly by the use of wings. It cannot be denied that there was evidence of negligence in failing to sound the whistle when the turkeys were seen, or should have been seen. It is true it is necessary for the jury to find not only negligence on the part of the defendant but further that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, and that if the whistle had been blown the turkeys would probably have flown in time. From the well-known characteristics of these fowls, the jury would have been justified in inferring from this evidence that the failure to blow the whistle was the proximate cause of their being killed, and that they would have removed themselves promptly by flight if the whistle had been sharply blown.

[3] Upon a nonsuit, the evidence must be taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiff and with all the inferences which may be reasonably drawn therefrom in his favor.

In Railroad v. Wilson, 28 Kan. 641, it is said: "The idea is not tolerable that an injury may be inflicted which by ordinary care and diligence may be avoided. This is the rule in the ordinary affairs of life and is as applicable to corporations as to individuals. Railroad v. Cauffman, 38 Ill. 425; Railroad v. Lewis, 58 Ill. 49; Railroad v. Phillipi, 20 Kan. 9; Railroad v. Rice, 10 Kan. 426. Although the drove of cattle could have been seen from the train approaching the crossing, no attempt was made by sounding the whistle to frighten the cattle and make them run away, and no attempt was made to slacken the speed of the train or prevent it from running into the drove. Therefore there was evidence to go before the jury as to the negligence and careless operation of the train by the railroad company, and also evidence that the heifer was thrown from the track through the result of such negligence." This and many other cases to same effect are cited. 3 Elliott, R. R., § 1207.

In Moore v. Electric Co., 136 N. C. 554, 48 S. E. 822, 67 L. R. A. 470, relied upon by the defendant, it was held that "the killing of a dog by a street railroad is not prima facie evidence of negligence"; the court saying that dogs are of superior intelligence and "are known ordinarily to be able to take care of themselves amidst the dangers incident to their surroundings. Where a horse or a cow or a hog or any of the lower animals would be killed or injured by dangerous agencies, the dog would extricate himself with safety." The use of a whistle is more necessary and would be more effective with a drove of turkeys than with a drove of cattle or hogs.

The case should have been submitted to the jury together with such evidence, if any, as the defendant may see fit to offer in rebuttal.

STATE v. HYMAN.

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 3*)—NATURE OF OFFENSE—"FELONY" OR MISDEMEANOR.

Const. art. 1, § 12, declares that no person shall be put to answer a criminal charge, except as hereinafter allowed, but by indictment, presentment, or impeachment; and section 13 provides that the Legislature may provide other means of trial for petty misdemeanors, with the right of appeal. Revisal 1905, § 3291, provides that a "felony" is a crime which is or may be punishable by death or imprisonment in the state's prison, and that any other crime is a misdemeanor. Section 3615 styles perjury as a misdemeanor, but provides that it may be punished by fine not exceeding $1,000 and imprisonment not more than 10 years in the state's prison. Held, that perjury, being punishable by imprisonment in the state's prison, is a felony, and not a petty misdemeanor, and is therefore triable only on indictment of a grand jury.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 27*)—OFFENSES—NATURE AND CHARACTER—FELONY OR MISDEMEANOR.

While the Legislature may prescribe different punishments for the same offense in different counties, and may reduce the punishment for all offenses, including those punished capitally, to an extent that would make any offense a petty misdemeanor, calling an offense a petty misdemeanor does not make it so, when the punishment imposed makes it a felony.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 13*)—OFFENSES—NATURE AND CHARACTER—MISDEMEANOR OR FELONY.

The Constitution not having defined petty misdemeanors, it was competent for the Legislature to define the offenses which should be so classified, provided the punishment prescribed therefor was not that prescribed for felonies.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 90*)—COURTS—JURISDICTION.

Perjury, being punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary as provided by Revisal 1905, § 3615, was a felony, and therefore was not within the jurisdiction of the recorder's court of Edgecombe, under Pub. Loc. Laws 1911, c. 472, providing that such courts should have exclusive original jurisdiction of all other criminal offenses committed within the county below the grade of felony, which are declared to be petty misdemeanors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 129-136; Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Edgecombe County; Cline, Judge.

Levi Hyman was convicted of perjury, and he appeals. Judgment arrested.

The Attorney General and T. H. Calvert, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State. G. M. T. Fountain & Son, of Tarboro, for appellant.

CLARK, C. J. The defendant was convicted of perjury in the recorder's court of Edgecombe. On appeal to the superior court he was tried on the original warrant and again convicted. The defendant excepted, on the ground that he could not be tried for this offense, except upon a bill of indictment found by a grand jury. He relies upon the provision in Const. art. 1, § 12: "No person shall be put to answer any criminal charge, except as hereinafter allowed, but by indictment, presentment or impeachment." Section 18 of the same article, which guarantees the right of trial by jury, is complied with by a jury trial being given on appeal. State v. Lytle, 138 N. C. at page 742, 51 S. E. at page 68. The requirement of an indictment, presentment, or impeachment is not dispensed with, "except as hereinafter allowed," in section 13 in these words: "The Legislature may, however, provide other means of trial for petty misdemeanors, with the right of appeal."

[1] The question presented, therefore, is whether perjury is a petty misdemeanor in Edgecombe county. Pub. Loc. Laws 1911, c. 472, provides that the recorder's court "shall have exclusive original jurisdiction of all other criminal offenses committed within the county, below the grade of felony, * * * and the same are hereby declared to be petty misdemeanors." Revisal, § 3291, defines the line between felonies and misdemeanors as follows: "A felony is a crime which is or may be punishable by death or imprisonment in the state's prison. Any other crime is a misdemeanor." The state, however, relies upon Revisal, § 3615, which styles perjury a misdemeanor, though it further provides that it may be punished "by a fine not exceeding $1,000 and imprisonment not more than 10 years in the state's prison." There is a palpable contradiction in the two sections, and while the Revisal must be construed together, yet if one provision leads to a conflict with the Constitution, and the other does not, we must take the latter.

At common law perjury and forgery were misdemeanors, it is true; but there was no imprisonment in the state's prison prescribed. Revisal, § 3615, is a statute which was enacted in 1791, and conformed to the common law, which at that time made perjury a misdemeanor, and the words "state's prison" were written into this section in Code 1883, § 1092. The statute which is now Revisal, § 3291, defining the line between felonies and misdemeanors, was enacted in 1891, just 100 years later, and is the latest expression of the legislative will. The words in section 3615 making perjury a, "misdemeanor," which was enacted in 1791, evidently retained that definition in Revisal, § 3615 by inadvertence, notice not being taken of the fact that imprisonment in the state's prison, which had been added to the punishment in 1883, made it a felony under Revisal, § 3291.

In State v. Shaw, 117 N. C. 765, 23 S. E. 246, the court recognized that under Laws 1891 (now Revisal, § 3291) any offense "punishable by death or imprisonment in the state's prison" was a felony, and hence that the word "feloniously" should be used in the indictment for such crimes. In State v. Harris, 145 N. C. 458, 59 S. E. 116, Hoke, J., held that the word "feloniously" was not necessary in an indictment for perjury, not because perjury was not a felony, but because the Legislature had prescribed in Revisal, § 3247, a form of indictment for perjury, in which that word was omitted; and Walker, J., held to the same purport, and on the same ground, in State v. Cline, 146 N. C. 640, 61 S. E. 522.

In State v. Fesperman, 108 N. C. 770, 18 S. E. 14, we held that the measure of punishment is the test of jurisdiction, and that the Legislature could not confer upon a justice of the peace exclusive jurisdiction of certain offenses, unless it restricted the punishment for such offenses to the limit allowed a justice of the peace. That case has been repeatedly cited with approval. See citations to 108 N. C. 772, in Anno. Ed. For the same reason, while the Legislature can reduce any offense whatever to a misdemeanor, or even to a petty misdemeanor, it can only do so effectively by reducing the punishment to that allowed for such offenses. It cannot authorize punishment by imprisonment in the state's prison for 10 years and yet declare such offense to be a petty misdemeanor.

In State v. Holder, 153 N. C. 606, at page 610, 69 S. E. 66, at page 68, chiefly relied upon by the state, it is held that perjury was "still a felony," though the word "feloniously" was dispensed with by statute in any indictment for that offense. It was further held that as to the offense charged in that case (throwing stones at a train) the word "feloniously" was not essential. The ruling in substance was that, when the statute has styled an offense a misdemeanor which is yet punishable by imprisonment in the state's prison, the effect is to dispense with the word "feloniously" in the indictment; but it was not held in that case, nor has it been held in any other, that when the Legislature styles an offense a misdemeanor, but leaves it punishable by imprisonment in the state's prison, that the constitutional requirement of an indictment by a grand jury is dispensed with. Dispensing with the word "feloniously" in no wise impinges upon any constitutional requirement.

[2, 3] The Legislature may prescribe different punishments for the same offense in different counties, and it may reduce the punishment for all offenses, even those now punished capitally, to an extent that would make any offense a "petty misdemeanor." But calling an offense a petty misdemeanor does not make it so, when the punishment imposed makes it a felony. In State v. Lytle, 138 N. C. 738, 51 S. E. 66, the court held: "The Constitution not having defined 'petty misdemeanors,' it was competent for the Legislature to define the offenses which should be so classified, provided the punishment therein is not that of felonies." We now reaffirm this. In that case (on page 743 of 138 N. C., page 68 of 51 S. E.) the court states that misdemeanors at common law were divided into two classes: "(1) Those which, by reason of their heinous nature, might be punished corporally; and (2) those that could not be so punished." It is then held that the latter can be termed petty misdemeanors, but that the former could not be so held, unless the punishment was reduced by statute to what would be the punishment for petty misdemeanors. The court said (page 744 of 138 N. C., page 69 of 51 S. E.): "The General Assembly can reduce the punishment of any and all offenses es, and leave no offense above the grade of petty misdemeanors; but the punishment must not be that of felony, for the punishment controls the definition. State v. Fesperman, 108 N. C. 770 [13 S. E. 14]. That case has been cited and approved in State v. Jones, 145 N. C. 460, 59 S. E. 117, in State v. Shine, 149 N. C. 480, 62 S. E. 1080, in State v. Dunlap, 159 N. C. 491, 74 S. E. 626, and in several other cases. In the last-named case the Legislature had made the larceny of goods "less than $20 in value" punishable "not to exceed imprisonment in the county jail, or on the public roads, not more than one year," and the court held that a statute making such offense a petty misdemeanor and putting it within the jurisdiction of the recorder's court was constitutional, for the punishment was that of a petty misdemeanor.

[4] We are therefore of opinion that, the offense of perjury being punishable in the county of Edgecombe by imprisonment in the state's prison, it is not an offense "below the grade of felony," and that the statute (Pub. Loc. Laws 1911, c. 472) does not declare it to be a "petty misdemeanor." Hence the recorder's court had no jurisdiction thereof, and on appeal to the superior court the defendant could not be tried, unless a bill had been found by a grand jury.

Judgment arrested.

Action by Edna B. Sedbury against the Southern Express Company to recover $13 and interest, money alleged to have been lost from a valise intrusted to defendant carrier for shipment from Fayetteville to Tarboro, PER CURIAM. [1, 2] We are unable to determine the questions at issue in this cause, for the reason that the facts agreed upon contain no finding that the money was taken while the valise was in the care or control of defendant company. In its ordinary acceptance, a judgment is the conclusion of the law upon facts admitted or in some way established, and, without this essential fact, the court is not in a position to make final decision on the rights of the parties. Bryant v. Insurance Company, 147 N. C. 181, 60 S. E. 983. The cause will be remanded, that the determinative facts may be established. The costs will be equally divided between the parties.

WARRICK v. TAYLOR.

1. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—TIMBER DEED—RIGHTS CONVEYED.

Plaintiff conveyed all the pine and oak timber of certain dimensions on a tract of land to defendant's intestate by deed dated June 20, 1899, under which the right to remove the timber expired June 20, 1906. Intestate contemporaneously executed a written license authorizing plaintiff to cut scattering pine timber on 2½ acres of the land, and on November 7, 1901, conveyed "all the standing timber" on the land to C. On July 9, 1902, plaintiff executed a deed to C., confirming the original conveyance of the timber, and extending the right to cut and remove the same to June 20, 1908, and during the period as so extended C. cut and removed all the timber, including the scattering pine on the 2½ acres covered by the license. Held that, since all the timber was cut and removed by C. after the time limit in the deed from plaintiff to intestate and from him to C. had expired, C.'s authority to cut the timber rested on plaintiff's deed to C., and, intestate never having cut any timber from the land, his personal representative was not liable for the cutting of the scattering timber, on the theory that intestate's conveyance to C. included the timber reserved by the license.

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 108*)—GRANT BY SUPREME COURT.

The Supreme Court will grant a new trial for newly discovered evidence only where it is very probable that substantial injustice has been done by reason of the unavoidable failure to produce the evidence at the trial, and it also appears probable that on a new trial a different result will be reached and right prevail.

Appeal from Superior Court, Northampton County; Cooke, Judge.

Action by H. T. Warrick against Mollie L. Taylor, as administratrix of L. L. Taylor, deceased. From a judgment of nonsuit on plaintiff's first cause of action, he appeals, and moves for a new trial on the second cause of action for newly discovered evidence. Judgment affirmed, and motion denied.

W. H. S. Burgwyn, of Woodland, and Mason, Worrell & Long, of Jackson, for appellant. Peebles & Peebles and Gay & Midgett, of Jackson, for appellee.

BROWN, J. [1] The facts pertinent to the first cause of action are these: Plaintiff conveyed to L. L. Taylor, the intestate, by deed dated June 20, 1899, all the pine and oak timber of certain dimensions on a tract of land, to be cut and removed within seven years. This deed was duly recorded July 22, 1899. The said Taylor then gave to the plaintiff the following paper: "I, L. L. Taylor, do hereby give H. T. Warrick permission to cut the scattering pine timber on the hill on 2½ acres of his land lying on the southeast corner of his house, where he has been cutting cordwood, near a pond or drain in said woods. L. L. Taylor. Witness: J. L. Harris." This was recorded April 4, 1913. On November 7, 1901, L. L. Taylor conveyed all said standing timber to the Camp Manufacturing Company by deed recorded January 7, 1902. Under the deed from plaintiff to Taylor, the time within which the timber must be cut and removed expired June 20, 1906; but on July 9, 1902, the plaintiff executed a deed to the Camp Manufacturing Company, confirming the original conveyance, and conferring upon said company the right to cut and remove all the timber until June 20, 1908. This deed was recorded July 19, 1902. During the extended period of two years, between June 20, 1906, and June 20, 1908, the Camp Company cut and removed all the said timber, including "the scattering pine timber on the hill on 2½ acres," described in the paper writing given by Taylor to Warrick, supra, numbering some 19 sticks.

Upon these facts, the motion to nonsuit was properly sustained. The evidence shows that all the timber was cut and removed by the Camp Manufacturing Company after the time limit in the deed from plaintiff to Taylor and Taylor to Camp had expired. None of it was cut by the defendant's intestate, Taylor. The authority of Camp to cut the timber was plaintiff's deed to Camp, dated July 9, 1902, extending the time authorizing the cutting for two years. Had plaintiff not executed this instrument, all the timber, including the "scattering pine timber on the hill," would have reverted to him. It is difficult to conceive, upon this state of facts, why plaintiff should recover against Taylor.

[2] There is no assignment of error by the plaintiff as to anything that occurred at the trial of his second cause of action, and he relies solely upon his motion for a new trial for alleged newly discovered testimony as to said second cause of action, which said motion is made for the first time in this court. Motions for a new trial, founded upon alleged newly-discovered evidence, are carefully scrutinized, and we are not disposed to grant them, except for substantial cause, in cases that come strictly within the established rules of law applicable to them. Simmons v. Mann, 92 N. C. 16. This court will not grant a new trial for newly-discovered evidence for light causes and considerations. It will do so only in cases where it is very probable that substantial injustice has been done by reason of the unavoidable failure to produce the evidence on the trial, and when also it is probable that upon a new trial a different result will be reached and the right will prevail. Evidence merely cumulative is generally considered as insufficient. Simmons v. Mann, supra.

We have examined carefully the affidavits in support of the motion, and the same is denied.

The judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

AREY DISTILLING CO. v. MUTUAL AID BANKING CO. et al.

1. TRIAL (§ 141*)—DIRECTED VERDICT—WHEN PROPER.

In an action against a banking company to recover the amount of drafts collected by it for plaintiff, where the testimony of plaintiff's former bookkeeper as to the amount not remitted or accounted for was not controverted or denied, and there was no attempt to impeach him by cross-examination, plaintiff was entitled to a directed verdict for such amount.

2. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 165*)—COLLECTIONS—LIABILITY—ILLEGAL TRANSACTIONS.

That drafts collected by a bank for plaintiff were for shipments of liquor did not defeat plaintiff's right to recover from the bank the amount collected, since, where an agent receives money to his principal's use, it is immaterial whether it was paid on a legal or illegal contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. §§ 571-573, 583-585; Dec. Dig. § 165.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Long, Judge.

Action by the Arey Distilling Company against the Mutual Aid Banking Company and others. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. New trial ordered.

Civil action tried at February term, 1913, upon this issue: "What part of the amount collected and received by the defendants to the use of the plaintiff have defendants failed to account for and pay over to the plaintiff? Answer: $108.05."

Upon this trial before the jury, plaintiff offered the witness E. A. Allenach, who testified: "I was bookkeeper for D. L. Aray Distilling Company, but am not with them now. The total amount of drafts sent by plaintiff to defendants in this case amount to $11,105.50. Of that amount, including such drafts as defendants returned, the sum of $10,528.45 was remitted or accounted for; the difference between the two items being $577.05. These transactions occurred in 1910. I have been through and over the drafts and bills which were introduced in evidence before the referee, and they show a balance due by defendants to plaintiff of $518.05. This amount does not correspond with the amount shown in the other statement, for the reason that it did not include the draft on J. W. Stallings and New Bern Pottery Company. The balance due by defendants to plaintiff is $577.05."

Plaintiff also offered in evidence the drafts and statements referred to by the witness. No other evidence was introduced by plaintiff or defendants. Plaintiff requested the court to charge the jury that, if they found the facts to be as testified to, they should answer the issue, "$577.05, with interest." The court declined to give this instruction, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Small, MacLean & Bryan, of Washington, N. C., for appellant.

BROWN, J. [1] The plaintiff, a manufacturer of distilled whiskies, located in the city of Baltimore, Md., shipped whisky to parties living in the city of New Bern, N. C., and sent drafts with bills of lading attached to the defendant in New Bern for collection. This suit was brought by plaintiff to recover from the defendants the balance of the money which they had collected, but not remitted to plaintiff. A compulsory reference was ordered at the May term, 1911, to which plaintiff excepted, and to the report of the referee plaintiff again excepted, and demanded a jury trial. The referee reported that defendants had in their hands a balance due plaintiff of $108.55, but that plaintiff could not recover same, because the transaction was immoral. Upon the trial in the superior court, plaintiff offered evidence that the total amount of drafts sent by plaintiff to defendants was $11,105.50, of which $10,528.45, including drafts returned, was remitted or accounted for, leaving a balance due of $577.05. This evidence was not controverted or denied in any way. The testimony of Allenach, the only witness introduced, was not even attempted to be impeached by cross-examination. His honor erred in refusing the prayer.

[2] It is immaterial that the drafts collected by defendant bank for plaintiff as its agent were drawn on persons to whom plaintiff had shipped liquor. The defendant was not so highly moral that it refused to collect and receive such money. Having collected it, the law will not allow the defendant to appropriate it to its own use. State v. Fisher, 77 S. E. 121; Jewelry Co. v. Joyner, 159 N. C. 644, 75 S. E. 993. This subject is fully discussed in this last case, and the leading authorities are collected and cited, universally holding, in the language of Justice Buller in Farmer v. Russell, 1 Bos. & P. 296: "When it appeared that the agent had received money to the plaintiff's use, it is immaterial whether the money was paid on a legal or illegal contract."

New trial.

1. WILLS (§ 292*)—PROBATE PROCEEDINGS — ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

3. WILLS (§ 123*)—EXECUTION—ATTESTATION BY WITNESSES.

While the testator must sign a will in the presence of two witnesses, who must in his presence sign as attesting witnesses, it is not necessary that he must see the paper at the instant that the witnesses sign, if they are in such a position that he could see them sign, if he so desired.

5. WILLS (§ 52*)—PROCEEDINGS FOR PROBATE — BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where it is shown that a will was properly executed, the law presumes that the testator had the power to make it, and the burden is on the caveators to show lack of mental capacity, and, if the jury are not satisfied that the testator lacked mental capacity, they must find such capacity in accordance with such presumption.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 101-110; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Whedbee, Judge.

Issue of deviavit vel non upon a caveat filed by V. R. Cherry and others to an alleged will of Alonza Cherry. From a judgment in favor of the propounders, the caveators appeal. Affirmed.

Just before charging as complained of in exceptions 5 and 7, the court charged that the burden was on the propounder to satisfy the jury as to the formal execution of the will; that she must satisfy them that deceased either signed the will himself, or made his mark to it, that he made it in the presence of two witnesses, and that they in his presence and in the presence of each other, at his request, signed their names as attesting witnesses.

The paper propounded contains the following: "I give and bequeath to my wife, Claudia Cherry, all of my property of every description, personal, real and mixed, except such as I may inherit from my father's estate, which will go to my half brothers and sisters." The testator had no half brothers and sisters, but had three brothers of the whole blood and one half-sister, who are the caveators. The propounders are M. G. Singleton and wife, Claudia, nee Cherry. The testator could read and write, but his signature appears by mark. The paper was dictated by Mr. Burbank and written by the witness Stancill away from the testator's presence and hearing, and was a few hours before his death, which followed an illness of several months' duration. Caveators alleged that said paper was not valid as a will, because (1) it was not attested and declared in the form prescribed by law; (2) the testator lacked the necessary mental as well as physical capacity to make a will, and (3) it was procured by undue influence. The jury found for the propounders, and the caveators appealed.

(1) Exceptions 1, 2, and 3. Caveators offered to prove that the propounders were not only claiming under the paper offered for probate the Willey Cherry place and all personal property of the deceased, but that they were also claiming the land on which R. C. Cherry lived, and referred to in the will as "his father's estate," and offered to introduce the deeds for said land. The court excluded this evidence, and the caveators excepted, assigning the same as error.

(2) Exceptions 4. Caveators further offered to prove by Mrs. Singleton, the propounder, on her cross-examination, and by Macon Cherry, one of the caveators and brother of Alonza, that the said Macon Cherry had paid Dr. S. T. Nicholson for attending his brother, and had also paid for the monument to his brother's grave. The court excluded this evidence, and the caveators excepted, assigning the same as error.

(3) Exceptions 5 and 7. Upon the question of the formal execution of the will, the court charged the jury: "When I say 'in his presence' I do not mean that he must have necessarily seen the paper at the instant, and attested the signature. I mean by 'in his presence' in such a position that he could have seen them do it, if he so desired. I do not mean that he should have called them, and said, 'Come here and sign your name as a witness to my will,' but she must satisfy you that it was done under such circumstances as he intended the paper writing that he signed to take effect as his will." Caveators excepted to this instruction, and assigned the same as error, upon the ground that it is erroneous in law, and is not justified by the evidence. Exception 7 is substantially to the same effect.

(4) Exceptions 6 and 8. Upon the question of execution, as she also upon the question of testamentary capacity and burden of proof, the court charged the jury: "If you are satisfied from this evidence, by its greater weight, that Alonza Cherry signed this paper writing in the presence of Mr. Parvin and Mr. Stancill, and that they signed their names as attesting witnesses in the presence of each other, bearing in mind what I have defined as the meaning 'at his request' and 'in his presence,' then upon that phase the propounders would have met the proof, and nothing else appearing it would be his will because the law presumes that every man has the power to make a will. Therefore, if you find that the will was executed as I have charged you, then the burden shifts to the caveators to satisfy you that he did not have sufficient mental capacity to execute a will at the time this paper writing purports to have been executed"—and that: "If you are not satisfied that he lacked mental capacity, but are satisfied that it was executed according to the forms of law, the law presumes that he had the mental capacity, and you will answer it, 'Yes.'" To these instructions caveators excepted, and assign the same as error, upon the ground that they are erroneous in law and contrary to the evidence.

Small, MacLean & Bryan, of Washington, N. C., for appellants. Ward & Grimes, of Washington, N. C., for appellees.

PER CURIAM. [1-5] We have examined the record and the four assignments of error, and are unable to find any error which necessitates another trial.

The case was made to turn upon the due execution of the will and the mental capacity of the testator. In his rulings his honor followed the well-settled decisions of this court. No error.

1. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 45*) — DEGREE OF PROOF REQUIRED.

Where relief is sought on the ground of mutual mistake or mistake of one party and fraud of the other, or on the ground that an instrument intended as a mortgage or deed of trust was by mistake drawn as an absolute deed, or where it is sought to establish a resulting trust based on a verbal agreement to buy for another or to set up a lost deed, the facts showing the right to such relief must be established by clear and convincing proof and by evidence dehors the deed and inconsistent with it.

2. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 45*) — DEGREE OF PROOF REQUIRED.

In an action against a wife by the children of her husband for relief against a deed to defendant from a third person, on the ground that the land was purchased by the husband and deeded to her as a result of her fraud and undue influence, plaintiffs were required to establish the issue submitted only by the greater weight of the evidence, since the action was not to correct the deed as made by the third person nor to establish any claim as against him, but to correct it as to the name of the grantee therein on the ground that its execution was obtained by fraud or undue influence of such grantee, and the allegations of fraud need be proved only so as to produce a belief of their truth in the minds of the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Edgecombe County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by Dock Lamm and others against Florence Lamm and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and the defendant H. B. Hinton appeals. Affirmed.

The action was instituted by plaintiffs, the heirs at law and children by a former wife of Matthew T. Lamm; that their mother having died, the father intermarried with defendant Florence Lamm, and on December 21, 1908, said Matthew Lamm, having sold a piece of land in Wilson county, purchased the land in controversy lying in Edgecombe county from W. J. Taylor and wife, and the deed therefor was made from said Taylor to Florence Lamm, the second wife; and that said deed was so made by reason of the fraud and undue influence exercised by said Florence. The allegations were denied by defendant. After action commenced and complaint and answer filed, fully describing the land, defendant Florence sold and conveyed the land to George T. Dawes, to wit, in January, 1912, and thereafter and pending the controversy, said Dawes sold and conveyed it to H. B. Hinton, who was made party and filed his answer asserting ownership of the property in December, 1912. The jury rendered the following verdict: "Did Florence Lamm by undue influence and fraud induce her husband, Matthew T. Lamm, to have deed from W. J. Taylor and wife made to her? Answer: Yes."

E. B. Grantham, M. V. Barnhill, and T. T. Thorne, all of Rocky Mount, for appellant. Finch & Connor, of Wilson, and Gilliam & Gilliam, of Scottsville, Ky., for appellees.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). In Harding v. Long, 103 N. C. 11, 9 S. E. 445, 14 Am. St. Rep. 775, Associate Justice Avery, delivering the opinion, classifies cases of this kind in reference to the degree of proof required to establish the determinative issues as follows:

"The rule governing the quantum and quality of proof required to sustain allegations of fraud, undue influence and mistake, in the execution of written instruments, and to establish resulting trusts, is as follows:

[1] "(1) In cases in which relief is sought on the ground of mutual mistake, mistake of one party, and fraud on the part of the other, or that a deed was drawn by mistake an absolute deed, when it was intended as a mortgage or deed of trust, or it is sought to establish a resulting trust, based on a verbal agreement to buy for another, or to set up a lost deed, in all these cases such allegations, of the party seeking relief, as are necessary to show his right to it, must be established by clear and convincing proof; and evidence dehors the deed and inconsistent with it must be shown.

[2] "(2) But where it is sought to have a deed declared void because its execution was obtained by false and fraudulent representations or undue influence, or because it was executed with intent to hinder, delay, or defeat creditors, the allegations material to establish the fraud must be proven so as to produce belief of their truth in the minds of the jury, or so as to satisfy the jury of their truth, or to the satisfaction of the jury."

The case before us comes within the second of these classifications, and the court committed no error in holding that plaintiffs were only required to establish the issue submitted by the greater weight of the evidence. It is true that the judgment declares Hinton the holder of the legal title, in trust for the claimants, and directs him to convey; but this was not to correct the deed as made by Taylor nor to establish any claim as against him, but the rights of these parties accrued by reason of the fraud and undue influence on the part of the defendant Florence. That was the determinative question involved in the issue, and the judgment was the correct method of establishing the right of plaintiffs as against said Florence, the beneficiary of the fraudulent deed, and this, as we have seen, may be properly shown by the greater weight of the evidence.

[3] The objection to the rulings of the court as to the admission of testimony are without merit. They were chiefly facts and circumstances in the association between Matthew Lamm and the defendant Florence, his wife, and, tending as they did to show the extent of her influence over him and the objectionable means by which they were acquired, were all part of the res gestæ or relevant facts in the res gestæ and were very properly admitted. Fraley v. Fraley, 150 N. C. 501, 64 S. E. 381.

[4] Defendant Hinton and his immediate grantor, Dawes, having bought and received their title pending the controversy and after complaint filed fully describing the property situate in the same county, hold the same subject to the results of the suit. Lee v. Giles, 161 N. C. 548, 77 S. E. 852; Arrington v. Arrington, 114 N. C. 151, 19 S. E. 351.

There is no error in the record; and the judgment entered is affirmed.

No error.

SPENCER v. SPENCER et al.

1. WILLS (§ 269*)—PROBATE OF CODICIL—NOTICE OF APPLICATION—"CODICIL."

Revisal 1905, § 3123, providing that, if the executor does not probate the will within 60 days after testator's death, then any devisee or legatee, or any person interested in the estate, may make application upon 10 days' notice to the executor, applies to the probate of a codicil as much as to a will, since a codicil is a supplement or addition to a will and a part thereof; hence the probate of a codicil by a legatee named therein, more than a year after the probate of the original will by the executor, without the required notice to the executor, was void.

2. WILLS (§ 99*)—CODICIL.

A letter written by testator to his brother immediately after he had executed his will and just before his departure on a European trip, in which he stated: "If I die I want you to have your part of the five thousand insurance I took out for Spencer Bros. I have written to Bro. George to see that you get it"—was not a codicil because not made animo testandi.

3. WILLS (§ 6*)—PROPERTY SUBJECT—INTEREST OF PARTNERS IN PARTNERSHIP PROPERTY.

A partner cannot bequeath or devise his undivided interest in any specific article belonging to the firm, since each has a joint interest in the whole but not a separate interest in any particular part of the partnership property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action by A. G. Spencer against Geo. A. Spencer and another. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The action is brought to recover one-sixth of an insurance policy for $5,000, payable to a copartnership known as Spencer Bros., of Washington, N. C., composed of George A. and Jones Spencer. At one time the plaintiff owned a one-sixth interest in said copartnership. Defendants answered denying the ownership of plaintiff in said policy or any part of it.

Plaintiff offered the following evidence: Copy of the policy of insurance referred to in the pleadings. Plaintiff offered section 4 of the answer of G. A. Spencer down to and including the word "time" in the sixth line. Plaintiff offered a certified copy from the office of the clerk of the superior court of Craven county, under his hand and official seal, of the will of the late Jones M. Spencer and the alleged codicil thereto attached as appears to have been probated. Upon objection by each of the defendants to the introduction of the copy of the alleged codicil, plaintiff's counsel stated that they had no information that any written notice was ever given to the executor of Jones M. Spencer of the motion to probate the said letter as a codicil to the will of the said Jones M. Spencer, and that plaintiff had no evidence to offer that such notice was given. Defendants severally object and except to the admission of said paper. Plaintiff introduced bill of sale from the plaintiff to J. M. Spencer and George A. Spencer, Book 156, p. 66. Conveyance from K. Eula Spencer to G. A. Spencer, dated June 15, 1909.

A. G. Spencer was sworn and testified: "I am the A. G. Spencer referred to in the paper writing which we call a codicil, consisting of a letter from Jones M. Spencer. I was the brother of Jones Spencer and came out of the firm of Spencer Bros. at the time of the execution of the deed or bill of sale which has been read. I have never been paid any part of the proceeds of the policy referred to in this case. George A. Spencer told me the policy had been paid. (Admitted only against G. A. Spencer.)" Cross-examination: "I do not recognize the firm ledger; can't see well enough to. The best I can see, I think it is in the handwriting of George Hepinstall. When I was a member of the firm we carried in this ledger what we called a stock account. That account represented the proportionate interest of each member. At the time I sold out to J. M. and G. A. I do not exactly remember the relative interests in the firm, but they were about 10 for Jones, 7 for George, and 3 for me. I think Jones died in 1909, some time in March. He returned from his trip to Europe some time in the fall before that, several months, but not as much as six. George Spencer told me he had collected the policy. I did not know about the debts the firm owed at the time of the death of my brother. Never heard George Spencer say how much the debts were. He told me there was a very big trade; that they had a big sale and raised about enough to get them out of debt. That was just before Jones died. My interest in the partnership would be about one-sixth. I think Jones' was just about as much as George's and mine put together, and George and I were pretty near the same. There was a little difference between George and my shares up until just a short time before I drew out."

Plaintiff introduced a bill of sale from the plaintiff to J. M. and G. A. Spencer, dated January 6, 1904, and duly recorded, conveying to the said J. M. and G. A. Spencer, as copartners, all the right, title, interest, and estate of plaintiff, whatever the same may be, in and to all of the partnership assets and all of the partnership property of the said firm of Spencer Bros., and all accounts and every article of property of whatsoever kind, nature, or description, wherever the same may be situated, which belonged to the firm of Spencer Bros., or in which they had any interest, including the right to carry on business under the firm name of Spencer Bros., which bill of sale also conveyed to the said Spencer Bros., all of the interest of the plaintiff, as a member of the said firm, in said insurance policy. Plaintiff also introduced in evidence a conveyance from K. Eula Spencer, as executrix and devisee of J. M. Spencer, dated June 15, 1909, and duly recorded, conveying all of the right, title, and interest whereof the said J. M. Spencer died seized and possessed, in and to all of the property and assets of every kind and description belonging to or connected with the business and firm of Spencer Bros., composed of the said J. M. Spencer and G. A. Spencer, with a provision that the said G. A. Spencer should assume and pay all debts of the said firm.

Section of Insurance Policy.

"In the sum of five thousand dollars, and promises to pay at its home office, in the city of Philadelphia, unto the firm of Spencer Bros. (comprised of Jones M., George A., and Alexander G. Spencer), its successors or assigns, the said sum insured, upon receipt of due proof of the death of the insured, during the continuance in force of this policy, upon the following conditions, namely."

Will of J. M. Spencer.

"I, J. M. Spencer, being of sound mind and good health, make this my last will and testament, I bequeath to my beloved wife K. Eula Spencer, my entire estate, real and personal property, and appoint her my executrix. Witness my hand and seal this Sept. 17th, 1903. J. M. Spencer. Witnesses: Carrie W. Cole; J. A. Jones."

Copy of Letter to A. G. Spencer.

"New York, 6-16-08.

"Bro. Alex: I am sorry you had to go under. I hope you will save something out of it. If I die I want you to have your part of the five thousand insurance I took out for Spencer Bros. I have written to Bro. George to see that you get it. We will sail for Southern Italy tomorrow, and will go up through the different countries to London and then home. Will be gone ten weeks. Give my love to Mame and Bettie. Goodbye, Your Bro., Jones."

This letter was offered for probate, without notice to the executrix, and probated as a codicil to the above will.

Plaintiff rested.

Each defendant severally moved for judgment of nonsuit. Motion allowed as to each. The plaintiff duly excepted and appealed.

Ward & Grimes, of Washington, N. C., for appellant. A. D. MacLean, of Washington, N. C., and A. D. Ward, of New Bern, for appellees.

BROWN, J. The plaintiff claims title to a portion of the insurance money by virtue of the alleged codicil to the will of Jones Spencer. The record contains no evidence that the letter offered as a codicil was ever duly probated in any court having jurisdiction, and, if it was so probated, it is admitted in the record that it was done some time after the probate of the will and without any notice to the executrix.

[1] Revised, § 3123, provides: "If no executor apply to have the will proved within sixty days after the death of the testator, any devisee or legatee named in the will, or any other person interested in the estate, may make such application, upon ten days' notice thereof to the executor."

A codicil is a supplement or an addition to a will made by the testator, and to be taken as a part of the testament, and so intended by him at the time of making it. The formalities to be observed in the execution of wills and codicils, and the methods of probating them, are for the most part governed by statutory enactments; but it is generally agreed that a codicil must be executed with the same formalities as a will, and the requirements of the statute must be strictly observed. 6 Am. & Eng. 176. We think the provisions of section 3123 apply to the production and probate of codicils as much so as to the original will, for to be a codicil it must be testamentary in form and intended by the testator to form a part of his testamentary dispositions.

The wisdom of the statute, and the cogent reasons for making it applicable to codicils, are illustrated here. In this case the will of J. M. Spencer had been probated, the executrix had qualified and executed the conveyance to her codefendant, G. A. Spencer, more than a year before the alleged codicil purports to have been probated, and she had no notice thereof whatever.

[2] We agree with the learned judge of the superior court that the letter in evidence cannot be permitted to operate as a codicil to the will dated September 17, 1903. The distinguishing feature of all genuine testamentary instruments, whatever their form, is that the paper writing must appear to be written animo testandi. It is essential that it should appear from the character of the instrument, and the circumstances under which it is made, that the testator intended it should operate as his will or as a codicil to it.

In the case at bar, the testator had made his will in New York City on the eve of his departure for a European trip. This so-called codicil is a letter written to his brother immediately after he had executed his will and makes no reference to it. It is scarcely probable that the testator regarded or intended such a letter to be in any sense a part of his will. 1 Redfield on Wills, p. *174, and notes; St. Johns Lodge v. Callender, 26 N. C. 335; Simms v. Simms, 27 N. C. 684.

The case of Alston v. Davis, 118 N. C. 203, 24 S. E. 15, is relied upon by plaintiff. We admit that it sustains plaintiff's position, but we are unwilling to follow it as a precedent. It is weakened as such by a brief but expressive and forceful dissent and by the further fact that another member of the court took no part in the decision.

If the letter in question was duly probated in Craven county, as a codicil to the will, we doubt if it can be attacked in this collateral manner. Possibly the executor should proceed to have the record and judgment of probate set aside in the court where it was made. This point, however, is not made by the learned counsel for plaintiff, and therefore we have considered the case, as it was presented, on its merits.

[3] The third and last contention of the defendants appears to us conclusive of this case. The insurance policy in question was the property of the copartnership, a part of its assets, and was in no sense owned by the individual copartners.

The bill of sale, or assignment, dated January 8, 1904, executed by plaintiff to J. M.

and George A. Spencer, conveyed to them all of plaintiff's interest in the firm's property and assets, including this policy, and it became the property of the firm as a copartnership and not the property of Jones Spencer as an individual. At the date when the letter was written, the plaintiff owned no part of said policy, as he had conveyed it to his two associates.

J. M. Spencer, in using the words "your part of the five thousand dollars," did not undertake to give to his brother his (Jones') part. In fact, Jones Spencer could not convey or bequeath by will his interest in an isolated and distinct item of the partnership property. It is well settled that a partner cannot transfer his undivided interest in any specific article belonging to the firm (22 A. & E. Enc. p. 104), and this is so because each partner is possessed per my et per tout; or, in other words, each has a joint interest in the whole but not a separate interest in any particular part of the partnership property (22 A. & E. Enc. p. 95; American Digest [Cent. Ed.] vol. 33, § 143 [c]).

It is also held that an action cannot be maintained on an assignment of the interest of one partner in a partnership claim, unsupported by proof of the dissolution of the firm, or that the partner's interest was entire (30 Cyc. 495), and that property payable or transferable to others at the death of the testator may not be disposed of by will (40 Cyc. 1050).

The judgment of nonsuit is affirmed.

PENDER v. NORTH STATE LIFE INS. CO.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1003*)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT.

Where there is sufficient evidence in law to support the finding of the jury, but it is claimed that the verdict is against the weight of the evidence, the only remedy is by an application to the trial judge to set aside the verdict, since under Const. art. 4, § 8, providing that the Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction to review decisions of the court below upon any matter of law or legal inference and that its jurisdiction over questions of fact shall be the same exercised by it before the adoption of the Constitution of 1868, the Supreme Court cannot review findings of fact in a case tried by a jury.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 979*)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT.

The Supreme Court will not review the ruling of the trial judge on a motion to set aside the verdict as against the weight of the evidence unless it clearly appears that there has been a gross abuse of his discretion.

3. INSURANCE (§ 137*) — VALIDITY OF CONTRACT — PAYMENT OF PREMIUM — GIVING CREDIT.

Where insured received the policy as an ordinary applicant having no confidential relation with the company, and not as its agent, as claimed, and the company trusted him to pay the premium, the policy was then delivered and in force, since the company may waive the prepayment of the first premium and give credit therefor, although the contract requires prepayment, and this waiver may be shown by direct proof or may be inferred from circumstances such as the absolute delivery of the policy without payment of the premium under circumstances justifying an inference that credit is to be given.

4. INSURANCE (§ 665*)—ACTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action on an insurance policy, where there has been an actual delivery and nothing else appears, the production of the policy by the beneficiary makes a prima facie case.

5. INSURANCE (§ 670*)—ACTION ON POLICY—FINDINGS—CONSISTENCY.

In an action on a life insurance policy, findings of the jury that the policy was delivered to insured and became a consummated contract between him and the insured on December 6, 1906, and that it was delivered to him and became a consummated contract between him and the insurer on May 10, 1907, were not inconsistent; the jury evidently meaning that the policy was delivered on December 6th and continued in force until and including May 10th, but that, if they were mistaken in law as to its being in force on December 6th, then upon the facts as they found them to be it took effect on May 10th.

3. INSURANCE (§ 392*)—VALIDITY—DELIVERY—WAIVER OF REQUIREMENTS.

Where a rule of a life insurance company prohibited agents delivering policies sent to them for delivery more than 60 days after their issuance unless the applicant furnished a new physical examination or health certificate by a physician, but the company wrote its agent having possession of a policy which had been issued for more than 60 days calling for the payment of the premiums or the return of the policies but not insisting upon a new physical examination, and the applicant gave his note for the first premium, which was sent to the company unaccompanied by a new medical examination and retained by it, it waived the requirement as to a new physical examination and could not set it up to defeat a recovery on the policy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1041-1056, 1058-1070; Dec. Dig. § 392.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Edgecombe County; E. B. Cline, Judge.

Action by James Pender, administrator, against the North State Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This case was before us at fall term, 1910, and under the name of Powell v. Insurance Co. is reported in 153 N. C. 124 et seq., 69 S. E. 12. Since that time the former administrator of the beneficiary under the policy has died, and the present plaintiff, as his successor in the administration of the estate of H. D. Teel, has taken his place in the record. The facts of the case are somewhat changed from those we then considered, as will appear by the following verdict of the jury: "(1) Did H. D. Teel, in his application for the policy, represent that he did not then have, and never had any habit of taking opium, or any of its preparations, or any narcotics? Answer: Yes. (2) Did H. D. Teel, on the date of said application, have any habit of taking opium, or any of its preparations, or any narcotics? Answer: No. (3) Was said representation a material inducement to the issuing of the policy by the defendant? Answer: Yes. (4) Was said Teel agent and manager of defendant at Tarboro, on December 6, 1906? Answer: No. (5) Was said policy delivered to said Teel, and did it become a consummated contract between him and defendant on December 6, 1906? Answer: Yes. (6) Did said Teel, on May 10, 1907, have the habit of taking opium or any of its preparations, or any narcotics? Answer: No. (7) Was there a material change for the worse in the health of said Teel, prior to May 10, 1907? Answer: No. (8) Was the said policy delivered to said Teel, and did it become a consummated contract between said Teel and the defendant on May 10, 1907? Answer: Yes." The other facts necessary to an understanding of the case are stated in the opinion. The court rendered a judgment upon the verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed, after duly noting exceptions to the rulings of the court.

Rouse & Land, of Kinston, for appellant. F. S. Spruill, of Rocky Mount, and W. O. Howard, of Tarboro, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). The answers to the first and third issues were not seriously contested by the plaintiff, and could not well have been resisted, but they have become immaterial by reason of the answer to the second issue in favor of the plaintiff.

[1, 2] Whether the deceased was addicted to the habitual use of opium in any of its forms, or of any other narcotic, was a pure issue of fact to be determined by the jury upon the evidence, which was conflicting. There was sufficient evidence, in law, to support the finding of the jury, and, when this is the case and it is claimed that the jury have given a verdict against the weight of all the evidence, the only remedy is an application to the trial judge to set aside the verdict for that reason. We will not review his ruling upon such a motion, except where it clearly appears that there has been a gross abuse of his discretion, which, of course, will be of exceedingly rare occurrence, and so much so that in our procedure it may be considered as almost a negligible quantity. There was no such abuse in this instance.

Under the fourth and fifth issues, the jury, by their answers thereto, have evidently found as facts that H. D. Teel was not agent or manager of the defendant company on December 6, 1906, when the policy was sent to him from the home office, and that the company did not require payment of the premium in advance, but delivered the policy to H. D. Teel and trusted him for the payment of the premium; the understanding being that the policy should immediately become effective upon its delivery and without prepayment of the premium as a condition upon which it should take effect. We cannot escape this conclusion after a careful perusal of the evidence and the charge of the court, and considering them in connection with the issues 4 and 5, as answered by the jury. The defendant offered strong evidence to show that H. D. Teel was the defendant's agent and local manager on December 6, 1906, but there was some evidence on the other side of the question, introduced by the plaintiff, and, while it may not be very convincing or even satisfactory, we are not willing to say that it was altogether destitute of probative force, but we do not mean to say that it was weak or insufficient to warrant the finding of the jury. It was some evidence and was properly submitted to the jury, and the defendant having failed to have the verdict set aside by the judge below, because it was against the weight of the evidence, must abide by the result as final and beyond our control. We can review by appeal "any decision of the courts below upon any matter of law or legal inference"; but in jury trials, at least, our jurisdiction ends when that is done. We cannot review findings of fact in such cases. Const. art. 4, § 8. And what we have said applies equally to the sixth and seventh issues. There was conflicting evidence which carried the questions to the jury, and we are concluded by their findings.

[3] Returning to the fifth issue for further consideration, we find that the court instructed the jury, if they found that H. D. Teel received the policy from the insurance company, not as its agent or manager, but as an ordinary applicant for insurance having no such relation to it, and he was trusted to pay the first premium, instead of paying it in advance, they should answer the fifth issue, "Yes," but if the insurance company sent the policy to H. D. Teel, he then being its agent or manager, to hold the policy for the company until the premium was paid, and not to deliver it to himself until it was paid, or if H. D. Teel received the policy, not as agent or manager, and laid it aside until he could pay the premium, and it was not paid by him on December 6, 1906, they should answer the issue, "No." We see no valid objection the defendant can make to this instruction. There was evidence of the facts it embodied, sufficient to support either hypothesis stated in it, and the jury manifestly found that H. D. Teel was not agent at the time, and received the policy as an ordinary applicant having no confidential relation with the company, and that the latter had trusted him to pay the premium. If that be the case, the policy was delivered and in force on December 6, 1906.

[4] If there had been an actual delivery of the policy, nothing else appearing, the production of it at the trial by the plaintiff, who is the beneficiary, makes a prima facie case for him. Perry v. Insurance Co., 150 N. C. 143, 63 S. E. 679, citing Kendrick v. Insurance Co., 124 N. C. 315, 32 S. E. 728, 70 Am. St. Rep. 592; Grier v. Insurance Co., 132 N. C. 542, 44 S. E. 28; Rayburn v. Casualty Co., 138 N. C. 379, 50 S. E. 762, 107 Am. St. Rep. 548; Waters v. Annuity Co., 144 N. C. 663, 57 S. E. 437, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 805. That the company may waive the prepayment of the premium and give credit for the same is but to state a self-evident principle, and this waiver may be shown by direct proof that credit was given, or may be inferred from the circumstances as well. Bodine v. Insurance Co., 51 N. Y. 117, 10 Am. Rep. 566. No man is bound to insist upon his rights, and an insurance company may disregard the provision requiring prepayment of the premium as a condition of imparting vitality to the policy, and agree, either expressly or impliedly, that it will accept the promise of the applicant to pay on demand or at a future day. The doctrine is thus clearly stated in Vance on Insurance, at page 178: "Even though the parties may have expressly agreed that the contract shall not be deemed complete until payment of the premium in cash and in full, this stipulation may be waived by the insurer or any of its agents having competent authority. As a general rule, any agent having power to execute and issue contracts on behalf of the insurer has power to waive a condition of prepayment. And an absolute delivery of the policy by such an agent, without payment of the premium, under such circumstances as will justify an inference that credit is to be given, will constitute a waiver of a condition of prepayment. It seems that an intention to give credit may be inferred from the mere fact of unconditional delivery without requiring present payment. Nor do the courts show great readiness to find that a delivery was made subject to a condition of immediate payment." The cases in this court, already cited, are substantially to the same effect.

The sixth and seventh issues involved matters of fact alone; there being, in our opinion, evidence on both sides of the questions submitted to the jury in them. Our remarks as to the second issue are generally applicable to these two issues. We are concluded by the verdict.

[6] In regard to the eighth issue, it was urged before us by the learned counsel for the defendant that the verdict upon the fifth and eighth issues was inconsistent, as the policy could not have been delivered and become effective on two different dates. But we think the answers to these two issues are reconcilable, if it is necessary to bring them into harmony in order to sustain the verdict. It would seem to be immaterial on which of the two dates it took effect. If on either of them, it is valid and enforceable in view of the special facts of this case. But they are consistent, as the jury evidently meant that the policy was delivered on December 6, 1906, and continued in force until and including May 10, 1907, but if they were mistaken in law, for any reason, as to its being in force on December 6, 1906, then, upon the facts as they found them to be, it took effect on May 10, 1907. It is true that there is evidence that H. D. Teel was the agent of defendant on May 10, 1907, though there is no special finding of the fact. We will assume it to be true. In this connection, there was evidence that H. D. Teel, on May 10, 1907, gave his note to the agents of the company for $69.35, the amount of premium on this policy, and it was assigned by them to the company and mailed to the company on the same day. It was received by the company without objection, and has been retained ever since, so far as appears.

[8] The defendant contends, though, that there was a rule of the company, in force at the time of these transactions, forbidding an agent to deliver a policy sent to him for delivery, if more than 60 days since it was issued have elapsed, unless the applicant for the policy has furnished the company with a new physical examination or health certificate, given by a physician. If we concede, for the sake of illustration and argument, that this point is properly raised by the prayer for instruction, the rejection of which is the subject of the twenty-eighth exception, the prayer not being addressed to any particular issue, nor any finding asked in regard to it on the eighth issue, which is sufficient to embrace the question intended to be raised, we do not think it defeats the plaintiff's right of recovery. If there was no such examination, and the rule has been established in such a way as to have bound H. D. Teel to its observance, and the policy, therefore, was issued in violation of the rule, it appears that the company, in February and April, 1907, wrote letters to their agents at Tarboro, N. C., having possession of this and other policies which had been issued for more than 60 days, and called for the payment of the premiums or the return of the policies, but not insisting upon a new physical examination. These letters were introduced by the defendant at the trial. When we consider these facts and the failure of the defendant to return the premium note and insist upon a compliance with the rule requiring H. D. Teel to furnish to it an examination as to the then state of his health, the doctrine of waiver is again applicable. The note of H. D. Teel recited that it was given for the first premium ($69.35) due on the policy of insurance issued to him. The company must have known that there had been no new medical examination, as he was required to furnish it to the company and failed to do so. Under the circumstances it would not be right for the company to retain the premium note, with knowledge that the alleged rule had not been complied with, and then, after the loss, to insist that the policy was not valid for that reason. And it is this element in the transaction that induces the law to declare a waiver of the condition or to hold the company estopped to set it up in defense of an action upon the policy. It is partly based upon the eminently just maxim that, if a party is silent when he should speak, he will not be permitted to speak when justice demands that he should be silent. He will not be allowed to take two chances, when he should be entitled to only one. If we put the case concretely, it is this: The law will not allow the company to hold the premium upon the chance that there may be no loss, and, if there is a loss, to deny its liability upon the policy. Acceptance and retention of the premium, with knowledge of the facts, express or to be inferred, shows that it elected to consider the policy in force. Rayburn v. Casualty Co., 133 N. C. 379, 50 S. E. 762, 107 Am. St. Rep. 548.

Brief reference to the authorities and precedents will be sufficient to show the state of the law upon this question: "The acceptance by an insurance company, with knowledge of facts authorizing a forfeiture or avoidance of the policy, of premiums or assessments which were in no degree earned at the time of such forfeiture or avoidance, constitutes a waiver thereof. This waiver is based on the estoppel of the company to declare void and of no effect insurance for which, with knowledge of the facts, full compensation has been received. This rule is particularly applicable where the company's claim is based on a right of cancellation and return of premiums, rather than on a distinct forfeiture." 3 Cooley's Briefs on the Law of Insurance, pp. 2683, 2684, 2686, and the numerous cases cited in the notes. It is said in Phoenix M. Life Ins. Co. v. Rad-din, 120 U. S. 183, 7 Sup. Ct. 500, 30 L. Ed. 644: "The only question upon the instructions of the court to the jury, which is open to the defendant on this bill of exceptions, is whether, if insurers accept payment of a premium after they know that there has been a breach of a condition of the policy, their acceptance of the premium is a waiver of the right to avoid the policy for that breach. Upon principle and authority, there can be no doubt that it is. To hold otherwise would be to maintain that the contract of insurance requires good faith of the assured only, and not of the insurers, and to permit insurers, knowing all the facts, to continue to receive new benefits from the contract while they decline to bear its burdens. Insurance Co. v. Wolff, 95 U. S. 328 [24 L. Ed. 387]; Wing v. Harvey, 5 D. M. & G. 265; Frost v. Saratoga Mut. Ins. Co., 5 Denio [N. Y.] 154 [49 Am. Dec. 234]; Bevin v. Connecticut M. L. Ins. Co., 23 Conn. 244; Insurance Co. v. Stockbower, 26 Pa. 199; Viele v. Germania Ins. Co., 26 Iowa, 9 [93 Am. Dec. 33]; Hodson v. Guardian L. Ins. Co., 97 Mass. 144 [93 Am. Dec. 73]."

The other questions raised by the defendant, which are subsidiary to those we have discussed and dependent upon them, require no separate consideration.

This case has been tried three times in the court below and heard twice in this court. It has been very ably and learnedly presented to us by counsel, and we have given to it a most patient and thorough examination. After doing so, we have not been able to discover any error in the trial and proceedings below.

No error.

STATE v. WHITE et al.

1. RECOGNIZANCES (§ 1*)—DEFINITION.

A recognizance is a debt of record acknowledged before a court of competent jurisdiction, with condition to do some particular act. It need not be executed by the parties, but is sufficient if it is acknowledged by them, and a minute of the acknowledgment entered by the court. It binds accused to appear and answer either a specified charge or to such matters as may be objected, to stand and abide the judgment of the court, and not to depart without leave of the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Recognizances, Cent. Dig. §§ 1-19; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

2. BAIL (§ 75*)—FORFEITURE—DEFENSES.

Since a recognizance to secure accused's appearance binds him not to depart without leave of court, it was no defense to the surety's liability that the departure of accused without leave occurred after he had pleaded guilty, and during a period of two days before sentence, while the court had the question of punishment under advisement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bail, Cent. Dig. §§ 309-312, 315-321; Dec. Dig. § 75.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 914*) — REVIEW — PRESUMPTION — GENERAL OR SPECIAL APPEARANCE.

Where, in an action on a forfeited recognizance, the case stated that the surety entered an appearance, without more, it would be presumed that a general appearance sufficient to waive the service of process was intended.

4. APPEARANCE (§ 9*)—GENERAL OR SPECIAL APPEARANCE—RELIEF.

Where, in proceedings to forfeit a recognizance, the surety entered an alleged special appearance, and sought to be released, and to have the deposit returned, on the ground that accused had appeared, pleaded guilty, and then departed, while the court held the cause under advisement for the determination of the punishment, such petition affected the merits, and the appearance was, in legal effect, a general one.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appearance, Cent. Dig. §§ 42-52; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Hertford County; Lane, Judge.

Scire facias by the State against M. T. White, Jr., and the Southern Distributing Company, to forfeit a certified check deposited by the Distributing Company as bail for defendant White's appearance to answer a criminal charge. From a judgment forfeiting the bail, the Distributing Company appeals. Affirmed.

The defendant was recognized by a justice of the peace to appear at the next term of the superior court. In lieu of bond a certified check for $200 was deposited by his surety, the Old Dominion Distributing Company. The defendant appeared before the superior court and pleaded guilty. The judge did not immediately dispose of the case; but a day or two later the defendant was called for the purpose of being sentenced, when it appeared that he had left the court and the state. Judgment nisi was entered, and a scil. fa. issued against the defendant and the Southern Distributing Company. Upon the return of the scil. fa., the Old Dominion Distributing Company, the surety, filed a petition, on which appears the following "special appearance on part of surety."

The petition sets out the facts fully, and says, among other things:

"(5) Your petitioner is informed and believes, and so avers, that his honor, Judge Webb, did not impose sentence at the time of the plea or during said day, though the defendant was in court, but permitted said matter to remain undisposed of until Wednesday or Thursday of said court, when the defendant left the court and returned to his home in Virginia, without the sentence of the court having been pronounced against him, as should have been done.

"(6) Your petitioner is informed and believes that after said defendant had been permitted by the court to remain in and at the bar for so long a time, without having pronounced sentence against him, and after defendant having left the court, as before set out, and his said bail declared forfeited.

"(7) Your petitioner is informed and believes that, when said defendant came into court, waived bill of indictment, and entered a plea of guilty, and by so doing, he put himself in custody, and said waiver and plea was accepted by the court, and he by said acts complied with the law and the terms and conditions of the said bail, and said bail was thereby discharged.

"Wherefore your petitioner prays the court: (1) That the former order of forfeiture be reversed by this court; (2) that said bill be discharged, and the deposit heretofore made by your petitioner be returned to him."

The case on appeal states that the surety entered an appearance.

Roswell C. Bridger, of Winton, for appellant. Attorney General Bickett and T. H. Calvert, of Raleigh, for the State.

ALLEN, J. [1] A recognizance is a debt of record acknowledged before a court of competent jurisdiction, with condition to do some particular act. State v. Smith, 66 N. C. 620. It need not be executed by the parties, but is simply acknowledged by them, and a minute of the acknowledgment is entered by the court. State v. Edney, 60 N. C. 471. It binds the defendant to three things: (1) To appear and answer either to a specified charge or to such matters as may be objected. (2) To stand and abide the judgment of the court. (3) Not to depart without leave of the court. State v. Schenck, 138 N. C. 562, 49 S. E. 917, 3 Ann. Cas. 928.

[2] It follows, therefore, upon these well-settled principles that the judgment nisi is regular and valid, as the defendant and his surety entered into the recognizance, and the defendant departed without leave of the court. The surety contends, however, that no final judgment can, in any event, be entered condemning the deposit, because it entered a special appearance, and it has not been served with process.

[3, 4] The answer to this position is twofold. In the first place, the case states that the surety entered an appearance, which, nothing else appearing, would mean a general appearance, and would be a waiver of the service of process, and in the next place, if the appearance had been entered special, it was in legal effect general, because the motion of the surety affected the merits. Scott v. Life Ass'n, 137 N. C. 517, 50 S. E. 221.

It is said in Grant v. Grant, 159 N. C. 531, 75 S. E. 734, that it was held in the Scott Case "that a special appearance cannot be entered except for the purpose of moving to dismiss for want of jurisdiction, and that, if the motion affects the merits, the appearance is general," and the court then quotes from the same case with approval, as follows: "The test for determining the character of an appearance is the relief asked; the law looking to its substance rather than to its form. If the appearance is in effect general, the fact that the party styles it a special appearance will not change its real character." 3 Cyc. pp. 502, 503. The question always is, what a party has done, and not what he intended to do. If the relief prayed affects the merits, or the motion involves the merits, and a motion to vacate a judgment is such a motion, then the appearance is in law a general one."

We are therefore of opinion there is no error.

Affirmed.

RAWLS et al. v. MAYO.

1. JUDGMENT (§ 478*) — CONCLUSIVENESS OF ADJUDICATION—PERSONS CONCLUDED.

A judgment in which the proceeds of land were adjudicated to be real estate assets is binding upon all the parties thereto and could not be attacked collaterally in a subsequent action, but the only remedy was by appeal.

2. INFANTS (§ 112*)—JUDGMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

The fact that parties to a suit in which a consent decree was entered were infants only renders the decree voidable and not void and hence cannot be attacked collaterally.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Whedbee, Judge.

Suit by S. P. Rawls and others against James L. Mayo. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

On March 17, 1908, L. R. Mayo and wife gave to James L. Mayo an option to purchase the land he bought of E. Tuthill at any time on or before July 15, 1908, for $6,000. At that time Mayo's ownership of said tract was subject to an agreement with Whilden Springer made May 7, 1904, and duly recorded November 21, 1907. In April, 1908, L. R. Mayo died, leaving a last will and testament.

James L. Mayo in apt time brought suit against the personal representative, heirs at law and devisees of L. R. Mayo, to enforce his option. Judgment was rendered at October court, 1908, declaring him entitled to a deed conveying said land upon the payment of $6,000 to the administrator.

Whilden Springer brought suit against the personal representative, heirs at law and devisees of L. R. Mayo (James L. Mayo was son of L. R. Mayo and a devisee under his will), to enforce his contract made with L. R. Mayo on May 7, 1904. The cause was heard at December term, 1910, and judgment entered dividing said lands between James L. Mayo and Whilden Springer.

It seems to have been agreed by the heirs at law (those of them that were over 21 years of age) that, as James L. Mayo only got a title to a half interest in the land on account of L. R. Mayo's agreement with Springer, he should pay only one-half, or $3,000.

The plaintiffs were parties to both of said actions, but some of them were infants. In the second of said actions the following judgment was entered: "It is now by consent of the parties and their said attorneys adjudged and decreed by the court as follows." Then follow seven paragraphs, which it is not necessary to set out, and then the following: "It is further adjudged that the proceeds of sale of said land to Jas. L. Mayo shall be treated as real estate assets accounted for by said administrator as such."

The defendants claim that J. L. Mayo has paid the sum of $3,000 due by him to the devisees under the will of L. R. Mayo, but this is not found as a fact. The will of L. R. Mayo bequeathed to his wife $1,000 in cash, and to his son Samuel $500 in cash, and to his son John B. Mayo $2,000 in cash. These legacies have not been paid, and the administrator has no funds with which to pay them and refuses to sell real estate to make assets with which to pay them; all the personal estate having been exhausted.

This suit is brought to compel the administrator to collect said money from James L. Mayo and out of same to pay these legacies, and it is admitted that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover if the purchase money from James L. Mayo is not personal property. The court was of opinion that the purchase money from the said James L. Mayo, even if it should be paid the administrator, would not be subject to the payment of these legacies, and at close of plaintiffs' evidence on defendants' motion nonsuited the plaintiffs, and they excepted and appealed.

Ward & Grimes, of Washington, N. C., for appellant. Small, MacLean & Bryan, of Washington, N. C., for appellees.

ALLEN, J. [1] It is admitted that the plaintiffs cannot recover if the purchase money in the hands of J. L. Mayo is not personalty, and it appears in the record that a judgment has been rendered in an action, to which the plaintiffs were parties, adjudging it to be real estate, from which there has been no appeal. If this adjudication was wrong, it is because it was based on the erroneous application of legal principles, and the remedy to correct the error was by appeal. Stafford v. Gallops, 123 N. C. 21, 31 S. E. 265, 68 Am. St. Rep. 815; McLeod v. Graham, 132 N. C. 475, 43 S. E. 935.

[2] Nor can the fact that the plaintiffs were infants at the time of the adjudication, and that the judgment was by consent, benefit the plaintiff, if it be conceded that the part adjudging the purchase money to be real estate was by consent, which is not beyond dispute, because if treated as the contract of infants, which is the most favorable view for the plaintiffs, it would be voidable and not void (Millsaps v. Estes, 137 N. C. 535, 50 S. E. 227, 70 L. R. A. 170, 107 Am. St. Rep. 496) and cannot be attacked collaterally (Earp v. Minton, 138 N. C. 204, 50 S. E. 624). The plaintiffs have not sought to impeach the judgment by motion or action but treat it as void, which, as we have seen, is not a correct view to take of it, and we must hold that it precludes a recovery.

Affirmed.

BLOUNT v. ROYAL FRATERNAL ASS'N, Inc.

I. INSURANCE (§ 815*)—POLICY—STATUTORY REGULATIONS—COMPLIANCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Revisal 1908, § 4773a, provides that it shall be unlawful for any insurance company to issue any policy for less than $500 until the forms have been approved by the insurance commissioner, etc. Held that, in an action on a benefit certificate for $500, containing a provision that in case of death of the member not more than one-fifth of the amount otherwise due should be payable for each full year of membership, etc., the burden was on plaintiff, seeking to be relieved from such limitation of liability, to both allege and prove that the certificate had not been approved by the insurance commissioner.

2. INSURANCE (§ 138*)—LIFE POLICY—AMOUNT—APPROVAL BY INSURANCE COMMISSIONER—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

Revisal 1908, § 4773a, providing that it shall be unlawful for any insurance company to sell any policy in an amount less than $500 until the forms have been approved by the insurance commissioner, deals with the insurance company and not with the contract of insurance; and hence a policy containing a provision limiting the liability of the company in case of death to less than $500 is not void or unenforceable in the absence of a showing that it had been so approved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 246-249; Dec. Dig. § 138.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Washington County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action by Sarah J. Blount against the Royal Fraternal Association, Incorporated. Judgment for plaintiff for less than the relief demanded, and she appeals. Affirmed.

This action is to recover the amount of a certificate of insurance for $500, containing the following provision stamped on its face, above the signatures of the officers of the defendant executing the same: "This certificate is issued with the provision that in case of death of the member not more than one-fifth of the amount otherwise due will be payable for each full year of membership." And with the following stipulation indorsed thereon: "The death benefit due on this certificate will be increased 10 per cent. per annum of the amount written within for each expired year of membership in force, to continue for a period of ten years, or until the amount written is doubled by such increase." The insured died after one year's full membership, and the only controversy is the amount the plaintiff is entitled to recover. The plaintiff contends that the burden is on the defendant to show that the insurance commissioner has approved the issuing of a certificate for less than $500, as provided in Revisal 1908, § 4773a, and that, having failed to offer any evidence of this fact, the provision stamped on the certificate is void, and she is entitled to recover the face of the certificate, $500, increased by 10 per cent., according to the indorsed stipulation, or a total of $550. The defendant contends that the certificate is valid as a whole, and that the plaintiff is entitled to recover $110, which is the amount admitted to be due if effect is given to all the terms of the certificate, including the provision stamped thereon. His honor rendered judgment in accordance with the contention of the defendant for $110 and costs, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Gaylord & Gaylord and P. H. Bell, all of Plymouth, for appellant. T. T. Thorne, of Rocky Mount, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1] There is neither allegation nor proof that the certificate of insurance, containing the provision reducing the amount of insurance to less than $500 in certain contingencies, has not been approved by the insurance commissioner; and, as the validity of the provision is not affected by the fact that it was stamped on the certificate, it is a part of the contract.

In Waters v. Annuity Co., 144 N. C. 671, 57 S. E. 440, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 805, there was a paster on the policy and entries on the application, and the court said of them: "It is urged upon our attention that some of the entries, by means of which the application was made to accord with the policy and the paster, were made on the margin of the application and written longitudinally, and that such entries so made, and even the paster itself, are presumptive evidence of a change in the contract after the application had been first signed. But neither the authorities nor the known usage in the making of such contracts are in support of the position to the extent contended for. We know that these policies, as well as the applications, are gotten up on printed forms designed to meet the average and general demand in contracts of this nature, and frequently changes are made to meet special circumstances; that these are ordinarily noted on the margin, and a slip is then pasted on the face of the policy to express the contract as affected by these changes. In the absence, therefore, of some special circumstances tending to cast suspicion on such entries, there should be no presumption of any alteration."

The presumption is in favor of the validity of all contracts (Loyd v. Loyd, 113 N. C. 189, 18 S. E. 200), and this presumption is aided in this case, as the plaintiff declares on the contract, without alleging the fact upon which she now relies to destroy a part of it, and she also introduced the contract in evidence in its entirety.

We are therefore of opinion, if the contention of the plaintiff as to the legal effect of Revisal, § 4773a, is sound, that, as the presumption is that the contract and every part thereof is valid, nothing to the contrary appearing on the face of it, the burden was on the plaintiff to allege and prove that the insurance commissioner did not approve the certificate, and, having failed to do so, she cannot recover more than the sum of $110 awarded here.

[2] If, however, the fact appeared affirmatively that the insurance commissioner had not approved the certificate, we would not give our assent to the position of the plaintiff that this would avoid the effect of the provision stamped on the certificate, leaving other parts of the certificate in force.

The section of the Revisal relied on reads as follows: "It shall be unlawful for any insurance company, association or order or society doing business in this state, to issue, sell or dispose of any policy, contract or certificate for less than five hundred dollars, or use applications in connection therewith, until the forms of which have been submitted to and approved by the insurance commissioner of North Carolina, and copies filed in the insurance department." The statute does not purport to deal with the validity of the contract of insurance, but with the insurance company. It does not say a policy for less than $500 shall be void unless approved by the insurance commissioner, but that it shall be unlawful for the company to issue such policy, and the reason for the language used is obvious. Those who apply for policies of less than $500 usually have little experience in the forms of insurance, or other contracts, and it was thought wise for the insurance commissioner to have special supervision over their contracts for their protection, but it was not intended to relieve the company from the contract made.

If the position of the plaintiff should prevail, a policy for $300 would be unlawful unless approved by the insurance commissioner, and no recovery could be had on it, except possibly upon the idea that the insured would not be in pari delicto with the company.

The case of Ober v. Katzenstein, 160 N. C. 440, 76 S. E. 477, is in point. There the plaintiff sued upon a contract for the sale of fertilizer, and the defendant contended that the contract was illegal because the plaintiff had failed to comply with the requirements of the statute as to domestication, and was therefore doing business in the state unlawfully; but the court said: "But the statute does not invalidate either the express contract made between the plaintiff and the defendant, nor, indeed, the implied contract raised by the receipt of the goods of the former by the defendant. This point has been recently adjudicated. Tobacco Co. v. Tobacco Co., 144 N. C. 352 [57 S. E. 5]. If the state, in addition to the penalty, had desired to render invalid the contract and to deny a recovery thereon, it would have so enacted, as it has done in regard to gambling and other illegal contracts."

We are therefore of opinion there is no error.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 129*)—TITLE OF VENDOR—ESTATES TAIL—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Under Revisal 1905, § 1578, providing that estates tail shall be converted into fee-simple estates and that a conveyance in fee made by a tenant in tail shall convey the fee-simple estate, a deed to the grantee and her bodily heirs conveys a fee-simple estate where there was nothing in the deed to indicate an intention to create a life estate with a remainder to the heirs, and the purchaser could not refuse to perform on the ground that the vendor's chain of title contained such a deed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Chatham County; Bragaw, Judge.

Action by C. C. Harrington against Alston Grimes. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

On the hearing it appeared that plaintiff, having contracted to sell defendant a certain tract of land for the sum of $2,500, said defendant declined to carry out the agreement, alleging that the title offered was defective. The plaintiff held the land by deed from T. T. Buckner and wife, N. J. Buckner, and N. J. Buckner had acquired the same under a deed from Willis Byrd and wife to said N. J. Buckner; this deed being in terms as follows: "This deed made this the 22d day of June, 1904, by Willis Byrd and wife, Lucy Byrd, of Chatham county and state of North Carolina, of the first part, to N. J. Buckner and her bodily heirs of Chatham county and state of North Carolina, of the second part, witnesseth: That said Willis Byrd and wife, Lucy Byrd, in consideration of $100.00 to them paid by N. J. Buckner, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, have bargained and sold and by these presents do hereby bargain, sell and convey to said N. J. Buckner and her bodily (heirs) a certain tract or parcel of land in Chatham county, state of North Carolina, adjoining the lands of R. J. Yates, T. L. Lasater heirs and others, bounded as follows: Beginning at the fork of the Pittsboro and Mill road running with said Mill road west 24 chains and 50 links to a stake and pointers Lasater and Yates corner; thence with Yates' line north 2 east 28 chains to the county gate on the Pittsboro road, thence down the said road 39 chains to the beginning, containing (40) forty acres more or less. To have and to hold the aforesaid tract or parcel of land and all privileges and appurtenances thereto belonging to the said N. J. Buckner and her bodily heirs and assigns to their only use and behoof forever. And the said Willis Byrd and wife Lucy Byrd covenant with the said N. J. Buckner and her bodily heirs and assigns that they are seised of said premises in fee; and have right to convey the same in fee simple; that the same are free and clear from any and all incumbrances and that they will warrant and defend the said title to the same against the claims of all persons whomsoever," etc. The defendant, insisting that the deed in question only conveyed to N. J. Buckner a life estate in the property, declined to accept the title offered or to pay for same. The court below being of opinion that the deed conveyed to plaintiff a fee simple, judgment was entered for plaintiff, and defendant excepted and appealed.

Ward & Grimes, of Washington, N. C., for appellant. Hayes & Bynum, of Pittsboro, for appellee.

HOKE, J. (after the facts as above). Under the old law, the deed in question would have conveyed to N. J. Buckner an estate in fee tail, converted by our statute into a fee simple (Revisal, § 1578), and his honor correctly ruled that plaintiff could make a good title. Decisions in support of this construction of the deed will be found in Perrett v. Bird, 152 N. C. 220, 67 S. E. 507; Sessoms v. Sessoms, 144 N. C. 121, 56 S. E. 687; Jones v. Ragsdale, 141 N. C. 200, 53 S. E. 842; Whitfield v. Garriss, 134 N. C. 24, 45 S. E. 904; and many others could be cited. The well-considered cases of Acker v. Pridgen, 158 N. C. 337, 74 S. E. 335, and Puckett v. Morgan, 158 N. C. 344, 74 S. E. 15, cited and relied upon by defendant, in no way militate against this position. In those cases it was held that, on a perusal of the entire instrument and by reason of the language in which same was expressed, a deed in the one case and a will in the other, it plainly appeared to be the intent of the grantor to convey only a life estate to the first taker, and that the words "bodily heirs" and "heirs of the body" did not refer to these persons as inheritors of such taker, but were used only as a descriptive personarum, carrying to them an estate in remainder and as purchasers from the grantor. But no such intent can be gathered from this instrument, nor does it contain any words or expressions to qualify or affect the ordinary meaning of the words "bodily heirs" in connection with the estate limited to N. J. Buckner, and the deed as stated has been properly held to convey to such grantee an estate in fee simple.

There is no error, and the judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Halifax County; Lane, Judge.

Action by Ellen G. Bradshaw and others against Cynthia Stansberry. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Dismissed.

In 1874 Wm. E. Webb and Annie E. Webb, his wife, executed a deed for a certain tract of land to the three children which they then had, Felix, Richard, and Cynthia, reserving to themselves a life estate therein. On the same day Wm. E. Webb executed to his wife a deed to another tract containing 250 acres, conveying the same to "her sole use and benefit during her natural life, and at her death to the surviving children of the said Wm. E. and Annie E. Webb, their heirs and assigns forever." This was all the land which they then or ever afterwards owned, and these deeds were intended in the nature of a will. After their execution another child was born, named Effie M. Webb. All four of the children survived Wm. E., but after his death, and before the death of his widow, Felix and Richard died intestate without issue, and Effie M., the after-born child, died intestate, leaving the plaintiff, Ellen G. Bradshaw; the controversy being whether Ellen G. Bradshaw, the grandchild, takes anything under the second deed, or whether the whole tract goes to the defendant, Cynthia Stansberry, as the only child who outlived the widow.

E. L. Travis, of Halifax, and J. M. Picot, of Littleton, for appellants. Jos. P. Pippen, of Littleton, R. C. Dunn, of Enfield, and Elliott Clark, of Halifax, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. [1] The motion of the appellee to dismiss the appeal for failure to print the record and briefs in accordance with the rules of this court is allowed. The number of appeals has been increasing year by year under conditions heretofore existing, and with the additional facilities for trials in the superior courts, brought about by four new judicial districts, we may reasonably expect a further increase of from 15 to 20 per cent. It is therefore necessary to have rules of procedure and to adhere to them, and, if we relax them in favor of one, we might as well abolish them.

[2] We have, however, examined the record and are of opinion no error was committed on the trial. The term "surviving children," in the deed under which the plaintiff claims, means children living at the death of the life tenant and would not include the plaintiff, a grandchild, under Lee v. Baird, 132 N. C. 755, 44 S. E. 605.

Appeal dismissed.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 172*) — WHO MAY AVOID—HEIRS OF GRANTOR.

The heirs of a grantor cannot maintain an action to set aside a deed executed by him with intent to defraud his creditors; they are concluded by the deed of their ancestor, and as to them the grantee acquired a good title.

Appeal from Superior Court, Johnston County; Carter, Judge.

Action by Luther Pierce and others against Julia Stallings and another to set aside a deed. From a judgment for defendants, the plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Abell & Ward, of Smithfield, for appellants. F. H. Brooks, of Smithfield, for appellees.

HOKE, J. The complaint alleged, in substance, that on 1st day of June, 1909, D. F. Pierce, owning several tracts of land, conveyed same to his then wife, Julia Pierce, since intermarried with defendant Stallings, and that said conveyance was made with intent to delay, hinder, and defraud the creditors of the grantor; that, said grantor having died, the plaintiffs, his children and heirs at law, instituted the present action to set aside said deed by reason of said fraudulent purpose. There is no allegation nor suggestion in the complaint that the plaintiffs are creditors of the grantor or purchasers for value, etc.; they claim only as heirs at law, and, this being true, plaintiffs are concluded by the deed of their ancestor; as to them, the defendant acquired a good title. Saunders v. Lee, 101 N. C. 8, 7 S. E. 590; Ellington v. Currie, 40 N. C. 21; Waite on

Fraudulent Conveyances, § 121; Reynolds v. Faust, 179 Mo. 21, 77 S. W. 855; Campbell et al. v. Ross, 187 Ill. 553, 58 N. E. 596. In the citation from Waite, supra, the author says: "The heir of a grantor cannot impeach his ancestor's deed on the ground that it was made in fraud of creditors, for he can claim no right which the ancestor was estopped from setting up." And in Saunder's Case, supra, it was held: "A conveyance made with an intent to defraud creditors is, nevertheless, valid against the maker and all others, except creditors and those who purchase under a sale made for their benefit, and, until the title thus conveyed is divested by some proceeding instituted by the creditors, it is sufficient to support an action for the recovery of the land and damages for its detention."

There is no error, and the judgment sustaining the demurrer is affirmed.

Affirmed.

MONDS v. TOWN OF DUNN.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 790*)—DEFECTS IN STREETS—NOTICE OF—EVIDENCE.

Evidence that the witness told a day laborer employed by a town to trim street lights and do other work that the witness had received a shock at an electric street light, near which plaintiff's intestate was subsequently found dead, was inadmissible, as notice to a day laborer is not notice to the town.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 818*)—DEFECTIVE STREETS—EVIDENCE.

Evidence that, four days before plaintiff's intestate was found dead 35 feet from an electric street light, the witness had reached up to take hold of the light and received a shock was inadmissible where notice was not given the town and there was no evidence that the light was any lower the night deceased met his death.

3. EVIDENCE (§ 474*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—PERSONAL KNOWLEDGE.

The superintendent of a city's light department during a period of two or three years, though disclaiming to be an expert, could testify that he had received a 110-volt electric shock and it was not deadly, and that he had examined a certain transformer and it was all right, as these were matters of personal experience and observation.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 818*)—DEFECTIVE STREETS—EVIDENCE.

Testimony was admissible that the witness saw deceased, alleged to have been killed by a shock from an electric light wire, before he was moved and there were no wires about his feet, that the light and pole near where the death occurred were all right two or three days before, and the transformer was all right the next day, which was as soon as it could be inspected, and that the primary wire was not touching the secondary wires the next day, which was as soon as he noticed.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1058*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

Error, if any, in excluding testimony of an electrician as to how much voltage the wires carried to a certain arc light and what voltage it would take to operate it was cured by the subsequent admission of testimony of the same witness that in his opinion it would take 1,100 volts.

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 763*)—DEFECTIVE STREETS—CARE REQUIRED.

A town operating an electric light plant is not required to use the "latest improved method" of suspending arc lights to avoid injuring persons coming in contact with its wires, without regard to whether such methods are in general use.

7. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 818*)—DEFECTIVE STREETS—EVIDENCE.

Evidence as to whether the voltage on an electric light wire, by which deceased was alleged to have been killed, would not have been greater than 110 volts if the insulation on the primary wire had been defective was inadmissible, where there was no evidence that the insulation was defective.

8. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 819*)—DEFECTIVE STREETS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Plaintiff was required to show by the greater weight of evidence that the defendant town failed to exercise proper care in the performance of its legal duties to plaintiff's intestate, whose death was alleged to have been due to a shock from an electric light wire, and that such negligent breach of duty was the proximate cause.

9. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 852*)—DEFECTIVE STREETS—CARE REQUIRED.

A town operating an electric light plant must use that degree of care that a reasonably prudent man would use under like circumstances to avoid injuring persons coming in contact with electrically charged wires, and it is charged with a continuous duty of taking reasonable precaution to keep its appliances in proper condition.

10. TRIAL (§ 256*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—NECESSITY FOR REQUEST.

Where the court has given a proper instruction on a particular subject, if a party desires more specific instructions he must ask for them.

11. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1066*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction stating that the degree of care required of a town operating an electric light plant was merely reasonable care, if error, was without prejudice, where there was no evidence whatever showing any negligence of the town which would have brought the electric light wire, from which deceased was alleged to have received a fatal shock, to the ground or within reach or so low as to be unsafe.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4220; Dec. Dig. § 1066.*]

12. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 822*)—DEFECTIVE STREETS—INSTRUCTIONS.

There was no error in instructing that defendant contended that plaintiff's intestate himself lowered the electric street light and wires near which he was found lying dead, and that if the intestate did, by meddling with the chain, lower the light and received a fatal shock from the wires, plaintiff could not recover.

Appeal from Superior Court, Harnett County; Carter, Judge.

Action by N. H. Monda, Administrator, against the Town of Dunn to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. From a judgment for the defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. F. Young and R. J. Godwin, both of Dunn, for appellant. Clifford & Townsend, of Dunn, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The plaintiff's intestate was found dead near a street crossing in the town of Dunn on a rainy night in December; his head and body submerged to the waist in the water in a ditch 4 feet deep, his feet and legs being on the bank. His feet were near an electric light post which was on the edge of the street, across the ditch from the sidewalk. On the pole were the electric light wires of the defendant town which were owned by the town. An arc light was suspended over the center of the street crossing about 35 feet from where the body was found. There was a chain connected therewith, by means of which the lamp was lowered and raised. This chain was out of the reach of persons passing along the street, as the witness Freeman, who was 6 foot tall, had to reach up to get it. Late in the afternoon before the body was found, the lamp was suspended in its place as usual. At the time the body was found, about 9 o'clock at night, the lamp was lying on the ground in the middle of the street. One of the secondary wires, which it was testified carried a voltage of 110, was found detached therefrom.

This action is brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of the plaintiff's intestate alleged to have been caused by the defendant's electric wires which were found down on the street as above set forth. Upon this evidence the court might well have directed a nonsuit. There was slight, if any, evidence, beyond mere conjecture, that the death of the intestate was caused by coming in contact with the wire 35 feet off or that there was any negligence of the defendant which caused the contact, if any had been shown. He was not found in contact with the wire but 35 feet away.

[1] The first exception is to the exclusion of the evidence of the witness Lynch, who testified that a short time prior to the death of the deceased he told one Freeman that he had received a shock there on the Monday previous. Freeman having later testified that he was hired by the day by the town to trim lamps and do other work by the superintendent employed by the city, the court directed the jury: "You will not consider any evidence to the effect that P. Y. Lynch gave any notice to Mr. Freeman." It cannot be that a remark to a day laborer was a notice to the town. Such evidence is only competent as actual notice to the town, when it is given to an officer whose duty and interest it is to inform the town authorities, or who has authority himself to act in the matter. A notice to a day laborer on the street of New York or London that there is a defect in the pavement certainly could not be construed as fixing the town with liability by reason of such notice. The same rule of law applies to the town of Dunn. It might be that the town should have taken notice of the defect, if there was one. But certainly it was not competent to show that it had actual notice by reason of a remark made to a day laborer employed by the town. 28 Cyc. 1397-1399.

[2] The witness further testified that on Sunday night, before the plaintiff's intestate was killed, he crossed at that place and the lamp was not giving any light. He thought he would shake it and reached up high to shake it and when he did got a considerable shock. He did not tell any of the town commissioners about it, that he remembers. The shock gave him a peculiar feeling. This evidence was stricken out by the judge at the conclusion of the testimony; there being nothing to show that the wire was any lower on Thursday night or connecting the intestate in any way with being struck by reason thereof. According to Lynch's testimony the wire was out of his way and he received the shock only because he, a very tall man, reached up and grasped the light.

[3, 4] Bizzell, the city superintendent of the defendant's light and water department, testified that the lamp was suspended in the middle of the street by a cable. He said that, while the voltage on the primary wire was 2,300, the voltage on the secondary wire from the transformer to the lamp was 110, and that such voltage was not dangerous and would not give much of a shock; that he had received a shock from a 110-volt current and it was not much of a shock. The plaintiff excepted because the witness was allowed to testify that 110 volts was not considered a deadly current. But the witness stated that he spoke on his own experience. The plaintiff also excepted because Bizzell testified that the primary wire did not come in contact with the secondary wires but were above them; that he did not notice the wire on that day but did so on the next day. This witness further testified that the dead man had not been moved when he got there; that there were no wires about his feet; that he inspected this light and pole two or three days prior to the time; and he also examined the transformer on that pole the next day, which was as soon as it could be done, and found them all right. The plaintiff excepted to this testimony. The witness stated that he had not taken any course in electricity and did not profess to be an expert, and all the experience he had had was being in charge of the electric light business of this town for two or three years past. We do not see any error in admitting the testimony which was a matter of observation on the part of the witness who was in charge of the business and had been for two or three years past. There was other evidence that there were no wires found in contact with the body of the defendant and none to the contrary that the light in question was hanging in its usual position late in the afternoon before the body of the deceased was found that night. In the reply there was testimony tending to show that the plaintiff's right hand was burned on the inside as if he has taken hold of something and that there was a blister.

[6] C. W. Thompson, witness for the plaintiff, testified that he was an electrician but he had not examined the entire line of poles from the crossing where the body was found to the power plant; that he had been over a part of the line. He was asked: How much voltage do these wires carry to the arc light as described by Mr. Bizzell in his testimony, and how much voltage would it take to operate an arc light as described by Bizzell and as they are usually suspended? This evidence was excluded, and the plaintiff excepted. But the witness was allowed further to testify that he could form an opinion satisfactory to himself as to how much voltage it would take to operate such an arc light as was described by Mr. Bizzell; that in his opinion it would take 1,100, though it could be operated on 110-volt current if a rheostat was cut in on one side; that he had never known a street arc light operated on 110-volt current; that, if the primary current is 2,800 volts, it would be an exceptional transformer that would cut it down to 110 at one step but it could be cut down to 1,100. If there had been error in excluding the previous questions to Mr. Thompson, it was fully cured by the admission of this testimony by him.

[8, 7] The court excluded a request by the plaintiff to Mr. Thompson to explain to the jury the "latest improved method" of suspending arc lights. In this we do not see any error. Witsell v. Railroad, 120 N. C.

557, 27 S. E. 125. The witness further stated that he had not taken any course in a technical school nor at college and his experience was mainly acquired by work at the business. It would seem that his qualifications as expert were about the same as those of Mr. Bizzell. This witness was further asked: "If the insulation on the primary wire had been defective and the light had been out of proper care, would it not have caused a larger voltage?" There was no evidence that the insulation on the primary wire was defective, and the hypothetical question was properly excluded.

[9, 8] The court charged the jury that the plaintiff was required to show by the greater weight of evidence that there was a failure to exercise proper care in the performance of legal duties which the defendant owed to the plaintiff (i. e., that degree of care which a reasonably prudent man should use under like circumstances), and that such negligent breach of duty was the proximate cause of the injury (explaining correctly what was "proximate cause"), and that persons in control of electric appliances are charged with a continuous duty of taking reasonable precaution to keep their appliances in proper condition. This is substantially the charge approved in Ramsbottom v. Railroad, 138 N. C. 38, 50 S. E. 448.

[10, 11] If the plaintiff desired more specific instructions, he should have asked for them. Simmons v. Davenport, 140 N. C. 407, 53 S. E. 225. Besides, the plaintiff could not have been prejudiced as there was no evidence whatever showing negligence of the defendant which would have brought the wire to the ground or in reach of the intestate, nor that the wire hung lower than was safe or usual.

[12] The court further charged the jury: "The defendant contends that there is such an extent of mystery introduced in the case by evidence tending to show a burn in both hands and foot that upon all the evidence they should not be convinced that the death of the plaintiff's intestate was caused from wires being down in the first instance but rather that the plaintiff's intestate himself brought the wire down." After stating this contention, the court added: "Of course it is hardly necessary for me to tell you that, if the plaintiff's intestate came to his death by meddling with the chain and then received the shock from the wires which he had himself brought down, he would not be entitled to recover, and upon such finding of fact it would be your duty to answer the first issue 'No.'" The plaintiff excepted to the above instructions, but we find no error.

The whole charge is not sent up, and it does not appear that there were any instructions asked and refused. Upon the whole case, we find no error entitling the plaintiff to a new trial. There was no evidence tending to show that the wires were down by any negligence of the defendant. Indeed, the evidence was scarcely sufficient to justify submitting the case to the jury. They have, however, found the issue in favor of the defendant.

No error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Johnston County; Carter, Judge.

Action by D. H. McCullers and others against Claude Cheatham and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

This was originally an action for the recovery of a lot of leaf tobacco raised by E. T. Parham on defendant's farm, known as the "Widow Whitley's place." Parham was the tenant of defendants in 1910, cultivating the farm on shares. Plaintiff, D. H. McCullers, made advances to him in money and supplies, under a contract between them. Defendants bought Parham's one-half share of the tobacco raised on the farm for $400 but never took possession of it. Plaintiff seized it under the process but surrendered it to defendants in a short while, and the latter accepted it. Parham had given plaintiff D. H. McCullers a mortgage on the crop for the advances and afterwards assigned his interest in the crop to him. This action was finally turned into one for an accounting between the parties and was referred for that purpose. The referee found the facts in favor of plaintiffs and reported that defendants were indebted to plaintiff D. H. McCullers in the sum of $270.88. This report was approved and confirmed by the court, upon exceptions thereto filed by the defendants, save as to two items allowed the plaintiff by the referee, which were stricken from the amount found by the referee to be due, and reduced the said amount to $196.39. There was judgment for this amount and costs, including one-half of the referee's fee.

T. T. Hicks, of Henderson, for appellants. Abell & Ward, of Smithfield, and Jas. H. Pou, of Raleigh, for appellees.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The misfortune of the defendants in this case is that the referee has found all the essential facts against them, and when these findings were reviewed and approved by the judge, upon consideration of the report and the exceptions, there being evidence to warrant them, we are precluded from changing the report in this respect but must decide the case upon the findings of fact, as made by the referee and approved by the court. We recently stated the rule of practice in this respect: "We will not review the referee's findings of fact, which are settled, upon a consideration of the evidence and approved by the judge, when exceptions are filed thereto, if there is some evidence to support them. Boyle v. Stallings, 140 N. C. 524, 53 S. E. 346; Harris v. Smith, 144 N. C. 439, 57 S. E. 122, and cases cited; Thornton v. McNeely, 144 N. C. 622, 57 S. E. 400; Frey v. Lumber Co., 144 N. C. 759 [57 S. E. 464]."
Thompson v. Smith, 160 N. C. 256, 75 S. E. 1010. The assignments of error in the case are nearly all addressed to the findings of fact, and, as there is no question of law or legal inference involved in them, there is nothing that we can review or reverse.

[2] The defendants do contend, though, that, by seizing the tobacco under the requisition issued in this case, the plaintiffs rescinded the sale of it by Parham to them, and consequently that they are liable only for the real value of the same instead of $400, the contract price and the amount charged against them in the account by the referee for the tobacco. But not so as we view the facts. The sale of the tobacco was a cash transaction, as appears, and defendants had not paid for it nor taken possession of it. The title, therefore, had not vested in them. They had merely a contract of sale. Milbiser v. Erdman, 98 N. C. 292, 3 S. E. 521, 2 Am. St. Rep. 334; a. c., 103 N. C. 27, 9 S. E. 582; Railroad Co. v. Barnes, 104 N. C. 25, 10 S. E. 83. Besides, the defendants elected not to treat the plaintiff's action as a rescission of the contract. Plaintiffs instructed the sheriff to deliver the tobacco to defendants, and this was done and it was received by them without any objection. They did not think at that time to insist on a rescission and to refuse to take the property but rather elected to stand by it and avail themselves of it. Having done so, we cannot hear them, when they now take the opposite position, by repudiating what they then chose to do and rely upon the rescission of the sale. When a party is given a choice between inconsistent rights, he must make his election once for all. We said of this principle in Norwood v. Lassiter, 132 N. C. 52, 48 S. E. 509: "When a party has the right to ratify or reject, he is put thereby to his election, and he must decide, once for all, what he will do, and, when his election is once made, it immediately becomes irrevocable. This is an elementary principle. Austin v. Stewart, 126 N. C. 525, 36 S. E. 37. He could not accept the money derived from the sale and at the same time reserve the right to repudiate the sale. Kerr v. Sanders, 122 N. C. 635, 29 S. E. 943; Mendenhall v. Mendenhall, 53 N. C. 287. It is familiar learning that, when two inconsistent benefits or alternative rights are presented for the choice of a party, the law imposes the duty upon him to decide as between them which he will take or enjoy, and after he has made the election he must abide by it, especially when the nature of the case requires that he should not enjoy both, or when innocent third parties may suffer if he is permitted afterwards to change his mind and retract." The same is substantially stated in Austin v. Stewart, supra. "Where a person has taken possession of or exercised acts of ownership over property under a claim of title or right, he is estopped to set up a claim inconsistent with that under which he has acted." 16 Cyc. 803, citing numerous authorities in note 18 to support this text.

It would prejudice the plaintiff D. H. McCullers if defendant should now be permitted to act in repudiation of his claim of ownership, when he received and appropriated the property as his own, with the consent of the other parties, who ordered it to be delivered to him by the sheriff, conceding his right to it under the contract. He did not have the full title at first but acquired it by the delivery of the tobacco to him afterwards, and, having taken it as owner under the contract, he must pay the stipulated price and not merely its value. As plaintiffs appear not to have been in the wrong originally, the claim of damages for a wrongful seizure of the tobacco cannot be sustained. We have so far treated the case as if the bringing of this suit for the tobacco was a repudiation of the contract of sale, as contended by the defendant, but this position may be seriously questioned. It takes two to make a contract, and the consent of both is required to unmake it. The defendants never abandoned their right, but on the contrary, as appears by their answer, first begged plaintiff for the possession of the tobacco, asserting their title to it, and, when this entirely failed, they threatened plaintiffs with a lawsuit if it was not surrendered to them, and finally received it as their property under the contract, claiming it as their own. Subsequently they sold it in market. Not only is this true, but in their answer they actually claim damages for the seizure as violative of their rights to its possession. The referee finds that defendants contracted to buy Parham's one-half interest in the tobacco, so that their real right to the tobacco was derived from the contract of sale and not as landlords. They could not assert any legal claim to it in the latter capacity. Defendants knew of the contract of sale and must be held to have acted in accordance with their true right under it. They could not claim as landlord, so long as the contract stood, which changed the relation of the parties. If plaintiff's conduct amounted to a repudiation of the contract of sale and defendants had acquiesced in it, the result might, perhaps, be different, but they cannot claim under the contract and against it or occupy two inconsistent positions.

Our conclusion is that the case was correctly decided.

No error.

HUFFMAN v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

1. CARRIERS (§ 283*)—PASSENGERS—CONDUCTOR INSULTING PASSENGER.

A railroad company is responsible for the acts of a conductor who, while in charge of a train, collecting tickets and acting within the scope of his authority as the company's vice principal, addressed insulting remarks to a lady passenger who had failed to purchase a ticket for her child.

2. CARRIERS (§ 319*)—INSULT TO PASSENGER—EXEMPLARY DAMAGES.

In an action against a railroad company for insulting remarks addressed by a conductor to a lady passenger who had failed to purchase a ticket for her child, the plaintiff is entitled to punitive damages if the conductor maliciously, willfully, and wantonly insulted the plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1338-1343; Dec. Dig. § 319.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; Carter, Judge.

Action by Annie L. Huffman against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. L. Barham, of Goldsboro, for appellant.

BROWN, J. The jury found that defendant's conductor did maliciously, willfully, wantonly, and rudely mistreat and humiliate plaintiff while a passenger on its train. The only exception necessary to consider relates to the issue as to damage.

The plaintiff was a passenger on the defendant's train, having her child over nine years old with her, but no ticket for the child. The conductor rightfully demanded payment of the child's fare. As to what occurred then, there is a marked conflict of evidence. Plaintiff testifies that she reached down in her purse to get the child's fare, when the conductor publicly and without cause wantonly insulted her by telling her that "she was nothing but a cheap, common scalawag of a woman, or otherwise she would have purchased a ticket for the child." Plaintiff says this "got her dander up" and that she retaliated by calling conductor a dirt dobber and saying: "She would whip him in 20 minutes but for the disgrace; that the conduct of the conductor and his remarks made her sick; that she had never had her feelings hurt so bad; that she had never been so insulted in her life; that there were a great many ladies and gentlemen on the train; and that they looked at her hard."

The conductor testified that he asked plaintiff for the child's fare, and she emphatically refused to pay it; that he told her he had no right to pass a nine year old child free; that plaintiff then said that she would pay it, but she knew why he was so persistent; that he wanted to put it into his pocket and put it to his own use; that he then told her that she was a woman and a cheap skate and that he would not say anything more to her about it; and that she abused him all the way, calling him a rascal, scoundrel, and many other epithets.

[1] The contention that the defendant is not liable for the conductor's conduct, whatever at the time it may have been, cannot be maintained. He was in charge of the train, collecting tickets, acting within the scope of his authority, and a vice principal representing defendant. Under the facts of this case, ratification was not necessary to render defendant responsible for his act. Stewart v. Lumber Co., 146 N. C. 47, 59 S. E. 545; Sawyer v. Railroad, 142 N. C. 1, 54 S. E. 793, 115 Am. St. Rep. 716, 9 Ann. Cas. 440.

[2] Upon the issue of damage, the judge stated the evidence and contentions of both sides fully, and instructed the jury that, in order to warrant the awarding of punitive damages in their sound discretion, they must previously find that the conductor first maliciously, willfully, and wantonly insulted the plaintiff. His honor followed the well-settled decisions of this court. Holmes v. Railway Co., 94 N. C. 321, and cases cited in notes.

CORPORATION COMMISSION v. BANK OF JONESBORO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 24, 1913.)

BANKS AND BANKING (§ 112*)—MISAPPROPRIATION OF FUNDS—LIABILITY TO CORRESPONDENT BANK.

The fact that the president of a banking company misappropriated funds of a correspondent bank, of which he was cashier, did not charge such banking company with knowledge of the misappropriation so as to preclude recovery of an indebtedness from the correspondent bank, since its president, in misappropriating the funds, acted independently and adversely to its interests.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. §§ 271, 272; Dec. Dig. § 112.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Lee County; Daniels, Judge.

Contest between creditors over the distribution of assets in the hands of A. A. F. Seawell, receiver of the Bank of Jonesboro. The receiver finds and allows a debt due the Banking Loan & Trust Company in the sum of $15,867.85, and in a subsequent report filed allowed said debt in the sum of $16,581.10 to share pro rata in distribution of assets in his hands. Under agreement of parties that the court should find the facts and enter judgment thereon, it rendered judgment accordingly. The creditors, other than the Banking Loan & Trust Company, excepted and appealed. Affirmed.

McIver & Williams, of Sanford, and H. A. London & Son, of Pittsboro, for Banking Loan & Trust Company. Hayes & Bynum, of Pittsboro, U. L. Spence, of Carthage, and Hoyle & Hoyle, of Sanford, for exceptors.

PER CURIAM. The controlling facts are that A. W. Huntley was cashier of the Bank of Jonesboro and president of the Banking Loan & Trust Company; that the said A. W. Huntley paid all checks drawn on the Bank of Jonesboro by its depositors, and forwarded to the Bank of Jonesboro for payment by out of town banks, by checks drawn upon the correspondent banks of the Banking Loan & Trust Company, in its name, and upon its check forms, and signed by the said A. W. Huntley, as its president; that the said Huntley made remittance for all collections made by the Bank of Jonesboro by exactly similar checks; that the money so paid amounted to $16,581.10; that the said Huntley misappropriated the funds of the Bank of Jonesboro, and caused it to become insolvent; and that none of the officers of the Banking Loan & Trust Company, except Huntley, had any knowledge of such misappropriation.

The knowledge of Huntley, if material, would not be imputed to the Banking Loan & Trust Company, because he was acting in his own interest and adversely to his principal. Bank v. Burgwyn, 110 N. C. 267, 14 S. E. 623; Bank v. School Committee, 118 N. C. 383, 24 S. E. 792. These cases were cited with approval in Brite v. Penny, 157 N. C. 114, 72 S. E. 965, and the court there says: "We recognize the general doctrine held by all courts that a corporation is not bound by the action or chargeable with the knowledge of its officers or agents in respect to a transaction in which such officer or agent is acting in his own behalf, and does not act in any official or representative capacity for the corporation."

But in any event it appears that the money of the Banking Loan & Trust Company was used to pay checks drawn on the Bank of Jonesboro by its depositors, and to cover remittances for collections made by the bank, which we must hold constituted a valid indebtedness.

It was within the power of the judge, under the terms of submission to him, to correct the finding as to the amount due, and, if necessary, the pleadings would be amended in this court to conform to the finding.

We find no error.

GOSSETT et al. v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 8, 1913.)

1. TRIAL (§ 256*)—REQUEST FOR INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY.

Where the charge to the jury as a whole is free from error, the defendant should present requests to charge, if it desires more specific instructions.

2. TRIAL (§ 241*)—INSTRUCTIONS—READING STATUTE.

In an action for mental anguish, caused by the failure to deliver promptly a telegram announcing the death of plaintiff's father, it was not error for the court, in charging the jury, to read Civ. Code 1912, § 3330, allowing recovery in such cases.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 562, 563; Dec. Dig. § 241.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Anderson County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

Action by Alice Gossett and another against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appealed. Affirmed.

Geo. H. Fearons, of New York City, John Gary Evans, of Spartanburg, and Bonham, Watkins & Allen, of Anderson, for appellant. A. H. Dagnall, of Anderson, for respondents.

WATTS, J. This was an action by plaintiffs against defendant for mental anguish, caused by failure to deliver promptly to plaintiff's husband a telegram announcing the death of her father. The action was both for actual and punitive damages. The cause was heard by his honor, Judge Shipp, and a jury, at the February term of the court, 1913, and at the close of the evidence the plaintiffs withdrew from the jury the question of punitive damages. The jury found for the plaintiffs $1,500 and the judge granted a new trial, unless the plaintiffs would remit $500 of this amount, which they did. After entry of judgment, the defendant appealed, and asks reversal of the same by nine exceptions, eight of which impute error to his honor in his charge to the jury.

[1] The judge's charge, as a whole, is free from error, and if the appellant desired more specific instructions it should have presented requests to charge.

[2] His honor read to the jury what is known as "the Mental Anguish Act" (section 3330, Code of Laws, 1912), and his charge is sustained by the cases of Mercer v. Southern Railway Co., 66 S. C. 247, 44 S. E. 750; Hughes v. Telegraph Co., 72 S. C. 517, 52 S. E. 107; Tinsley v. Telegraph Co., 72 S. C. 350, 51 S. E. 913; Fall v. Telegraph Co., 80 S. C. 207, 60 S. E. 697, 61 S. E. 258; Bennett v. Street Railway Co., 92 S. C. 75, 75 S. E. 277; Roberts v. Telegraph Co., 73 S. C. 524, 53 S. E. 985, 114 Am. St. Rep. 100. These exceptions are overruled.

The ninth exception complains of error on the part of his honor in not granting a new trial. This exception cannot be sustained, as there was sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict.

Judgment affirmed.

STATE ex rel. BATES et al. v. PATTERSON, County Sup'r, et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 24, 1913.)

CONVICTS (§ 10*)—EMPLOYMENT—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION—"CONNECTION."

County authorities, in the construction of a road, contracted to prepare the road for top covering, the latter to be laid by contractors. The county, in preparing the substructure, used prisoners composing a chain gang, working them only about half a block in advance of the contractors' employes. Held a violation of Civ. Code 1912, § 957, providing that the chain gang shall not be worked in connection with or near any road contractor or overseer; the word "connection" meaning the state of being connected or joined, union by junction, by an intervening substance or medium, by dependence or relation, or by order in a series.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Convicts, Cent. Dig. §§ 19, 20, 22-29, 32; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1434, 1435.]

Petition by the State, on relation of H. G. Bates and others, against Andrew Patterson, Jr., as County Supervisor of Richland County and Chairman of the Board of County Commissioners, and others, for an injunction. Writ granted.

De Bohl & McLauchlin, of Columbia, for petitioners. Clarkson & Clarkson and Melton & Belser, all of Columbia, for respondents.

FRASER, J. This is a proceeding in the original jurisdiction of this court to enjoin the county authorities of Richland county from using the chain gang of Richland county in the construction of a highway within what was formerly the town of Shandon, now a part of the city of Columbia. There are several questions involved in the hearing on the merits, but one is sufficient for the purposes of this motion.

It is conceded by the county authorities that the road is being built under contractors. The county is to prepare the road for a top covering, or bitulithic covering, and the bitulithic covering is to be put on by the employes of the contractors. It is further conceded that the chain gang is kept only a half block in advance of the contractors' employes. The Code of 1912 (section 957) contains this proviso: "Provided, that said chain gang shall not be worked in connection with or near any road contractor or overseer." The Century Dictionary defines "connection": "1. The state of being connected or joined; union by junction, by an intervening substance or medium, by dependence or relation, or by order in a series."

Where one is laying the substructure and the other the superstructure, the parties are working in connection with each other. On the face of the statute it appears to be forbidden. The effect of the several statutes on each other cannot be settled until the exact status of the Codes under the Constitution is determined. That question is now before the Supreme Court, and ought not to be decided by one member. On the face of this statute, the collaboration of the chain gang and the employes of a contractor is forbidden, and the respondents ought not to proceed in this way until the question can be heard by the full court.

It is therefore ordered that the respondents be, and they are hereby, enjoined from using the chain gang in connection with the employes of the contractors in the building and construction of the road mentioned in the petition herein, until the hearing of the proceeding in open court and the determination thereof by its judgment herein.

On Petition for Rehearing.

COMMERCE (§ 8*)—POWERS REMAINING TO STATE—LIABILITY OF TERMINAL CARRIER.

The Carmack Amendment June 20, 1906, c. 3591, § 7, 34 Stat. 593 (U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1911, p. 1307) to the Interstate Commerce Act Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, § 20, 24 Stat. 386 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3169), imposing a liability for damage to goods shipped upon the initial carrier, and providing that it shall not deprive the owner of any right which he had under the existing law, does not deprive a consignee of his right to a penalty for failure of the terminal carrier to pay the damages to a shipment or to inform the consignee of which carrier caused the damage, given by Act Feb.

15, 1910 (26 St. at Large, p. 717, Civ. Code 1912, § 2572), since the two statutes refer to the liability of different carriers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. § 5; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Geo. W. Gage, Judge.

Action by M. B. Du Pre against the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed, and petition for rehearing dismissed.

Lyles & Lyles, of Columbia, for appellant. Rembert & Monteth, of Columbia, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. This action was brought against defendant, the terminal carrier of an interstate shipment, to recover the penalty provided by statute (26 Stat. 717, Civil Code 1912, § 2572) for failure to pay the damages to a shipment, or trace it and inform the consignee when, where, and by which carrier it was damaged, within 40 days after notice thereof. Defendant admits liability for the penalty if the statute imposing it is not in conflict with the federal statute regulating interstate commerce.

In Meetze v. Sou. Express Co., 91 S. C. 379, 74 S. E. 823, it was held that, as to initial carriers of interstate commerce, the state statute was superseded by the federal statute, because the purpose of the state statute was to find out which carrier is liable, and the federal statute answers that question as to initial carriers by making them liable at all events. The same reasoning, however, does not apply when it is sought to enforce the state statute against intermediate or terminal carriers, because their liability to the owner of the goods is not affected by the federal statute. The proviso to the Carmack amendment reads: "That nothing in this section shall deprive any holder of such receipt or bill of lading of any remedy or right of action which he has under existing law." If, therefore, the owner finds it to his advantage to pursue the carrier who actually lost or damaged his goods, the same not being the initial carrier, it is as necessary now, as it was at the time of the adoption of the Carmack amendment, that he have the information which the statute requires the carriers to furnish, which they can usually and readily do. The federal statute does not cover the same field as the state statute, when applied to the intermediate or terminal carriers; and therefore, as to these, there is no conflict.

It has been settled by repeated decisions of this court and of the Supreme Court of the United States that statutes like this are within the power of the states, in the absence of federal legislation on the same subject. Winslow v. Railroad Co., 79 S. C. 344, 60 S. E. 709, and cases cited; Richmond &

GARY, C. J., and WOODS, WATTS, and FRASER, JJ., concur.

On Petition for Rehearing.

HYDRICK, J. The petition for rehearing in this case is based upon the ground that, since the filing of the opinion herein, the Supreme Court of the United States has held, in the case of Adams Express Co. v. Croninger, 226 U. S. 491, 33 Sup. Ct. 148, 57 L. Ed. 314, filed January 6, 1913, that the proviso to the Carmack amendment, which saves to the holder of the bill of lading "any remedy or right of action which he has under existing law," must be construed as saving only remedies and rights which he had under existing federal law, and that therefore that proviso cannot be held to save to the holder of the bill of lading the right and remedy given him by the statute of this state, under which defendant was penalized, for failing to furnish the consignee the information required by the statute. It is also contended that the statute is in conflict with the Carmack amendment, as the amendment was interpreted and applied by the Supreme Court in the Croninger Case.

In the case of Varnville Furniture Co. v. C. & W. C. R. Co., 79 S. E. 700, we attempted to show that the language of the Supreme Court in the Croninger Case, properly construed, did not have the effect of limiting the proviso to the Carmack amendment to the saving of rights and remedies existing only under federal law, but that the court gave it the same construction which had been given a similar provision in the act of 1887 to regulate commerce in Texas & Pacific Ry. Co. v. Abilene Cotton Oil Co., 204 U. S. 426, 27 Sup. Ct. 350, 51 L. Ed. 553, 9 Ann. Cas. 1075, to wit: "That it was 'evidently only intended to continue in existence such other rights or remedies for the redress of some specific wrong or injury, whether given by the interstate commerce act or by state statute or common law, not inconsistent with the rules and regulations prescribed by the provisions of this act.'" (Italics added.)

What we said in the Varnville Case is applicable in this case, because that decision is rested upon the ground that there is no federal legislation upon the subject covered by the state statute, and for the same reason we hold that the statute assailed in this case is valid. The principle upon which we decided that case is so clearly and cogently stated in Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Ry. Co. v. Hardwick Farmers' Elevator Co., 226 U. S. 426, 33 Sup. Ct. 174, 57 L. Ed. 284 (decided January 6, 1913), that we quote it as there stated. After having shown that Congress has legislated concerning the deliveries of cars in interstate commerce by carriers subject to the act by imposing a specific duty to furnish them for interstate traffic upon reasonable request therefor, and by giving remedies for the violation of that duty, the court proceeded: "As legislation concerning the delivery of cars for the carriage of interstate traffic was clearly a matter of interstate commerce regulation, even if such subject was embraced within that class of powers concerning which the state had a right to exert its authority in the absence of legislation by Congress, it must follow, in consequence of the action of Congress to which we have referred, that the power of the state over the subject-matter ceased to exist from the moment that Congress exerted its paramount and all-embracing authority over the subject. We say this because the elementary and long-settled doctrine is that there can be no divided authority over interstate commerce and that the regulations of Congress on that subject are supreme. It results, therefore, that in a case where, from the particular nature of certain subjects, the state may exert authority until Congress acts under the assumption that Congress by inaction has tacitly authorized it to do so, action by Congress destroys the possibility of such assumption, since such action, when exerted, covers the whole field and renders the state impotent to deal with a subject over which it had no inherent but only permissive power. Southern R. Co. v. Reid, 222 U. S. 424 [32 Sup. Ct. 140] 56 L. Ed. 257."

Clearly, therefore, until Congress takes possession of the field covered by this statute, its validity remains unimpaired, and there is no conflict either as to the exercise of the power over the subject or in the regulation affecting it. The vital question, then, is: Has Congress legislated upon the same subject? Certainly the Carmack amendment does not deal with it. In the Varnville Case we showed that the subject of the Carmack amendment was "the liability of the carrier under a bill of lading which he must issue." We believe the legislation of Congress will be searched in vain to find any provision which even indirectly deals with the same subject that is covered by this statute (the requiring of intermediate and terminal carriers to inform the shipper when, where, and by which carrier in the route his goods were lost or damaged), if they can furnish that information by the exercise of reasonable diligence, a duty which in no wise affects the liability under the bill of lading. In Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. Seegers, 207 U. S. 73, 28 Sup. Ct. 28, 52 L. Ed. 108, and in Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Riverside Mills, 219 U. S. 200, 31 Sup. Ct. 164, 55 L. Ed. 180, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 7, and in other cases, the Supreme Court has pointed out the fact and made it a ground of decision that "the business association of such carriers affords to each facilities for locating primary responsibility as between themselves which the shipper cannot have."

In Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Harriman, 227 U. S. 657, 33 Sup. Ct. 397, 57 L. Ed. 690, decided March 10, 1913, the court held that a stipulation in a bill of lading limiting to 90 days the time within which an action can be brought against the carrier to enforce liability for loss or damage en route is valid, and that it supersedes state laws to the contrary. The reason is therefore the greater why carriers should furnish the shipper the information required by this statute.

If the carrier is allowed to say to the shipper, "You must bring your action for loss or damage within 90 days from the happening thereof, and you can recover only against the carrier on whose line the injury occurred, unless you sue the primary carrier, under authority of the Carmack amendment," certainly the shipper should have the right to say to the carrier who delivers his goods to him in a damaged condition, or fails to deliver them at all, "Then you must tell me when, where, and by which carrier in the route the damage was done, if you can get that information by the exercise of reasonable diligence."

For the foregoing reasons, the petition is dismissed. But, inasmuch as counsel for appellant have asked that the remittitur be further stayed to give them time and opportunity to apply to the Supreme Court of the United States for a writ of error, it is ordered that the remittitur be further stayed for a period of 30 days from the filing of this order.

GARY, C. J., and FRASER, J., concur.

WATTS, J. I gave my views in reference to the matters involved in this petition in my dissenting opinion in the case of Varnville Furniture Co. v. C. & W. C. R. Co., but a majority of the court decided otherwise and I am bound by that decision, and for this concur in dismissing the petition herein.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Greenville County; R. O. Purdy, Special Judge.

T. U. Vaughn pleaded guilty to a charge of rape and was sentenced to death by electrocution, and he appeals. Affirmed, and petition for rehearing dismissed.

The defendant was placed on trial, under an indictment containing three counts, the first charging him with rape upon Etta Jackson, the second with intent to ravish her, and the third with carnal knowledge of her; she being a woman child under 14 years of age.

After the trial had proceeded from the 24th until the 26th of October, 1912, the record shows that the following took place: "Mr. Martin: May it please the court, after consultation with the solicitor and the gentlemen representing the state, and with the defendant himself, we have reached an agreement that at this stage the defendant will withdraw his plea of 'not guilty' and enter a plea of 'guilty' with the understanding that he may go on the stand and make a full statement of such statement as he may desire, to the court and the jury, and the only question which we will submit to the jury, without argument, is the question of a recommendation to mercy. Mr. Bonham: With the understanding that this is not accepted by the state as a compromise at all, but that it will shorten affairs and prevent the necessity of offering further testimony along this line and save the other little girls of the embarrassment of going on the stand and testifying, we are willing to submit the matter to the jury, 12 fair-minded men, as to what punishment shall be inflicted upon this man. We want it understood that this is no compromise at all. We consider that all the jury wants to know is the truth, and we only agree to this in order that the case may be determined without going over into next week." T. U. Vaughn, the defendant, then took the stand as a witness and on cross-examination of the solicitor thus testified: "Q. Now you have pleaded guilty to these charges and have thrown yourself on the mercy of the court and jury. You don't want to conceal anything from the jury? A. No, sir. Q. You want them to know the entire enormity of your offense out there? A. Yes, sir; there is nothing hidden in my heart. Q. Then you do not deny that Etta Jackson is not the only little girl out there that you ruined? A. (To his counsel: Must I answer that? Mr. Martin: Yes, tell the truth.) Yes, I do not deny it. Q. You had intercourse with Della Cooper? A. Not at the home. Q. But you had intercourse with her? A. Yes, sir. Q. You had intercourse with Beulah Dunnoway? A. Yes, sir. Q. You had intercourse with Sadie Craig? A. Yes, sir. Q. You had intercourse with Mamie Corbin? A. No, sir. Q. You had intercourse with Blanche Flower? A. Yes, sir. Q. Five little girls out there, with whom you bore the relationship of parent and child, and whom you ruined? A. Yes, sir; to my shame I must admit it. Q. Mr. Vaughn, you are here asking for the mercy of this court and jury. Did you at the time you were having intercourse with these little girls realize that your act blighted their lives? A. I didn't; I couldn't have realized it; now I do." At the close of his testimony, the record shows that the following took place: "By Mr. Patton, Foreman of the Jury: Q. You said that you had intercourse with these girls, I want to know if they consented to what you did? A. I will say this: That actually no force was ever used. I assume full responsibility for what was done in that I stood in the attitude of a father to them. I hate to say that, but there was never anything done without their consent. Q. What age were they? A. I don't know. I suppose from 14 to 15 years old, and on up."

His honor, the presiding judge, in charging the jury, thus explained the nature and the force and effect of the defendant's plea: "After the state had offered a number of witnesses, on the charges brought against the defendant, and after their testimony had been taken in open court, the defendant appeared before you in open court and withdrew his plea of 'not guilty' with the understanding that he be allowed to make a full statement before you, with the right of cross-examination on the part of the state. In other words, he was to go on the witness stand as a witness and make his statement, which he did make to you, and then withdrew his plea of 'not guilty' and entered a plea of 'guilty.' While it is out of the usual order of things, yet counsel thought that by taking this method they would stop further inquiry on the part of the state and stop the necessity of taking further testimony before you. Had this case gone on in the usual manner and come before you at the conclusion of all the testimony, it would have been my duty to charge you that you should consider each count in the indictment separately. In other words, if you believed that the testimony beyond a reasonable doubt warranted a conviction as to rape, then you can find the defendant guilty, with or without recommendation to mercy. Or, if not guilty of that, you should consider the other charges made against him, and if found guilty you should convict him in accordance with the testimony. If found not guilty, you should say so. It would have been my duty to call your attention to those various counts and to have instructed you that, if you did not convict on one count, you could convict on either of the other two counts, and that your verdict should say on what charge you convicted him. If you found him not guilty, you should say 'not guilty.' Now all the aspect of the case is changed. He has withdrawn his plea of 'not guilty' and entered a plea of 'guilty.' So that now, gentlemen of the jury, it is for you to consider all the facts and circumstances surrounding the case and determine whether or not you should recommend him to mercy of the court. That is the whole issue for you. Because the plea of guilty carries with it a plea of guilty to the highest offense charged in the indictment, and that is the whole question for you. It is for you to say whether the death penalty shall be inflicted. If you should come in and say 'guilty,' that would mean that in due time the defendant would be taken to the electric chair and there suffer the penalty of death. If you say that you will recommend him to the mercy of the court and you understand that his plea is entered with the understanding that you shall consider his case, it will be my duty to sentence the defendant to hard labor in the penitentiary for a period of not less than 5 years nor more than 40 years. You have heard the testimony; you have heard his statement. You are just as capable of understanding the nature of this case as I. His plea has been made in open court, and it is for you to consider all the facts and circumstances, as you have heard them brought out on the stand, and it is for you to say whether you will write your verdict 'guilty' or whether you will recommend him to the mercy of the court."

The jury found a verdict of "guilty," and the court imposed upon the defendant the sentence of death by electrocution on the 20th of December, 1912, whereupon he appealed upon the following exceptions:

"(1) Because his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in rejecting the proposed juror, N. B. Rector, there being no sufficient evidence in law of bias or other disqualifications, and error in refusing motion for new trial upon this ground.

"(2) Because his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in rejecting the proposed juror, J. B. Brockman, there being no sufficient evidence in law of bias or other disqualifications, and error in refusing motion for new trial upon this ground.

"(3) Because his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in rejecting the proposed juror, G. W. Morrow, there being no sufficient evidence in law of bias or other disqualifications, and error in refusing motion for new trial upon this ground.

"(4) Because his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in accepting the juror, Avery Patton, against defendant's objection since he should have been excluded for bias, and error in refusing motion for new trial upon this ground."

The fifth and sixth exceptions were abandoned:

"(7) Because his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in sentencing defendant to electrocution in the state penitentiary, under the direction of the superintendent of that institution, in accordance with act of 1912 (27 St. at L. 702), since as to the case at bar said act was unconstitutional in that it is an ex post facto law and therefore contravenes article 1, § 8, of the South Carolina Constitution of 1895, and also article 1, § 9, of the United States Constitution, and is therefore void.

"(8) Error of his honor in charging, in substance, that the plea of not guilty was withdrawn and a plea of guilty substituted, when defendant did not and was not required to enter such plea in person, either orally or by sign of assent, as required by law in a capital case, especially since his statement on the stand was a denial of guilt, and both the court and defendant's counsel erred in construing such statement as a confession of guilt; it was a confession of guilt of great moral wrong but not of rape or other charge of this indictment.

"(9) Because his honor erred in failing to charge that the issue as to whether defendant was guilty or not guilty was one of the issues in this case: (a) Because he had not personally entered a plea of guilty as required by law; (b) because his sworn testimony not only did not amount to a confession of any offense charged in the indictment but contradicted the plea of guilty as to each and every offense.

"(10) Error of his honor, the presiding judge: (a) In failing to advise the prisoner of the nature and consequence of his plea; and (b) in failing to have it affirmatively appear that the alleged plea of the confession was voluntary, as the law requires in capital cases."

McCullough, Martin & Blythe, of Greenville, for appellant. P. A. Bonham and J. J. McSwain, both of Greenville, for the State.

GARY, C. J. The first, second, third, and fourth exceptions will be considered together.

[1, 2] There are two reasons why these exceptions cannot be sustained: (1) The appellant's attorneys have failed to show an abuse of discretion on the part of his honor, the presiding judge; and (2) the right to insist upon the errors assigned was waived when the defendant withdrew his plea of "not guilty."

[3] The fifth and sixth exceptions will not be considered for the reason that they were abandoned. The recent case of State v. Malloy, 78 S. E. 995, which was decided by this court, shows that the seventh exception cannot be sustained.

[4] The eighth, ninth, and tenth exceptions will be considered together, conceding that the defendant would have been entitled to all the rights claimed in these exceptions, if he had insisted upon them, in the manner provided by the rules of practice; nevertheless it clearly appears that he waived said rights in expectation that the jury would recommend him to the mercy of the court, thereby enabling him to escape the death penalty. At the time he withdrew his plea of "not guilty" he had no reasonable ground for supposing that the jury would render any other verdict than that of "guilty"; and the method which he adopted, it would seem, might naturally have been expected to increase his chances of appealing to the sympathy of the jury and thereby induce them to recommend him to the mercy of the court. There is no doubt that the defendant had the right to waive compliance with the technical features of law as to the manner in which his plea should be accepted.

[5] "Waiver is voluntary and implies an election to dispense with something of value, or forego some advantage, which the party waiving it might at his option have demanded or insisted upon. A waiver takes place when a man dispenses with the performance of something which he has a right to exact.

A party may waive a constitutional as well as a statutory provision for his benefit, as a trial by jury, though that mode is guaranteed to him by the Constitution; and, when waived by such party, he will be estopped from setting them up or claiming them." Herman on Estoppel and Res Judicata, vol. 2, p. 954. The same author at page 958 says: "A defendant has a constitutional right to a speedy trial. Yet he may waive this provision by obtaining a continuance. He may plead guilty, which generally dispenses with a jury trial. . . . A defect in the Constitution or organization, which does not prevent the presence of 12 competent jurors, by whose votes the indictment is found, and which could have been cured if the attention of the court had been called to it at the time or promptly remedied by the impaneling of a competent grand jury, is waived if the defendant treats the indictment as sufficient, pleads not guilty, and goes to trial on the merits of the charge. There is good sense in this conclusion. The indictment is the charge of the state against the defendant, the pleading by which he is informed of the fact, and the nature and scope of the occasion. When that indictment is presented, that accusation made, that pleading filed, the accused has two courses of procedure open to him. He may question the propriety of the accusation, the manner in which he has been presented, the source from which it proceeds, and have these matters promptly and properly determined, or, waiving them, he may put in issue the truth of the accusation and demand the judgment of his peers on the merits of the charge. If he omits the former and chooses the latter, he ought not, when defeated on the latter when found guilty of the crime charged, to be permitted to go back to the former and inquire as to the manner and means by which the charge was presented."

The foregoing language and that from Herman on Estoppel and Res Judicata were quoted with approval in the case of the State v. Faile, 48 S. C. 52, 20 S. E. 798, in which there was an appeal from the sentence of death.

Nothing was omitted during the trial of which the defendant has just cause of complaint. He, his attorneys, the presiding judge, and the jury unquestionably understood fully the nature, force, and effect of the plea made by the defendant; he was represented by exceedingly able counsel; the plea was not interposed until two days after the commencement of the trial; the presiding judge clearly stated the nature, force, and effect of the plea, to which neither the defendant nor his counsel made any objection; the testimony which had then been introduced indicated that there were no reasonable grounds for hoping that the jury would render any other verdict than that of guilty.

These exceptions are therefore overruled.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed and that the case be remanded to that court for the purpose of having another day assigned for carrying into execution the sentence of death imposed upon the defendant.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. After careful consideration of the petition herein, this court is satisfied that no material question of law or of fact has either been overlooked or disregarded. It is therefore ordered that the petition be dismissed but that the remittitur be stayed until the further order of the court in order that the petitioner may apply for a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States if so advised; notice having been given of such intention.

STATE v. SPEARS.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 778*)—INSTRUCTION—HOMICIDE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where there were no witnesses to a homicide, and no testimony as to how it occurred except defendant's, a charge that, if the evidence showed beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant killed deceased, then the burden shifted to defendant to explain it, because, nothing else appearing than that one man has killed another, the presumption is the killing was unlawful, was not erroneous when applied to the facts.

2. HOMICIDE (§ 340*)—APPEAL AND ERROR—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTION.

Where, under the undisputed evidence, a homicide was either in self-defense, or was murder, erroneous charges as to manslaughter were harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 715-717, 720; Dec. Dig. § 340.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 763, 764*)—INSTRUCTION—CHARGE ON FACTS.

Where it was undisputed that defendant killed deceased, and also that the killing was either in self-defense or murder, a charge that the law of self-defense arises out of necessity, "and right there is the pivotal point in the case," was not erroneous as a charge upon the facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1731-1743, 1752, 1768, 1770; Dec. Dig. §§ 763, 764.*]

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Marlboro County; Geo. W. Gage, Judge.

Wilson Spears was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed. Rehearing denied.

J. K. Owen, of Bennettsville, for appellant. Solicitor J. Monroe Spears, of Darlington, for the State.

HYDRICK, J. This is an appeal from sentence upon conviction of murder, with recommendation to mercy. The testimony is very meager and indefinite as to the details of the quarrel between the defendant and the deceased, which seems to have arisen immediately before the fatal encounter, and to have led up to it. As well as we can gather from the testimony, there was a frolic at the house of a negro woman, named Milly Kelly, which was attended by the defendant, the deceased, and others. The deceased and Abram Mack got into a row in the house, and they and Oscar Mack, Abram's father, went out to settle their difficulty. While they were so engaged, the defendant approached them, and asked the deceased for a match. The deceased replied, with an oath, that he had no match. After some bandying of words and oaths at each other about the match, each went home and got his gun and returned. The defendant's home was about half a mile away. When they met again, on their way back to the Kelly house, each shot the other. The defendant testified that, as he stepped into a certain path on the way back, the deceased called upon him to "Halt"; that he looked and saw deceased holding up his gun to shoot, and he did shoot; and that he (defendant) threw up his gun as quickly as he could, and shot. He explained his returning to the Kelly house by saying that he left his sister there, and went back to escort her home, and that he carried his gun to protect himself.

[1, 2] The first exception assigns error in the following instruction: "If the testimony satisfies you beyond a reasonable doubt that Spears killed Thomas, then the burden shifted on Spears to explain it, and to satisfy the jury that the law excuses him. Because, nothing else appearing, and it appearing that one man killed another, the presumption is the killing was unlawful." While it may not be true, as an abstract proposition, applicable under all circumstances, that the mere fact that one man has killed another will raise the presumption that the killing was unlawful, yet the charge of a trial judge must always be construed as applicable to the facts of the case on trial. When so applied, there was no error in the instruction above quoted. The killing was done with a deadly weapon. There was no legal provocation in the first encounter of words, which could have reduced the killing to manslaughter. If there had been, there was ample cooling time. Therefore, in no possible view of the evidence would the jury have been warranted in finding a verdict of manslaughter. Under the undisputed evidence, the defendant either killed the deceased in self-defense, and was entitled to acquittal, or he was guilty of murder. That being so, and the jury having found a verdict of murder, the assignments of error in the charge as to the law of manslaughter are immaterial, and need not be considered.

[3] On the law of self-defense, the court charged: "The law of self-defense arises out of necessity, actual or presumed. Right there is the pivotal question in the case." The error assigned is that this was a charge on the facts, in that it directed the minds of the jurors solely to the defense, and left out of view all questions relative to the state's case, including the question of malice. The undisputed evidence warranted the charge. Under the evidence, there was no reasonable ground for any contention as to the fact that defendant had killed the deceased, and, as we have shown, there was no legally possible ground for any other than a verdict of murder or of acquittal on the plea of self-defense. Therefore the judge was clearly right, when he said that was the pivotal point in the case. In fact and law, it was the only point in the case.

Judgment affirmed.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 12, 1913.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 32*)—INTERSTATE COMMERCE—RATES.

An interstate carrier can charge no more and no less than the rate filed with and approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission and published as the lawful rate, and a greater or less charge cannot be justified on the ground of mistake.

2. CARRIERS (§ 36*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—ACTION FOR REFUSAL TO CARRY.

In an action against a carrier for damages for refusal to carry goods at the rate filed with and published by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the question, whether the carrier refused to transport the goods except at an excessive rate held for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 95; Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 343*)—VERDICT—EFFECT.

The verdict must be construed as resolving all inferences in favor of the successful party.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 209*)—PRESENTATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW IN COURT BELOW—NECESSITY.

Where not raised below, a carrier, in an action for damages for refusal to transport freight at the regular interstate rate, cannot contend on appeal that there was no evidence of such refusal.

5. COURTS (§ 489*)—INTERSTATE COMMERCE—JURISDICTION OF STATE COURTS.

Where an interstate carrier refused to carry freight at the regular interstate rate, the state courts have jurisdiction of an action by the shipper for damages, the remedy being the ordinary common-law one, which was preserved by section 22 of the act to regulate interstate commerce (Act Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, 24 Stat. 387 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3170]), which declares that nothing shall in any way abrogate or alter the remedies now existing at common law or by statute, but the provisions of this act shall be cumulative.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1324-1330, 1333-1341, 1372-1374; Dec. Dig. § 489.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 930*)—INSTRUCTIONS—PRESUMPTIONS.

In an action by a shipper for damages suffered by reason of an interstate carrier's refusal to transport a shipment of goods at the rate published by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the carrier cannot successfully contend on appeal that a judgment in favor of the shipper should be reversed because damages were recoverable only if there was notice to the carrier of the number of cars that were to be shipped, where the court by its charge limited the consideration of the jury to the damages arising out of the carrier's refusal to transport two cars which had already been ordered, for it must be assumed that the jury followed the charge.

7. CARRIERS (§ 36*)—FAILURE TO TRANSPORT GOODS—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Where an interstate carrier refused to transport goods at the regular interstate rate, the measure of damages was not the mere difference between the correct rate and the quoted rate where, by reason of the higher quotation, the shipper was forced to forego the shipment and sell the goods at a loss.

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

In an action against an interstate carrier for damages for refusal to transport a shipment at the regular interstate rate, the admission of letters of the general freight agent to plaintiff, quoting an incorrect rate, was harmless where the correct rate was proven by undisputed evidence.

9. CARRIERS (§ 36*)—INTERSTATE COMMERCE—RATES—ACTION FOR DAMAGE.

As the Interstate Commerce Act (Act Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, 24 Stat. 379 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3154]) merely provides that the certificate of the secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be prima facie evidence of the correctness of the rates certified, the actual rate prescribed may be proven by other evidence, and so letters of an interstate carrier's general freight agent, quoting an incorrect rate, are admissible in an action by a shipper to recover damages for the refusal of the carrier to transport a shipment upon payment of the lawful charges.

10. EVIDENCE (§ 474*)—OPINIONS—MARKET VALUE.

In an action by a shipper to recover damages sustained by reason of the refusal of an interstate carrier to transport goods at the rate fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, where the shipper, by reason of the excessive rate, was forced to forego the shipment and sell the goods at a loss, he may testify as to their market value at the place of destination, having stated that he knew what their market value was, by reason of information gained on visits to that point and the reports of persons engaged in the sale of the goods shipped.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Barnwell County; W. B. De Loach, Special Judge.

Action by Alfred Aldrich against the Southern Railway Company and the Southern Railway, Carolina Division. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Harley & Best, of Barnwell, for appellants. R. C. Holman, of Barnwell, and W. H. Townsend, of Columbia, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. For several seasons prior to 1909-10, the plaintiff had engaged in buying cotton seed and shipping them to Mexico, over the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad, for sale for planting purposes. Defendant's agent at Barnwell solicited the business, and plaintiff told him that, if defendant would give him better rates than the Coast Line, he would ship over defendant's road.

It appears from the evidence that it is quite difficult, if not impossible in some cases, for the local railroad agents to figure out, from the schedule of rates filed and published, the correct rate applicable to interstate shipments; and it is specially difficult, when the matter is complicated, as it was in this case, by the fact that the units of weight and value in the two countries are different and the rate of exchange between them is variable. Hence the defendant's local agent referred the matter to the general freight agent, who testified that he was employed especially for that purpose.

On October 16, 1909, he wrote plaintiff that the rate on seed in car load lots, from Barnwell, S. C., to Torreón and Gómez Palacio, Mexico, was 90½ cents per hundred pounds. According to the schedule of rates filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission at that time and published, the correct rate was 97½ cents per hundred pounds. Some time after receiving this letter, plaintiff made requisition on defendant's local agent for a number of empty cars to be loaded for shipment. On October 26th or 27th, after plaintiff had loaded two cars and was loading the third, defendant's local agent informed him that an error had been made in quoting the rate, and that it was 10 cents a hundred more than the rate quoted. That would have made the rate 100½ cents per hundred. Plaintiff told the agent that he could not use that rate, and thereafter he shipped the seed in the two cars, which he had already bought and paid for, to an oil mill in Columbia, S. C., and sold them at a loss. Thereafter, on October 30th, but after plaintiff had sold the seed which he intended to ship to Mexico, defendant's general freight agent informed plaintiff that the correct rate was 97½ per hundred. Plaintiff would have paid the correct rate if he had been informed what it was before he had sold the seed.

This action was brought to recover damages for lost profits on the sale of 25 car loads of seed contemplated and contracted for. Plaintiff testified that he paid not exceeding $24 per ton for the seed he bought, and that they were worth $37.50 per ton in Mexico. He also testified that he actually bought and paid for only the two car loads mentioned, and that the persons with whom he had contracted to buy other seed released him from liability on his contracts. He claimed damages for the loss of profits on 25 car loads; but the court instructed the jury that he could recover only the damages which he actually sustained. The verdict was in his favor for $390. In view of the evidence of the plaintiff above stated, and the instructions above stated, and the amount of the verdict, we conclude that the jury awarded damages only for the loss of profits on the two car loads of seed which plaintiff actually bought and paid for and tendered to defendant for shipment.

[1] According to the undisputed evidence, the court ruled and instructed the jury that 97½ cents, the rate which had been filed with and approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission and published, was the lawful rate and the only rate which defendant could lawfully charge or collect; that defendant was bound by law to charge and collect that rate, no more and no less; and that if defendant refused to receive and transport the seed, except upon payment of a higher rate, it was liable to plaintiff for the resulting damages. We think the court was right in this ruling and instruction. No error in quoting a rate which has been filed with the Commission and published will be allowed to prevent a carrier from collecting the correct rate applicable to an interstate shipment. Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Hefley, 158 U. S. 98, 15 Sup. Ct. 802, 39 L. Ed. 910; Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Mugg, 202 U. S. 242, 26 Sup. Ct. 628, 50 L. Ed. 1011; Texas & C. R. Co. v. Abilene Cotton Oil Co., 204 U. S. 426, 27 Sup. Ct. 350, 51 L. Ed. 553, 9 Ann. Cas. 1075. Such an error is not binding upon either carrier or shipper, because both are presumed to know the correct rate. United States v. Miller, 223 U. S.

But the allegations and the evidence involve something more, to wit, the refusal of defendant to receive and carry the shipment, except upon the payment of an unlawful charge. If the fact be that defendant did so refuse, it incurred liability for the resulting damages. Avinger v. S. C. R. Co., 29 S. C. 265, 7 S. E. 493, 13 Am. St. Rep. 716; 5 A. & E. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 158. In the Abilene Case the Supreme Court of the United States said: "Without going into detail, it may not be doubted that at common law, where a carrier refused to receive goods offered for carriage except upon the payment of an unreasonable sum, the shipper had a right of action in damages. * * * As the right to recover, which the court below sustained, was clearly within the principles just stated, and as it is conceded that the act to regulate commerce did not in so many words abrogate such right, it follows that the contention that the right was taken away by the act to regulate commerce rests upon the proposition that such result was accomplished by implication. In testing the correctness of this proposition, we concede that we must be guided by the principle that repeals by implication are not favored, and indeed that a statute will not be construed as taking away a common-law right existing at the date of its enactment, unless that result is imperatively required; that is to say, unless it be found that the pre-existing right is so repugnant to the statute that the survival of such right would in effect deprive the subsequent statute of its efficacy—in other words, render its provisions nugatory." (Italics added.) That case and the others above cited hold that the rate filed and published is presumed to be reasonable, and that no other can be lawfully exacted.

[2-4] Under the circumstances detailed, the loading of the seed into cars furnished by defendant, with the intent of both parties that they were to be shipped to Mexico over defendant's road, was sufficient to warrant the inference of a tender of them for such shipment; and the quotation of an excessive rate, even though it was done under the belief that it was the lawful rate, was enough to justify the inference of a refusal to transport the seed, except upon payment of the rate quoted. Whether, under all the circumstances, such inferences should have been drawn were questions of fact which were properly submitted to the jury; and, under the charge, the verdict must be construed as resolving them in plaintiff's favor and as establishing the fact that plaintiff's recovery was based upon defendant's refusal to receive and transport the seed, except upon payment of an unlawful exaction. Moreover, defendant is concluded from contending in this court that there was no testimony tending to show such refusal, because that point was not made in the circuit court.

[5] We think there can be no doubt that the circuit court had jurisdiction of the action. It was based on the violation of a common law duty. In the Abilene Case, after stating the principles above quoted, the court proceeded to show that the remedy invoked by the shipper was so inconsistent with the provisions, purpose, and intent of the act to regulate commerce that, if allowed, it would prove to be destructive of it. In construing section 22 of that act, which says that "nothing in this act contained shall in any way abrogate or alter the remedies now existing at common law or by statute, but the provisions of this act are in addition to such remedies," the court said: "This clause, however, cannot in reason be construed as continuing in shippers a common-law right, the continued existence of which would be absolutely inconsistent with the provisions of the act. In other words, the act cannot be held to destroy itself. The clause is concerned alone with rights recognized in or duties imposed by the act, and the manifest purpose of the provision in question was to make plain the intention that any specific remedy given by the act should be regarded as cumulative, when other appropriate common-law or statutory remedies existed for the redress of the particular grievance or wrong dealt with in the act." In this case not only does the common law afford a remedy for the particular grievance complained of but it is entirely consistent with the provisions of the act regulating commerce, and therefore, by the express terms of section 22, it was preserved to the shipper. Gibson v. Railroad Co., 88 S. C. 365, 70 S. E. 1030; Hardaway v. Railway Co., 90 S. C. 475, 73 S. E. 1020; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Larabee Flour Mills Co., 211 U. S. 612, 29 Sup. Ct. 214, 53 L. Ct. 189, 56 L. Ed. 355; Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Wallace, 223 U. S. 481, 32 Sup. Ct. 205, 56 L. Ed. 517; Claffin v. Houseman, 93 U. S. 130, 23 L. Ed. 833; Copp v. L. & N. R. Co., 43 La. Ann. 511, 9 South. 441, 12 L. R. A. 725, 26 Am. St. Rep. 198; Loughlin v. McCauley, 186 Pa. 517, 40 Atl. 1020, 48 L. R. A. 33, 65 Am. St. Rep. 872, and notes.

In Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Wallace, supra, the railroad company was sued in the state court, as the "initial carrier," under the Carmack Amendment (Act June 29, 1906, c. 3591, § 7, 34 Stat. 593 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1307]), for a loss which occurred on a connecting line. Objection was made to the jurisdiction of the state court on the ground that section 9 of the original act to regulate commerce provided that persons damaged by a violation of the statute "might make complaint before the commission * * * or in any District or Circuit Court of the United States." But the court said that "damage caused by failure to deliver goods is in no way traceable to a violation of the statute and is not, therefore, within the provisions of sections 8 and 9 of the act to regulate commerce." With regard to the matter of jurisdiction, the court also said: "Where the statute creating the right provides an exclusive remedy, to be enforced in a particular way or before a special tribunal, the aggrieved party will be left to the remedy given by the statute which created the right. But jurisdiction is not defeated by implication. And, considering the relation between the federal and state government, there is no presumption that Congress intended to prevent state courts from exercising the general jurisdiction already possessed by them and under which they had the power to hear and determine causes of action created by federal statute."

This case does not fall within the principle of the Reid Case, 222 U. S. 424, 32 Sup. Ct. 140, 56 L. Ed. 257. In that case the state court undertook to enforce a state statute which imposed a penalty on common carriers for refusal to receive and transport goods when tendered. At the time the goods were tendered for shipment, the carrier had not filed and published a through rate as required by the act to regulate commerce, which also provided that no carrier should engage in interstate transportation until such schedule of rates was filed and published, and penalized the violation of the inhibition. It clearly appeared, therefore, that the state statute was in conflict with the federal statute and commanded the doing of that which the latter forbade. Necessarily the state statute was held to be void on the principle that, when Congress assumes control of any subject of interstate commerce, all conflicting state laws on the same subject are superseded. This is a necessary consequence of the supremacy of an act of Congress over the subject. For the same reason, a statute of Minnesota, which penalized interstate carriers, for failure to furnish cars on demand for the initiation of interstate shipments, was held void in Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Hardwick Farmers' Elevator Co., 226 U. S. 426, 33 Sup. Ct. 174, 57 L. Ed. 284, decided January 6, 1913.

This case rather falls within the principle announced in Missouri P. R. Co. v. Larabee Flour Mills Co., supra, in which the Supreme Court of Kansas was sustained in compelling a carrier by mandamus to transfer and return loaded and unloaded cars from the line of a connecting carrier to the flour mill of the shipper, on demand and payment of the customary charges therefor, although both carriers were engaged in interstate commerce, and three-fifths of the output of the mill was shipped out of the state. The court held that the state court had jurisdiction to compel the performance of the duty, which was a common-law duty, in the absence of regulation of the same subject by congressional authority. There is nothing in the act to regulate commerce which exempts a common carrier of interstate commerce from the common-law liability for damages for refusing to receive and transport a shipment properly tendered, and there is nothing in the action of the state court enforcing that liability which conflicts with any provision of that act. Therefore, under the authorities above cited, and the cases following, there was no error in overruling the objection to the jurisdiction of the court. Reid v. Colorado, 187 U. S. 137, 23 Sup. Ct. 92, 47 L. Ed. 108; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Haber, 169 U. S. 613, 18 Sup. Ct. 488, 42 L. Ed. 878.

[6] Under the view which we have taken of the case, the objection that plaintiff could not recover damages because there was no notice to the defendant of the number of cars that he intended to ship and of the amount of the damages that he would sustain as the result of defendant's delict (it being contended by defendant that the damages sued for are special damages) need not be considered, because we have seen that, under plaintiff's testimony and the judge's charge, which we are bound to assume the jury obeyed, no damages could have been allowed, except for the loss of profits on the two car loads of seed which plaintiff had bought and paid for, and the amount of the verdict shows that none other were awarded. And as to those two cars, defendant certainly had notice of the circumstances and the purpose of the shipment. We must not be understood, however, as conceding, by these remarks, that the damages recovered were, in fact, special damages or that it would have been necessary to the recovery of such damages that the carrier should have had notice of the number of cars intended to be shipped or of the amount of the damages which would result from any delict on its part with regard to the shipment.

[7] Defendant's contention that the measure of damages was only the difference between the correct rate and the quoted rate cannot be sustained. 5 A. & E. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 388; Hope Cotton Oil Co. v. Texas R. Co., 10 Interst. Com. R. 696.

[8] In view of the fact that the correct rate was proved by undisputed evidence and the jury were correctly instructed what it was, we cannot see how defendant could have been prejudiced by the admission of the letters of the general freight agent to plaintiff, quoting an incorrect rate.

[9] We do not concede, however, that the letters were improperly admitted. We think they were competent. The fact that the certificate of the secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission is made prima facie evidence of the correctness of the rates certified implies that the rate may be proved in some other manner and by some other evidence.

[10] There was no error in allowing the plaintiff to testify as to the market value of seed in Mexico. He testified that he knew what the market value was and, as a basis of his knowledge, said that he had been to Mexico and had also sold seed there through others and had received and accepted the report of sales made by them, which was a fundamental and practical test of the market value. 16 Cyc. 1143.

MARTIN v. HALL.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 11, 1913.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 419*) — PAROL EVIDENCE — DEEDS—CONSIDERATION.

While the recital in a deed of the amount of consideration and its payment is prima facie evidence thereof, it may be shown by parol evidence that the actual consideration paid or promised was different from that stated, or that it has not been paid, if such evidence does not alter or contradict the legal import of the deed.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 419*) — PAROL EVIDENCE — DEEDS—CONSIDERATION.

Where a deed recited a money consideration of $600, the receipt of which was acknowledged by the grantor, it could be shown by parol evidence that while, as a matter of form, $600 passed from the grantee to the grantor, it was immediately returned, and that the real consideration was the support and maintenance of the grantor during his life; this not altering or in any way affecting the legal import of the deed.

3. DEEDS (§ 19*)—FAILURE—CONSIDERATION—RELIEF.

Where the consideration for a conveyance of land was the support and maintenance of the grantor for life, and the grantee not only failed to support and maintain the grantor, but denied that she was under any legal obligation to do so, the consideration failed, and the grantor was entitled to have the conveyance rescinded by a court of equity, there being no adequate remedy at law.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Bedford County.

Suit by Matthew V. Hall against Martha Bell Martin. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

S. S. Lambeth, Jr., and Landon Lowry, both of Bedford City, for appellant. Sale & Withers, of Bedford City, and S. V. Kemp, of Lynchburg, for appellee.

BUCHANAN, J. The object of this suit was to set aside and annul a deed by which the appellee conveyed to the appellant a tract of land containing about 180 acres. The relief prayed for was granted by the circuit court, and from that action this appeal was allowed.

The material question involved in the case is whether or not parol evidence was admissible to show that the real consideration for the land conveyed was the support and maintenance of the grantor during his life by the grantee, instead of the money consideration stated in the deed.

The deed, omitting formal parts, is as follows:

"Witnesseth, that for and in consideration of the sum of six hundred dollars in hand paid by the said party of the other part, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, the said party of the first part has bargained and sold, and by these presents does sell, release, and convey with special warranty unto the said party of the other part, all right, title, and interest in and to a certain tract or parcel of land lying in the south side of Bedford county, on the head waters of Ashwell's Mill creek, adjoining the lands of Melissa J. Kennett, Allen A. J. Hall, and others, and being the same land purchased from John Hall's estate, containing 182½ acres, be the same more or less."

[T] The statement in the deed as to the consideration is a mere recital of the amount and that it had been paid; but, while such recital is prima facie evidence of the facts recited, the true consideration for the conveyance may be inquired into, and it may be shown by parol evidence that the actual consideration paid or promised was different from that stated in the deed, and also to contradict the recital in the deed that the consideration had been paid, provided such evidence does not alter or contradict the legal import of the deed. See McKee v. Bunting McNeal Real Est. Co., 77 S. E. 515, decided at the March term, 1913, of the court, and authorities there cited.

[2, 3] The parol evidence offered and considered by the trial court did not alter or in any way affect the legal import of the deed. It satisfactorily shows that while, as a matter of form, $600 passed through the hands of the grantee to the grantor, it was immediately returned to the grantee's father, and that the real consideration for the conveyance was the support and maintenance of the grantor during his life by the grantee. The parties seem to be quite ignorant, and the evidence tended to show that they had the impression that, although the true consideration for the deed was the support and maintenance of the grantor it was necessary, to give validity to the deed, that it should recite or state that a money consideration had passed. Pursuant to the real agreement between the grantor and the grantee, the latter did support and maintain the former after the execution of the conveyance in 1904 for about two years. Then differences arose between them. The grantee refused to wash the grantor's clothing, or to have it done for him, and he had to get it done elsewhere and pay for it. On account of unkind treatment, the grantor left the premises for a time. The parties afterwards tried to adjust or have their differences adjusted, but were unable or failed to do so. Just previous to the institution of this suit the grantor went to the premises which he had conveyed to the grantee to talk with the grantee about their matters, when she ordered the grantor to leave the premises and denied that she was under any obligation to support and maintain him, claiming then, as she does now, that the consideration for the conveyance was money, and not support and maintenance.

No good purpose could be subserved by discussing in detail the evidence in the case. It will be sufficient to say that it satisfactorily shows that the real consideration for the conveyance sought to be set aside was the support and maintenance of the grantor for life by the grantee; that the latter has not only failed to support and maintain the grantor, but before the institution of this suit, as well as in her answer to the bill and in her deposition, denied that she was under any legal obligation to do so. The consideration of the conveyance for support and maintenance having thus failed, the grantor was entitled, under the decisions of this court in Wampler v. Wampler, 30 Grat. (71 Va.) 454, Lowman v. Crawford, 99 Va. 688, 40 S. E. 17, and Keister v. Cubine, 101 Va. 768, 45 S. E. 285, to come into a court of equity, because he had no adequate remedy at law, and have the conveyance rescinded.

The decree complained of must therefore be affirmed.

In a prosecution of a husband for total nonsupport of his wife, evidence that accused had two small children by a former marriage dependent on him for support was inadmissible.

Error to Corporation Court of Roanoke.

James Draper was convicted of desertion and nonsupport, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Hairston & Willis, of Roanoke, for plaintiff in error. The Attorney General and Samuel W. Williams, of Richmond, for the Commonwealth.

WHITTLE, J. This writ of error brings under review the judgment of the corporation court of Roanoke city of conviction of the accused, James Draper, under Va. Code, § 3795c, for desertion and nonsupport of his wife.

The evidence sustains both allegations of the indictment; and therefore, if a motion to direct a verdict in favor of the accused were permissible at all under our procedure, it was properly overruled in this instance.

[1] The other errors assigned by the accused which demand notice are these: (1) The refusal of the court to admit evidence to show that the accused had two small children by a former marriage dependent upon him for support.

Such evidence is inadmissible where the nonsupport of the wife, as in this case, was total.

[2] (2) The second instruction asked by the accused and refused by the court amounts to this: That a husband cannot be found guilty of nonsupport of his wife when, after a separation between them caused by his misconduct, the wife takes service and supports herself. In other words, that such action on the part of the wife operates a condonement of the offense. To state the proposition is to answer it.

[3] (3) The last instruction, which the court also refused, told the jury: "That if they believed from the evidence that the wife * * * caused this indictment to be made because of her ill will and hatred for her husband, and not because of his alleged desertion and neglect, then they must find the defendant not guilty."

There is no evidence to sustain this instruction. But, if there had been, this is a prosecution by the commonwealth against the accused for violation of the criminal law of the state, and whatever motive may have actuated the wife to testify against him is immaterial.

In any view of the case, the judgment is plainly right and must be affirmed.

The burden of showing the existence of appellate jurisdiction is on the appellant, which jurisdiction must affirmatively appear from the record.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 150*)—APPELLATE JURISDICTION—PARTY SECONDARILY LIABLE—STATUTES.

Where a grantee of the timber on certain land was decreed only secondarily liable in a suit to enforce a vendor's lien for the balance of the purchase price, and then only to the extent of the deficiency after a sale of the land, such grantee, prior to such sale, was not entitled to appeal under Code 1904, § 3454, giving a party the right of appeal from an interlocutory decree adjudicating the principles of a cause.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 150*) — RIGHT OF APPEAL — PARTY SECONDARILY LIABLE — STATUTES.

Code 1904, § 3455, provides that no petition shall be presented for appeal from or writ of error or supersedeas to any final judgment, decree, or order of any court, where the controversy is for a matter less in value or amount than $300, unless there be drawn in question a freehold or franchise, or the title or bounds of land, or the order of the State Corporation

Commission, or some matter not merely pecuniary. Held that, where a grantee of the timber on certain land was decreed only secondarily liable for a deficiency occurring on a sale of the land in satisfaction of a vendor's lien, such grantee, prior to such sale, when only it could be ascertained that a deficiency in excess of $300 remained, could not appeal from such decree.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tazewell County.

Suit by the Coal Mountain Mining Company against R. A. Ayers and others. From a decree in favor of complainant, but holding the C. L. Ritter Lumber Company, Incorporated, secondarily liable only for a balance due on the sale of certain land to satisfy complainant's vendor's lien, the Lumber Company appeals. Dismissed.

Geo. W. St. Clair, of Tazewell, for appellant. Greever & Gillespie, of Tazewell, for appellee.

WHITTLE, J. The appellee, the Coal Mountain Mining Company, conveyed to R. A. Ayers 183.60 acres of land situated in Buchanan county for $2,754, $688.50 of which was paid in cash and the residue was divided into three credit installments of $688.50 each. Notes were taken for the deferred payments, and a vendor's lien reserved on the face of the deed to secure the unpaid purchase money. R. A. Ayers afterwards conveyed the land to the Empire Coal Land Corporation, and that corporation sold the merchantable standing timber on the tract to the appellant, the C. L. Ritter Lumber Company, Incorporated, which cut and removed timber therefrom of the value of $1,018.50. The appellee then filed a bill in equity against R. A. Ayers, the C. L. Ritter Lumber Company, Incorporated, and others, to recover of Ayers the amount of unpaid purchase money and to subject the land to sale to satisfy the vendor's lien. The bill further prayed that, if the proceeds of sale of the property should prove insufficient to discharge the lien, the plaintiff might recover of the C. L. Ritter Lumber Company, Incorporated, the balance of the amount due under the deed, provided such balance did not exceed $1,018.50, the value of the timber cut and removed from the land by that company. From a decree in accordance with the prayer of the bill, the C. L. Ritter Lumber Company, Incorporated, appealed.

We are met at the threshold of the case with a motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground that it was improvidently awarded. In respect to that motion it must be observed that the decree against the appellant is not absolute, but is conditioned upon the failure of the land, the primary subject for payment of the debt, when exposed to sale, to produce an amount sufficient to discharge in whole or in part the vendee's lien resting upon it. Until such sale the decree against the appellant is not enforceable, and then it is only enforceable for such amount as may remain unpaid after applying the proceeds of sale to the original debt. It is therefore obvious that the ultimate liability of the appellant is at present wholly conjectural, and cannot be ascertained until the land, the primary subject for the payment of the debt, has been sold.

Section 3455 of the Code declares that "no petition shall be presented for an appeal from, or writ of error or supersedeas to, any final judgment, decree, or order, * * * of any court * * * when the controversy is for a matter less in value or amount than three hundred dollars, * * * unless there be drawn in question a freehold or franchise or the title or bounds of land, or the action of the State Corporation Commission or some matter not merely pecuniary."

[1] The rule is settled in Virginia that the "burden of showing the existence of jurisdiction to hear the appeal is on the plaintiff in error, and such jurisdiction must affirmatively appear from the record." Notes to sections 3454, 3455, of the Code, citing Commonwealth v. Chaffin, 87 Va. 545, 12 S. E. 972; Southern Fertilizing Co. v. Nelson, 6 Va. Law J. 162.

In Williamson v. Payne, 103 Va. 551, 49 S. E. 660, the court quotes with approval the statement of the law from 2 Cyc. 555, that: "Generally speaking, the value or amount in controversy must be made to appear affirmatively. If it cannot be ascertained, the appeal will be dismissed, and the burden is on appellant to establish the jurisdiction."

The following qualification of the general rule does not affect this case, namely, that "on the other hand, when the original demand is pecuniary and in excess of the jurisdictional amount, but is alleged by the appellee to have been reduced below that amount by payment, the onus rests upon him to make that fact appear." Fink Bros. & Co. v. Denny, 75 Va. 663; Miller v. Tyler, 91 Va. 458, 22 S. E. 235. The principle announced in Williamson v. Payne, supra, is followed in Lamb v. Thompson, 112 Va. 134, 70 S. E. 507.

In Marchant v. Healy, 94 Va. 614, 27 S. E. 464, it was held that, where the difference between the debt asserted by the plaintiff in the lower court and the amount paid thereon by the sale of the debtor's land is less than the jurisdictional amount, no appeal lies.

[2] It will be further noted that this case is not controlled by the provision of section 3454, giving a party the right of appeal from an interlocutory decree "adjudicating the principles of a cause."

[3] The application for appeal is not amenable to objection because the decree does not adjudicate the principles of the cause, but because, as we have endeavored to show, that it does not now appear, nor can it be made to appear until there has been a sale of the land, that the liability of the appellant, which is merely pecuniary, will ultimately amount to $300.

If the land, when sold, should bring enough to satisfy the vendor's lien, there will be no liability on the appellant, and consequently it will not have been aggrieved by the decree appealed from. And if, on the other hand, the land, when sold, should come within $300 of paying off the vendor's lien, then the appellant, though aggrieved to the extent of the deficit, would have no redress by way of appeal.

Our conclusion is that the appeal must be dismissed as having been improvidently awarded, but without prejudice to appellant's right to apply for another appeal, if warranted by future developments in the case.

Appeal dismissed.

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 87*)—FORM AND REQUISITES—ALLEGATION OF TIME—SURPLUSAGE.

Where an indictment charged that accused on the — day of —, in the year 19—, and within the last two years, did unlawfully sell, by retail, whisky, etc., without a license, it sufficiently charged that the sale was within the two-year statutory period of limitations; the balance of the allegation as to the time being meaningless and surplusage.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 281, 282*)—PLEADING—PLEA—RIGHT TO DEMURRER OR REPLY.

Where a plea in abatement is filed to an indictment, the commonwealth may demur or reply, but it cannot do both.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1144*)—APPEAL—PRESUMPTION—WITHDRAWAL OF PLEA IN ABATEMENT.

Accused having pleaded in abatement, the commonwealth demurred to the plea, and, the demurrer having been overruled, the commonwealth offered to reply, to which accused objected on the ground that the commonwealth was entitled to only one answer to the plea. This objection having been overruled, the court permitted the commonwealth to reply, to which ruling accused excepted but joined issue on the replication which was tried to the court. Held that, under such circumstances, the demurrer would be treated as having been withdrawn, so as to afford the commonwealth the right to reply, though the record did not show that fact.

4. GRAND JURY (§ 84*)—PROCEEDINGS—PRESENCE OF ATTORNEY FOR COMMONWEALTH.

Code 1904, § 3988, provides that it shall be unlawful for any attorney for the commonwealth to go before any grand jury during its deliberations, except when duly sworn to testify as a witness, that he may advise the foreman or any member in relation to the discharge of their duties. Held that, where a commonwealth's attorney did not advise the grand jury to return the indictment in question against the defendant, and did not know of it until the presentment was made, and was not in the room when the jury was deliberating thereon, the validity of the indictment was not affected by the fact that such attorney went into the grand jury room to consult with the jury in response to their call, though not as a witness, when the jury was in session and during their deliberation.

5. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 134*)—"LIQUOR."

The term "liquor," in its limited sense and in its more common application, implies spirituous fluids, whether fermented or distilled, such as brandy, whisky, gin, beer, and wine (citing 5 Words and Phrases, 4181, 4182).

6. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 216*)—ILLEGAL SALE—INDICTMENT—"WHISKY."

"Whisky" is a spirit distilled from grain, barley, maize, wheat, rye, etc., and the use of the term "whisky" in an indictment charging the defendant with selling intoxicating liquor, to wit, whisky, is sufficient to show the sale of fermented or distilled liquor, within the statute prohibiting the sale thereof (citing 8 Words and Phrases, 7445).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 230-233; Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

7. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 223*)—UNLAWFUL SALE—"CORN LIQUOR"—VARIANCE.

Evidence that prosecuting witness purchased "corn liquor" from accused was sufficient to sustain a conviction under an indictment charging the unlawful sale of "whisky, brandy, gin, beer, malt liquors, and mixtures thereof."

8. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 132*)—SALE WITHOUT LICENSE—GENERAL REVENUE LAW—LOCAL OPTION LAW—OFFENSES—JURISDICTION.

Act March 25, 1902 (Acts 1901-02, c. 307), prohibiting the sale of liquors, either wholesale or retail, in certain named counties, did not render the general revenue law and the Byrd Liquor Law, making the sale of liquors without a license an offense punishable in the circuit court, inapplicable to such counties.

Error to Circuit Court, Dickenson County.

Melvin Mullins was convicted of selling whisky without a license, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Sutherland & Sutherland, of Clintwood, for plaintiff in error. The Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

CARDWELL, J. The refusal of the trial court to sustain the demurrer to the indictment is assigned as error.

[1] The indictment was found and returned into court on July 16, 1912, and sets forth "that Melvin Mullins on the — day of —, in the year one thousand nine hundred and —, and within the last two years in said county, did unlawfully sell by retail whisky, brandy, wine, beer, malt liquors, and mixtures thereof without a license so to do as required by law, against the peace and dignity of the commonwealth."

It is contended on behalf of the accused that the averment in the indictment as to the time when the offense was committed is meaningless, and that it does not charge the date of the sale nor such facts as show that the sale was made within two years prior to the indictment, the statutory period for the prosecution of such offenses.

In the recent case of Shiffett v. Commonwealth, 77 S. E. 606, the charge in the indictment was "that Marcus Shiffett within 12 months on the last preceding 191—, in said county, did unlawfully sell ardent spirits without having obtained license to do so," etc.; and the opinion of the court, by Buchanan, J., citing ample authority for the ruling, holds that words in an indictment, which "are meaningless, * * * may be treated as surplusage and rejected if the indictment is thereby made sensible. * * * Courts of justice are disposed to treat as surplusage all erroneous and improper averments in complaints and indictments where the residue of the allegations sets out the offense charged in technical language and with substantial certainty and precision;" that "after rejecting the words 'on the last preceding 191—,' following the words 'within 12 months,' as meaningless, 'the indictment states that the grand jury attending the circuit court of Greene county, at its December term, 1912, 'upon their oath present that Marcus Shiffett within 12 months * * * in the said county did unlawfully sell ardent spirits without having a license to do so.' These were apt and sufficient words to show that the offense charged was committed within the statutory period;" and "therefore the demurrer" to the indictment "was properly overruled."

So in the case now before us, after rejecting as surplusage and because meaningless the words in the indictment, "on the — day of —, in the year one thousand nine hundred and —, and," the residue of the allegations, in apt and sufficient words, set out the offense charged against the accused "in technical language and with substantial certainty and precision," showing that the offense charged was committed within the statutory period, and the demurrer to the indictment was rightly overruled.

When the case was called for trial, the accused, Melvin Mullins, tendered his plea in abatement to the indictment to the effect that

"the grand jury that found and returned the indictment was an illegal body, and the deliberations of said body in returning said indictment was contrary to law for this, to wit: W. G. L. Long, the attorney for the commonwealth, after the grand jury was sworn and retired to their room to deliberate on the said indictment, went before the said grand jury during their deliberation, and the said attorney for the commonwealth was not at the time he went before the said grand jury, and while they were deliberating on this indictment, duly sworn to testify as a witness before the said grand jury, and by reason of the illegal conduct of the said attorney for the commonwealth and of the said grand jury this defendant has been injured and prejudiced, and said indictment returned. * * * Wherefore, for the reason that the attorney for the commonwealth was before said grand jury at the time and under the circumstances aforesaid, he prays judgment of said indictment that the same be quashed."

The attorney for the commonwealth demurred to said plea and the accused joined in the demurrer, which the court overruled; and thereupon the attorney for the commonwealth offered to reply to the said plea, to which the accused objected, because he (the attorney for the commonwealth) had demurred, and he was only allowed one answer to said plea; but the court overruled said objection and permitted the attorney for the commonwealth to reply to the plea, to which action and ruling of the court the accused then and there excepted, whereupon the accused joined in said replication, and issue was joined thereon, which issue was, by consent of parties, tried by the court without the intervention of a jury, and, to sustain in his behalf the issue on the plea, the accused called as his witness the attorney for the commonwealth, who after being sworn testified as follows:

"After the grand jury was sworn and retired to their room for deliberation, I went in and was in the grand jury room at the July term of this court, the term at which this indictment was found, several times. I was called in there by the grand jury to consult and was not called as a witness; the grand jury was in session; and it was during their deliberation when I was in there.

"I did not advise the grand jury to return this indictment against the defendant, and did not know of it until the presentment was made, and was not in the room when the jury had under consideration or deliberation of said indictment or the presentment upon which said indictment was found."

This being all the evidence introduced in support of the said plea, the court, finding that the evidence did not sustain the plea, overruled it and gave judgment respondent ouster, to which ruling the accused then and there excepted.

The contention of the accused is that, when the demurrer to the plea in abatement was overruled, judgment should have been entered for the accused; that the commonwealth's attorney should not have been permitted to have two answers to the same plea, and, having demurred to the plea, he was not entitled to reply to it.

[2, 3] There is no merit in this contention. It is true that, while the attorney for the commonwealth had the right to demur or reply to the plea, he had no right to do both; but as said in the opinion of this court in Ches., etc., R. Co. v. Bank, 92 Va. 495, 23 S. E. 935, 44 L. R. A. 449: "Although the record does not show that the demurrer was withdrawn, the court and parties must have so considered it; otherwise the replication could not have been filed and a trial had upon the issue of fact raised by it. The demurrer having been treated in the trial court as waived or withdrawn, it must be so considered here."

We are of opinion that the trial court did not err in overruling the accused's plea in abatement or in refusing to quash the indictment.

[4] Section 3988 of the Code of 1904 does declare it unlawful for any attorney for the commonwealth to go before any grand jury during their deliberations except when duly sworn to testify as a witness, with the qualification that "he may advise the foreman of the grand jury or any members thereof in relation to the discharge of their duties." It is unquestionably the policy of the statute, as has been the practice in this jurisdiction, to keep the grand jury, independent of all outside interference, free and untrammelled in the deliberations; and, while it is highly reprehensible for any attorney for the commonwealth to violate in any degree either the terms or the policy of the statute, it would be a strained construction of it, upon the facts in this case, to say that there has been such a disregard thereof as was or might have been injurious and prejudicial to the accused and calling for a dismissal of the indictment against him, upon the ground that it was returned by the grand jury because the attorney for the commonwealth went before the grand jury while they were in session at the July term of the court, 1912, at which term this indictment was found and returned into court. It will be observed that the attorney for the commonwealth, introduced as a witness for the accused, testified: "I did not advise the grand jury to return this indictment against the defendant, and did not know of it until the presentment was made, and was not in the room when the jury had under consideration or deliberation of said indictment or the presentment upon which said indictment was found."

The remaining assignment of error requiring consideration relates to the ruling of the trial court refusing to set aside the verdict of the jury because the same was without evidence to support it, and its refusal to dismiss the case because the court was without jurisdiction to try it.

The only evidence in the case is that given by A. K. Lambert, introduced as a witness on behalf of the commonwealth, who testified that in June, 1911, he was coming from McClure and wanted some liquor, and he came to a place on Crane's Nest in Dickenson county and asked a woman, whom he did not know, where the man of the house was, and she said he was up at the barn, which was about 50 yards from the house. "I went up there and the defendant, Melvin Mullins, was up there. I knew him well. I told him I wanted a fruit jar and he said perhaps he could get one at the house. We went to the house and we went into the main room where I stopped, and he and his wife went into the kitchen, and he came back in a few moments. Then I went into the kitchen and on the table set a half gallon can of liquor. I laid down $2.20 and picked up the can and left. The can had corn liquor in it. * * * I saw the defendant, his wife, and some others there; I don't know who they were; I took it they were their children. * * * I do not recall seeing any grown people there except the defendant and his wife. I did not stay but a few minutes and was never there before or after I left the $2 there for the liquor and the $.20 for the can; I do not know who got the money or whether any one got it or not; I did not tell any one where I put the money, but it was on the table in the kitchen where I found the liquor."

The only point made as to the insufficiency of this evidence to warrant the jury in finding the accused guilty of selling "whisky, brandy, wine, beer, malt liquors, and mixtures thereof, without a license so to do as required by law," is, that proof of a sale of "corn liquor" is not proof of a sale of "whisky," etc., in violation of the statute. To sustain this contention two cases are cited: Barker v. State, 117 Ga. 428, 43 S. E. 744, and Donithan v. Commonwealth, 109 Va. 845, 64 S. E. 1050. In the first-named case the court was construing a certain section of the Penal Code of Georgia and merely held that as the sale of corn whisky was not prohibited by that section, under which the defendant was indicted, the verdict of the jury finding him guilty of a sale of corn whisky should have been set aside.

In Donithan's Case, supra, the indictment was for the unlawful sale of "spirituous and malt liquors, whisky, brandy, wine, ale, beer, or mixtures thereof," and the ruling of this court was that, as cider is not a spirituous liquor and does not belong to any of the other classes enumerated in the statute, therefore the verdict of the jury finding the defendant guilty upon proof only of the sale of cider which produced intoxication could not be sustained.

[5] In the case at bar the witness speaks of the article purchased by him of the accused as "corn liquor." The term "liquor," in its limited sense and in its more common application, implies spirituous fluids, whether fermented or distilled, such as brandy, whisky, gin, beer, and wine, and the like fluids in great variety, so that, where a witness in describing what liquor had been sold uniformly describes it merely as "liquor," it would be proper for the jury to assume that he was speaking of that class of liquor specifically referred to in the second definition given by Webster, viz., "alcoholic or spirituous fluid either distilled or fermented, as brandy, wine, whisky, beer," etc. 5 Words and Phrases, 4181, 4182, and authorities there cited.

[6] Whisky is a spirit distilled from grain, barley, maize (corn), wheat, rye, etc., and the use of the term "whisky" in an indictment charging the defendant with selling intoxicating liquor, to wit, one quart of whisky, is sufficient to show the sale of fermented or distilled liquor, within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the sale of such liquor. 8 Words and Phrases, 7445, and authorities cited.

[7] In State v. Williamson, 21 Mo. 498, the opinion of the court says: "The courts take notice that whisky is a spirit distilled from grain." And in Aston v. State (Tex. Cr. App. 1899) 49 S. W. 385, the court said: "It is common information that whisky is a spirituous liquor, distilled from corn and vegetables, and is highly intoxicating."

In Commonwealth v. White, 10 Metc. (Mass.) 14, the indictment was under the Revised Statutes of Massachusetts and charged the defendant with selling "one gill of spirituous liquor," etc. The proof was that the liquor sold was in the form of gin and brandy mixed with sugar and water, so as to make what was called "toddy" or "sling"; the objection taken being that the proof did not show a sale of spirituous liquor but only a sale of mixed liquor, part of which was spirituous. Held, that the objection was not well taken on the ground that, although the article sold might have been properly described as a mixed liquor, part of which was spirituous, it was also well described as spirituous liquor, and the proof adduced was sufficient to sustain a conviction for a violation of the statute providing that "if any person shall sell any wine or spirituous liquor, or any mixed liquor, part of which is spirituous, * * * without being duly licensed, * * * he shall forfeit for each offense $20." See, also, Commonwealth v. Morgan, 149 Mass. 314, 21 N. E. 369.

In State v. Brittain, 89 N. C. 574, the opinion of the court says, "Most generally the term 'liquors' implies spirituous liquors;" and it was therefore held that proof that the defendant sold liquors is sufficient to show, in the absence of adverse testimony, that he sold spirituous liquors.

It is a matter of common knowledge that

"corn whisky" and "corn liquor," or "rye liquor" and "rye whisky," are terms interchangeably, alternately, and indifferently used, respectively, to indicate the grain out of which the liquor spoken of was distilled, so that, when the witness in this case spoke uniformly of the contents of the can he purchased of the accused as "corn liquor," it was entirely proper for the jury to assume that he was speaking of that class of liquor which is alcoholic or spirituous, distilled from corn, and which comes within the terms of the statute prohibiting the sale of whisky, etc., without being duly licensed to do so, and it was not error in the court to refuse to set aside the jury's verdict finding the accused guilty as charged in the indictment and imposing upon him the punishment authorized by the statute.

[8] The ground upon which the contention is made by the accused that the trial court was without jurisdiction to try him for the offense charged in the indictment is that the general revenue laws and what is known as the "Byrd Liquor Law" do not apply to the county of Dickenson for the reason that the act of the Legislature approved March 25, 1902 (Acts 1901-02, p. 321), was still in force and provides, in substance, that no license shall be granted for the sale of ardent spirits, either by wholesale or retail, in certain named counties, including Dickenson. In other words, the contention is that, in the counties named in the act of 1901-02, the general revenue laws are not in force, and that there can be no prosecution for a violation thereof in this case, but that, if the accused has been guilty of the illegal sale of liquor in the county of Dickenson, he can only be prosecuted and punished for the offense under the said act prohibiting the granting of a license to sell ardent spirits in that county, which is a misdemeanor of which the justices of the peace in the county have sole and exclusive jurisdiction.

The conditions created by this special statute in the counties to which it applies are practically the same that result in any county in which, under the local option laws, a local option election has been held, and the vote has resulted in favor of local option; that is, in favor of prohibiting the licensing of the sale of ardent spirits in the county or locality in which the election was held.

In Fletcher v. Commonwealth, 108 Va. 840, 56 S. E. 149, substantially the same contention was made for the accused as is made in this case, viz., that the county of Warren having voted in favor of local option, and the indictment charging the defendant Fletcher with a violation of the general revenue laws and with selling intoxicating liquors unlawfully in said county, the circuit court was without jurisdiction to try the case for the reason that there could be no violation of the revenue laws in any county in which a license to sell ardent spirits could not be lawfully granted; that is, the indictment did not charge a violation of the revenue laws within the meaning of the statute conferring jurisdiction upon the circuit courts to try and determine that class of cases. In the opinion of the court by Keith, P., in that case, after stating the facts, it is said:

"We do not perceive that the character and nature of the offense charged is affected by the fact that it was committed in a local option district. The charge is that the defendant did 'unlawfully sell and deliver intoxicating liquors.' If he did it unlawfully, whether with or without a license, he was guilty of an offense against the law. That he also violated the local option law can have no influence upon the nature of the act. Webster's Case, 89 Va. 154, 15 S. E. 513. He has done that which the law says he shall not do without having first obtained a license, and it does not lie in his mouth to say: 'It is true I did not have a license, but the act was committed in a local option district where it was impossible under the law to obtain a license.'"

"It was forcibly urged by the Attorney General that no reason of public policy can be suggested why the court should be given jurisdiction of the offense of unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors where the sale takes place in a district where such traffic may be licensed and denied such jurisdiction where committed in local option territory, and we concur with him in the view expressed that the unlawful sale of liquor in a local option district is 'a more serious offense, more injurious to public morals, and a graver infraction of civic duty than a sale in a licensed district without a license, for it is both a violation of the revenue law (that is, it is the conduct of a business free from any burden of taxation, which can be legally conducted only upon paying the taxes imposed upon it, and which others lawfully engaged in it pay), and it is a sale also in flagrant defiance of the law, sanctioned by the votes of a majority of the qualified voters of the community which prohibits any such traffic, and not only makes it illegal but criminal.'"

"We are of opinion that the offense against the commonwealth here charged consists in the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors; that it is none the less a violation of the revenue laws of the commonwealth because it happens that the offense charged was committed in a local option district; and it follows, therefore, that the circuit court has concurrent jurisdiction with the justices of the peace for the trial of such offenses."

This case cannot be differentiated from the Fletcher Case. In this case the special act so much relied on by the accused as taking from the circuit court of Dickenson county jurisdiction to try and determine cases of violation of the revenue laws itself proprio vigore prevents the licensing of the sale of ardent spirits in said county and brought about exactly the same condition in that county as existed in Warren county when Fletcher was indicted and convicted for selling ardent spirits without a license so to do; therefore the principle resting upon authority and sound reasoning applied to the Fletcher Case is equally applicable to this and controls it.

The judgment of the circuit court here complained of is affirmed.

Affirmed.

LICENSES (§ 40*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—DOING BUSINESS AS MERCHANT WITHOUT LICENSE.

The conviction of defendants for doing business without a license was proper, where defendants were, contrary to law, doing business as merchants without a license, though defendants contended that the commissioner of revenue proceeded on a wrong basis in estimating the amount of their sales, for the purpose of determining the amount to be paid for a license.

Error to Corporation Court of Danville.

Armour & Co. were convicted and fined for doing business in the city of Danville as merchants without a license, and they petition for writ of error. Affirmed.

Hall & Woods, of Roanoke, for petitioners. The Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

PER CURIAM. A warrant was issued against Armour & Co. for doing business in the city of Danville as merchants without having first obtained a license as provided by law. Upon a hearing the justice found Armour & Co. guilty and assessed against them a fine, and from this judgment an appeal was taken to the corporation court for the city of Danville, where the judgment was affirmed; and Armour & Co. thereupon applied to this court for a writ of error.

The contention of the plaintiff in error is that the commissioner of the revenue proceeded upon a wrong basis in estimating the amount payable for a merchandise license in this case; that its Danville house disposes of merchandise not manufactured by it, the purchase price of which was less than $1,000; while upon the part of the commonwealth it was contended that the sale value of the articles sold by plaintiff in error, and upon which the amount of the license was to be estimated, was as much as $30,000.

In the view we take of the case, the inquiry into the amount properly payable by Armour & Co. in order to secure a license, and the basis upon which the estimate as to the amount due to the commonwealth for a License was to be made, are wholly immaterial. However that question may be decided, it remains that Armour & Co. were doing business as merchants in the city of Danville without having first obtained a license from the proper authorities of the state of Virginia to conduct such business. We are therefore of opinion that the judgment of the corporation court of Danville is plainly right, and that the writ of error should be refused, and the judgment complained of affirmed.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 80*)—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—"FINAL ORDER."

Under Code 1904, § 3454, authorizing writs of error to review final orders, a "final order" is one which disposes of the whole subject, gives all the relief contemplated, provides with reasonable completeness for giving effect to the sentence, and leaves nothing to be done in the cause, save to superintend ministerially the execution of the order.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 110*)—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—FINAL ORDER.

Where, in a proceeding on three notes, there was a verdict for defendant, which was set aside and a new trial awarded as to two of them, an order denying the motion to set aside the verdict as to the third note was not a "final order," and could not be reviewed on error, since it showed on its face that the issues as to the larger portion of the demand sued for were still undetermined, and that as to that portion there was to be a new trial.

Error to Law and Chancery Court of City of Roanoke.

Proceeding by the Salem Loan & Trust Company against one Kelsey. To review an order setting aside a verdict for defendant in part and denying such relief in part, plaintiff brings error. On motion to dismiss the writ of error. Motion sustained.

A. E. King and Poindexter & Hopwood, all of Roanoke, for plaintiff in error. C. S. McNulty, of Roanoke, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. The defendant in error moves to dismiss this writ of error as improvidently awarded, upon the ground that no final judgment has been rendered in this case.

This is a proceeding under section 3211 of the Code to recover judgment upon three negotiable notes. Upon the trial of the cause there was a verdict for the defendant. Upon motion of the plaintiff, that verdict was set aside as to two of the notes, and a new trial awarded as to them; but the motion to set aside the verdict as to the other note was overruled, and an order entered that the plaintiff take nothing by his motion as to that note, and that the defendant recover his costs.

[1] While by statute an appeal may be taken from certain interlocutory orders, as well as from final decrees, a writ of error does not lie, except where there has been a final order or judgment in the cause. Pollard's Code, § 3454; Gillespie v. Coleman, 98 Va. 276, 36 S. E. 377, and cases cited.

The general doctrine as to what constitutes a final order, says Judge Lewis, in Postal Tel. Cable Co. v. N. & W. R. Co., 87 Va. 349, 351, 12 S. E. 613, 614, is well stated by Prof. Minor, who says "that such an order is one which disposes of the whole subject, gives all the relief contemplated, provides with reasonable completeness for giving effect to the sentence, and leaves nothing to be done in the cause save to superintend ministerially the execution of the order." 4 Minor's Inst. 360.

This statement of the general doctrine as to what constitutes a final judgment, order, or decree seems to be fully sustained by text-writers and adjudicated cases. See 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law & Pr. 65, 66, and cases cited in note; 23 Cyc. 672, 673.

In Burch, Mayor, v. Hardwicke, 23 Grat. (64 Va.) 51, it was said by Judge Bouldin, in delivering the opinion of the court, that whether a judgment or decree is final "must always be ascertained, not by inquiry as to what ought to have been done by the court, but by inspecting the terms of the judgment or decree, and learning from its face what has been done. If it appears upon the face of the judgment or decree that further action in the cause is necessary to give completely the relief contemplated by the court, then the decree (or judgment) is to be regarded, not as final, but interlocutory."

[2] Tested by these well-settled principles, it is clear that the order to which this writ of error was awarded is not final. It appears from the face of the order that the issues as to the larger portion of the demand sued for are still undetermined, and that as to that portion there is to be a new trial.

It was held in Wells v. Jackson, 3 Munf. (17 Va.) 453, that a plaintiff cannot appeal from a judgment in favor of all the defendants except one in a joint action of trespass until the suit has been abated, dismissed, or decided as to that defendant. If this be true, it is manifest that a sole plaintiff cannot appeal from a judgment in favor of a sole defendant upon an issue as to the latter's liability on the other two notes remaining undetermined, and as to which a new trial has been awarded. If he could, then, instead of there being one final judgment in a law case, there could be as many final judgments as there are separate items in the demand sued for.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The motion to dismiss the writ of error as improvidently awarded must be sustained. Writ dismissed.

NESBIT v. WEBB.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
Sept. 11, 1913.)

1. NEGLIGENCE (§ 32*)—INJURIES TO THIRD PERSON—DANGEROUS PREMISES—USE OF PREMISES—INVITEE.

Defendant, having contracted to construct a new roundhouse for a railroad company on the site of an existing roundhouse, the work to be done in sections so as not to necessitate a discontinuance of the use of the house, excavated a foundation ditch across a pathway habitually used by the railroad company's employes. Plaintiff, a locomotive engineer, returning early in the morning from his run, put his engine away and started on his usual route along the pathway and traveled until he suddenly fell into the ditch and received injuries for which he sued. He did not know that the ditch had been dug and encountered no obstruction along the route prior to his fall. Held, that plaintiff was using the premises while in the discharge of his duties as an employe of the railroad company and not for his own convenience, and that the court properly refused to charge that if the railroad company had turned over the possession of the premises to defendant for the purpose of rebuilding the roundhouse, and plaintiff was not required to go on the premises for any purpose in the performance of his duties as an engineer of the railroad company, and he went thereon for his own convenience, he had no legal right on the premises and defendant owed him no duty to keep the premises in a safe condition, but that plaintiff assumed the risk arising from the condition of the premises by reason of the work going on there.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 42-44; Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 252*)—ABSTRACT INSTRUCTIONS.

Where a locomotive engineer, while leaving the railroad premises, fell into a ditch excavated by a contractor and was injured, an instruction that, if the jury believed that plaintiff had no legal right on the premises, then the only duty that the defendant contractor owed him was not willfully to injure him while on the premises was abstract and properly refused.

3. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUEST TO CHARGE—INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN.

It is not error to refuse one of defendant's requests to charge where the jury was liberally instructed on every phase of defendant's theory of the case.

4. RAILROADS (§ 358*)—PERSONS ON TRACK—CARE REQUIRED.

While a railroad company is entitled to a clear track and is not ordinarily liable for injuries to persons on its track, yet if it knows, or by the exercise of ordinary care could know, that persons are in the habit of or have been for some time using its track for a footpath, so that it has no right to expect a clear track, then it is its duty to exercise reasonable care to prevent injury to persons so on the track at such place.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1236, 1237; Dec. Dig. § 358.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1002*)—VERDICT—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

Where an action for injuries was properly submitted to the jury on conflicting evidence, a verdict in favor of plaintiff would not be set aside on appeal.

Error to Corporation Court of Roanoke.

Action by J. E. Webb against J. C. Nesbit. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Hall & Woods, of Roanoke, for plaintiff in error. Jackson & Henson, of Roanoke, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. This action was brought by J. E. Webb to recover of J. C. Nesbit damages for injuries alleged to have been occasioned by the negligence of the defendant. The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff, which we are asked by the defendant to review.

The petition assigns two grounds of error: (1) That the court erred in giving and refusing instructions; and (2) that it erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Viewed from the standpoint of a demurrer to the evidence, the pertinent facts appear to be that the defendant, a building contractor, was engaged in constructing a roundhouse for the Norfolk & Western Railway Company in its West Roanoke yards. The roundhouse was to be constructed on the site of an old one, consisting of 21 stalls, which was to be taken down in sections of 6 stalls at a time, so that the railway company could continue its use until the new roundhouse was ready. The new house was to be much larger than the old one; the outer wall thereof being located from 25 to 30 feet distant from the outer wall of the old house. Stalls 17, 18 and 19 were among those included in the first six that were turned over to the defendant. From these stalls there were tracks running, which extended outside the walls of the old roundhouse, through arches cut therein, for some distance in an easterly direction. These tracks, together with a passageway through the roundhouse, were constantly used day and night by the employes of the company with its full knowledge and consent as a convenient passway in going to and returning from their work. This passway led to the street and was not only a convenient way for the numerous employes using it, especially those living in Southeast Roanoke, but it is shown to have been their safest route, on account of moving trains and shifting engines likely to be encountered by them in traveling the most feasible route other than this one. This was the situation on the 1st day of July, 1912, when the defendant commenced the execution of his contract for building the new roundhouse. Prior to the accident the defendant had dug a ditch 4 feet wide and about 6 feet deep immediately across the pathway habitually used by the employes. This ditch was to be continued as the foundation for the new roundhouse. At 1:30 on the morning of July 5, 1912, the plaintiff, a locomotive engineer, came in from his run, put his engine away, and started on the usual route traveled by himself and other employes, which was pursued until he suddenly fell headlong into the ditch which the defendant had dug and thereby received the injuries for which he seeks damages in this suit. The plaintiff did not know that the ditch had been dug and encountered no obstruction along the route traveled by him. There was sufficient light on the inside and outside of the roundhouse to enable one to travel with reasonable safety in the absence of concealed danger.

The theory of the plaintiff, as stated in his declaration, was that the employes of the railway company had been accustomed to use the way traveled by him on the night of the accident, both before and after the defendant dug the ditch in which he fell, and that the defendant knew, or in the exercise of reasonable care should have known, that fact, and that it was his duty in making an excavation across such passway to exercise reasonable care not to injure persons so in the habit of using such way.

In addition to a general denial, the defendant interposed the defense of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, contending that the plaintiff had no right to be at the place where the accident happened; that he was a trespasser, or at most a bare licensee, and the defendant owed him no duty, except not to wantonly and willfully injure him.

The defendant complains of the action of the court in refusing instructions A and B offered by him.

[1] Instruction A tells the jury: "That if they believe from the evidence that the Norfolk & Western Railway Company had turned over to the defendant the possession of said premises for the purpose of tearing down the roundhouse located thereon and rebuilding the same, and that the plaintiff was not required to go on said premises for any purpose in the performance of his duties as an engineer of the Norfolk & Western Railway Company, and that the plaintiff went thereon at the time he was injured for his own convenience, then the plaintiff had no legal right on said premises, and the defendant owed him no duty to keep said premises in a safe condition; and, in going upon said premises, the plaintiff assumed all risks of danger arising from the condition of the premises by reason of work done thereon by defendant in the performance of his contract with the Norfolk & Western Railway Company to tear down and rebuild the roundhouse located thereon."

This instruction was properly refused. There is no evidence that the plaintiff was on the premises where the accident happened for his own convenience; on the contrary, the uncontradicted evidence shows that the plaintiff was using the premises while in the discharge of his duties as an employe of the railway company. He was returning from his completed task by the usual route that he had pursued for 15 years prior to the night of the accident. The defendant was only in possession of a small portion of the roundhouse for certain purposes, the rest of the premises having been retained for the time by the railway company for the uses to which they had always been put, and the plaintiff was using such premises in the discharge of his duties, without any knowledge that they had been rendered dangerous by the defendant, while the defendant knew, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence should have known, that the premises were being used by the employes of the company, and that they were likely to be injured unless the ditch dug across their pathway was reasonably safeguarded.

[2] Instruction B tells the jury: "That, if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff had no legal right on said premises, then the only duty that the defendant owed to him was not willfully to injure him while on said premises."

[3] This is an abstract proposition that could have been of no help to the jury in determining the questions at issue. Apart from these considerations, the jury was by other instructions abundantly and liberally instructed upon every phase of the defendant's theory of the case, and he could not possibly have suffered any prejudice from the court's action in refusing to give these two instructions. It is clear from the authorities that the plaintiff was not a trespasser or mere licensee but was using the premises by implied invitation.

In Bennett v. Railroad Co., 102 U. S. 577, 28 L. Ed. 235, Mr. Justice Harlan, speaking for the court, says that the rule founded in justice and necessity and illustrated in many adjudged cases in the American courts is: "That the owner or occupant of land who, by invitation, express or implied, induces or leads others to come upon his premises, for any lawful purpose, is liable in damages to such persons (they using due care) for injuries occasioned by the unsafe condition of the land or its approaches, if such condition was known to him and not to them and was negligently suffered to exist, without timely notice to the public or to those who were likely to act upon such invitation."

[4] The rule that is applied to a railroad in this state is that it has the right to a clear track and is not liable for injury to persons received upon its track; but if the company knows, or by the exercise of ordinary care should know, that persons are in the habit of, and have been for some time, using its track as a footpath, so that it has no right to expect a clear track, then it is the duty of the company to exercise reasonable care to prevent injury to persons so on the track at such place. O. & O. Ry. Co. v. Corbin, 110 Va. 700, 67 S. E. 179.

The rule applicable to railroads is applied generally. Orme v. City of Richmond, 79 Va. 86; N. & W. Ry. Co. v. De Board's Adm'r, 91 Va. 700, 22 S. E. 514, 29 L. R. A. 825; Henry v. Disbrow Mining Co., 144 Mo. App. 350, 128 S. W. 841; De Tarr v. Ferd. Heim Brewing Co., 62 Kan. 188, 61 Pac. 689.

In Henry v. Disbrow Mining Co., supra, the rule is thus stated: "If a person knows that people are using property as a right of way and have been using same for such length of time that the presence of persons upon the same is to be expected, then it is his duty in making excavations across such pathway, or putting obstructions thereon, to exercise reasonable care and not negligently injure persons so in the habit of using such pathway."

In De Tarr v. Ferd. Heim Brewing Co., supra, the rule is stated in the first syllabus in the following language: "Where the public has passed over private property, for a long time with the implied permission of the owner or of persons in control of the same, and where it may be said that a portion of the property is temporarily devoted to a public use, persons using the way are not deemed to be trespassers or mere licensees, and the owner or those in control cannot, without liability, make excavations or leave unprotected openings, so close to the line in such way as to render travel thereon unsafe."

The objection to instruction No. 1, given for the plaintiff, is not well taken. In the light of the foregoing authorities that instruction clearly and accurately states the law applicable to the plaintiff's theory of the case and has abundant evidence for its support.

The petition for a writ of error contends that the condition of the premises, resulting from beginning the work of dismantling the stalls, was at the time of the accident sufficient to warn the plaintiff of the danger of using the route he did, and that in using such route he assumed the risk of injury and cannot charge the result to the defendant. The defendant had only worked on the premises for three days prior to the accident, and there is a conflict in the evidence as to what had been done prior thereto and the aspect the premises presented at the time of the accident. The evidence, however, is overwhelming that there was no obstruction whatever to the passway over which the plaintiff traveled between the exit from the stall and the point where he fell into the ditch. This question, involving the contention that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, was submitted to the jury under instructions which stated the law as fully as could be desired, and their verdict is conclusive on the point.

[5] Without further detail it is sufficient to say in conclusion that we have carefully examined the entire record and find that the evidence upon most of the vital issues was conflicting, and that the case was fairly submitted to the jury under the instructions given. The jury having decided that conflict in favor of the plaintiff, and the judge of the trial court having approved their verdict, this court will not, upon well-settled principles, interfere with that finding.

The judgment complained of must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

MARSTELLER v. WARDEN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.)

Sept. 11, 1913.)

EVIDENCE (§ 417*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—WRITTEN CONTRACT—OMISSIONS.

Plaintiffs offered to furnish stone and erect a parish house for a specified price and to supply the stone and complete an unfinished tower on a church building according to specifications and drawing, "walls to be one foot six inches thick," for a specified further sum. The offer was accepted and a written contract executed which did not specify the thickness of the walls of the tower but provided that they should "correspond with the walls of the church." The original pencil sketch of the tower work, on which the bid was predicated, having been mislaid, plaintiffs called for plans and specifications, and these, being furnished, called for tower walls 26 inches thick. Held, that the provision that the walls of the tower should conform to the walls of the church should be construed as referring to quality, finish, and appearance of the material only, and that the contract was incomplete as to the thickness of the walls, so that parol evidence was admissible to show the actual agreement of the parties on that question.

Error to Law and Chancery Court of City of Roanoke.

Action by J. K. Warden and another against J. H. Marsteller. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

A. E. King and Poindexter & Hopwood, all of Roanoke, for plaintiff in error. Jackson & Henson, of Roanoke, for defendants in error.

WHITTLE, J. J. K. Warden and A. J. Hailey recovered a judgment for $2,000 against J. H. Marsteller (doing business as Marsteller Granite Works) in an action of assumpsit on a building contract.

The trustees of St. Paul's Episcopal Church in Lynchburg, Va., made a contract with J. P. Pettyjohn for the erection of a parish house and the completion of an unfinished tower on the main building. The building was constructed of "Peak Creek" stone, taken from quarries in Pulaski county, Va. Pettyjohn sublet the principal part of the work to the defendant, Marsteller, who in turn let the stone work to the plaintiffs, who were owners of a "Peak Creek" stone quarry and experienced workmen. The defendant's chief place of business was in Roanoke, but a branch establishment was maintained in Lynchburg under the management of C. G. Loving. Negotiations were opened between Loving and the plaintiffs touching this work, which culminated on September 18, 1910, in a written offer by the plaintiffs to furnish "Peak Creek" stone and erect the parish house for $7,459, and to supply the stone and complete the tower, according to specifications and drawing, of the following dimensions: "32 feet high, 20x20 feet, walls to be 1.6 [one foot six inches] thick"—for $3,099. On October 17, 1910, there was a written acceptance of this proposition by Loving. Two days later the attorney for the plaintiffs undertook to reduce the agreement to writing, and the paper prepared was duly signed by the parties. The plaintiffs promptly commenced work on the parish house, and, after having completed that building, were ready to proceed with work on the tower. To that end they had already gotten out and delivered on the ground a quantity of stone suitable for the tower, when they discovered that the original pencil sketch of the work upon which their bid was predicated had been mislaid. Thereupon the plaintiffs called for plans and specifications for the completion of the tower, which were made and furnished by the defendant about June 10, 1911. An examination of these plans showed that they called for tower walls 26 inches thick, while, as stated, the written proposal of the plaintiffs, which was accepted by the defendant, provided for an 18-inch wall. This discrepancy seems to have been the origin of the misunderstanding and bone of contention between the parties. No mention was made in the written contract of the thickness of the tower walls, and therefore the insistence of the plaintiffs was that the instrument was incomplete on its face, and that parol evidence was admissible to show the true agreement of the parties on the subject.

The countervailing theory of the defendant is that the stipulation in the contract "that the walls of the tower should correspond with the walls of the church" covered the point in dispute as to the thickness of the tower walls; that the contract in that respect was complete on its face; and consequently that the alleged omitted language that the walls were to be 18 inches thick could not be read into it. This pretension on behalf of the defendant pervades the entire case and was urged at every stage of it by demurrer to the declaration, by objection to the admissibility of evidence, and by instructions to the jury.

The law and chancery court resolved the proposition in favor of the plaintiff and tried the case on that theory; and that ruling, in its various phases, is assigned as error and is relied on to reverse the judgment. It constitutes the controlling question in the case and, if correctly decided by the trial court, renders the discussion of subordinate assignments, which could in no event affect the general result, unnecessary.

The language relied on and quoted by the defendant as showing the thickness of the tower walls, namely, "that the walls of the tower should correspond to the walls of the church," in the connection in which it occurs, was evidently intended to apply to and control the quality, finish, and appearance of the material to be used so as to maintain uniformity of aspect between different portions of the same structure; but it plainly does not supply the omitted stipulation that the tower walls were to be 18 inches thick. The overwhelming weight of the evidence shows that the true contract between the parties called for an 18-inch wall, and that the omission of that provision from the contract was the result of inadvertence on the part of the scrivener. Besides, the verdict of the jury has settled that question and all other controverted issues of fact in favor of the plaintiffs.

The principle of law applicable to the question under consideration is well settled.

In Farmers' Manufacturing Co. v. Woodworth, 109 Va. 596, at page 601, 64 S. E. 986, at page 988, the court observes: "The rule of exclusion of parol evidence has no application where it is apparent from the writing itself that it does not embody the entire agreement. In such case, the writing being incomplete, it must be supplemented by other evidence, not to contradict or vary its terms, but to establish the real contract between the parties."

It does not involve the doctrine of reformation of contracts, of which courts of equity alone have cognizance, but applies where the contract is partly in writing and partly parol. The jurisdiction of courts of law in the latter class of cases is unquestioned. Grove v. Lemley, 114 Va. 202, 76 S. E. 305.

Considering the last assignment as upon a demurrer to the evidence, the verdict of the jury cannot be disturbed upon the ground that it is excessive. The bill of particulars filed with the declaration is largely in excess of the damages awarded, and the amount and correctness of the items claimed are dependent upon conflicting views of the evidence and have been settled by the jury.

Judgment affirmed.

TATTERSON v. FIDELITY & DEPOSIT
CO. OF MARYLAND.†

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 11, 1918.)

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 183*)—RIGHTS OF SURETY AGAINST PRINCIPAL — BUILDING CONTRACT.

Where a contractor for the construction of a building abandoned his contract before completion, and the surety company which had given the contractor's bond, although notified of the abandonment, did not complete the building or employ others to do so, but instead the owners of the building entered into a contract with another contractor, who frequently completed contracts for the surety company and who agreed to complete the building for the balance due the first contractor and gave a bond executed by the same surety company, the surety company could not hold the estate of the first contractor liable for the loss sustained by the second contractor and which it voluntarily paid to him.

Appeal from Court of Law and Chancery of City of Norfolk.

Suit by the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland against Lizzie M. Tatterson, as executrix of the estate of Albert Tatterson, deceased, to establish a claim against the said estate and subject thereto certain property held by the executrix. Decree for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

R. R. Hicks, of Norfolk, for appellant. J. W. Happer and Frank L. Crocker, both of Portsmouth, for appellee.

CARDWELL, J. On the 9th day of June, 1909, Elbert Tatterson, a general contractor doing business in the city of Norfolk, Va., entered into an agreement with the building committee of the Young Men's Christian Association of said city by which he agreed to erect and complete for said association a building at a certain designated point in the city at the price of $126,332. Article 5 of the contract provided, among other things, as follows:

"Should the contractor at any time refuse or fail to prosecute the work with promptness and diligence, or fail in the performance of any of the agreements herein contained, such refusal, neglect or failure being certified by the architect, the Young Men's Christian Association should be at liberty, after three days' written notice to the contractor, to provide any such labor or materials and to deduct the cost thereof from any money then due or thereafter to become due to the contractor under this contract; and if the architect shall certify that such refusal, neglect or failure is sufficient grounds for such action, the owner shall also be at liberty to terminate the employment of the contractor for the said work and to enter upon the premises and take possession, for the purpose of completing the work included under this contract, of all materials, tools and appliances thereon and to employ any other person or persons to finish the work, and to provide the materials therefor; and in case of such discontinuance of the employment of the contractor, the contractor shall not be entitled to receive any further payment under this contract until the said work shall be wholly finished, at which time, if the unpaid balance of the amount to be paid under this contract shall exceed the expense incurred by the owner in finishing the work, such excess shall be paid by the owner to the contractor; but if such expense shall exceed such unpaid balance, the contractor shall pay the difference to the owner."

The building committee of the Young Men's Christian Association required Tatterson to give a bond in the sum of $63,166, conditioned for the faithful performance by him of the contract, and accordingly, on July 3, 1909, he made application to the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland (hereafter spoken of as the bonding company) to become surety on his bond for that amount. Pursuant to the rules and regulations of the bonding company, Tatterson filed with his written application a statement of his assets, which statement showed that among other property he owned real estate in the city of Norfolk at the corner of certain designated streets which he valued at $10,000, subject to a deed of trust for $1,400.

On the faith of this statement, it is claimed, the bonding company became surety on his said bond, which was made payable to the Young Men's Christian Association of Norfolk, Va., and was conditioned for the faithful performance of Tatterson's contract to erect and complete said building.

Tatterson entered upon the performance of his contract and continued the work thereon until about December 27, 1910, on which date he wrote a letter to the Building Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association, which is as follows:

"Gentlemen: Owing to ill health, which, as you know, has for some weeks kept me confined to my room, and fearing that it will be some time before I will be able to get out and go to work again, I have concluded that I ought to abandon the contract for the construction of the Young Men's Christian Association building, at the corner of Granby and Freemason streets in this city, and accordingly thereby abandon the same.

"This is without prejudice to either your right or mine as to the various questions which have been raised by each side during the construction of this building."

On the receipt of this letter the building committee replied by letter, saying that they acknowledged that he (Tatterson) had abandoned the contract upon the conditions stated in his letter, and on the same day the bonding company was notified by a letter of the attorney for the Young Men's Christian Association that Tatterson had abandoned his contract, and called upon the bonding company to comply with the terms of their bond and to make the necessary arrangements for the completion of the building. Before this, as it also appears, the chairman of the building committee on December 6, 1910, had written to the bonding company, advising it that the work on the building had been at a standstill for some time, and notifying it that unless the work progressed more rapidly they would exercise the right they had under the contract to direct Tatterson to cease work on the building and call upon the bonding company to complete the contract.

Upon receipt of the letter from the counsel for the Young Men's Christian Association of date December 27, 1910, the bonding company sent its representative to Norfolk, who made an investigation of the situation, and among other things it was ascertained that there would be a balance of $52,384.53 due Tatterson on the completion of the building, which balance was subject, however, to the claims of various mechanics and supply men who had filed liens or were about to do so. The bonding company had theretofore been advised that the building could not be completed with the balance that would be due Tatterson as per the contract. The bonding company did not, in accordance with its right under the terms of the bond, take charge of the building and complete it, nor did it sublet the contract, but after some negotiations with the authorities of the Young Men's Christian Association, on January 18, 1911, a contract was entered into between Morrow Bros., contractors of Baltimore, Md., and the Young Men's Christian Association, whereby Morrow Bros. agreed to complete the building for the amount which would have become due to Tatterson on the completion thereof, viz., $52,384.53, and furthermore agreed to assume the payment of all valid claims for which liens could be filed against the building. In addition to this Morrow Bros., contemporaneously with the execution of the said contract, executed a bond in the penal sum of $54,000 to the Young Men's Christian Association, conditioned upon the faithful performance of their duties under the contract, with the said bonding company as surety, which bond was similar in its provisions to that executed by Tatterson above referred to. It further appears that Morrow Bros. were contractors who sometimes represented the bonding company in completing buildings which had been abandoned by contractors for whom the bonding company might be surety when the bonding company took charge of the work of completing the building, and that the bonding company would reimburse them for any losses.

The building was completed by Morrow Bros. at a total cost of $78,169.26, and after crediting on this the amount of $52,716.25 which they had received from the Young Men's Christian Association, and which Tatterson would have received had he completed the building, their net loss was $20,453.01.

It further appears that on April 1, 1909, Lizzie M. Tatterson, the wife of said Elbert Tatterson, executed a deed, which she acknowledged before a notary public on April 14, 1909, whereby she conveyed to her said husband five lots of land in the city of Norfolk and fully described in the deed, which it is claimed by the bonding company was executed by her for the purpose of enabling Tatterson to obtain the bonding company as surety on his bond for the performance of his contract with the Young Men's Christian Association, and the real estate conveyed thereby is the same described as part of his assets in his written application to the bonding company to become his surety. The said deed from Lizzie M. Tatterson to her husband was never recorded, but when Charles A. Morrow, of the firm of Morrow Bros., came to Norfolk and took charge of the work of completing the building of the Young Men's Christian Association, he saw the deed on three different occasions in Tatterson's safe, which was in his office in the Dickson Building. It is claimed that Tatterson knew that Morrow Bros. were representing the bonding company in the completion of said building, and after Charles A. Morrow had entered upon this work he went over to Tatterson's house and endeavored to induce him to give the bonding company some surety for the loss that would be sustained in completing the building, which, as it would seem from Charles A. Morrow's statement, Tatterson agreed to do, and furthermore agreed to give a deed of trust on the specific real estate which his wife had conveyed to him to secure the bonding company against possible loss, or to raise money with which to pay such loss, but this was never consummated.

Tatterson died at his home in Norfolk on February 25, 1911, and a day or so after his death the said deed referred to was missing from the safe in his office. In June, 1911, the attorney for the bonding company had an interview with Mrs. Tatterson and requested her to deliver up the deed in question so that it could be recorded and the property conveyed thereby subjected to the payment of the loss sustained by the bonding company in completing Tatterson's contract; but she, though admitting that she had the deed, declined to have it recorded or to reimburse the bonding company for the loss sustained by it. Thereupon the bill in this cause was filed by the bonding company against the said Lizzie M. Tatterson, in her own right and as executrix of the last will and testament of her deceased husband and others, for the purpose of establishing the claim asserted by the complainant against the estate of Tatterson for the amount of the loss alleged to have been sustained in the completion of said building and of subjecting for its partial satisfaction the property conveyed to him from his wife by said deed.

Upon a hearing of the cause on the pleadings and the evidence adduced by the respective parties, the court below entered its decree of April 12, 1912, establishing the claim of the bonding company against the estate of Tatterson for $20,453.01, and adjudging that Tatterson died seised and possessed of the real estate mentioned and described in the deed in question from Lizzie M. Tatterson, his wife, to him, and that this real estate was assets for the payment and satisfaction of the claim of the bonding company. From this decree Lizzie M. Tatterson, in her own right and as executrix of her deceased husband, has taken this appeal.

The contentions of the appellant are: First, that the bonding company sustained no damages by reason of its suretyship for Elbert Tatterson, her husband, because Elbert Tatterson partially erected the building of the Young Men's Christian Association, and Morrow Bros. agreed to complete it for the unpaid contract money, so that Elbert Tatterson's contract was absolutely fulfilled, and, if the bonding company lost anything, it was by reason of its suretyship for Morrow Bros. rather than its suretyship for Elbert Tatterson; second, that, even if the claim asserted by the bonding company be valid, still the real estate sought to be subjected to its satisfaction was never the property of Elbert Tatterson and therefore is not assets of his estate for the payment of his debts.

In the view we take of the case, it is only necessary to consider appellant's first contention, since, if there be no liability upon the estate of Elbert Tatterson, deceased, for the claim asserted by appellee, there can be none therefor upon the individual property of appellant sought to be subjected to the partial satisfaction of said claim.

As has been observed, the appellee, the bonding company, did not in accordance with its right under the bond executed by Tatterson to the Young Men's Christian Association take charge of the partially completed building in question and complete it, nor did it sublet the same; on the contrary, Morrow Bros., on January 18, 1908, after full investigation as to the condition of the work on the building and ascertaining that there was a balance of $52,384.53 due Tatterson on its completion, which balance was subject, however, to the claim of various mechanics and supply men, who had either filed liens or were about to do so, entered into a new and independent contract with the Young Men's Christian Association, similar in all its details to the contract between Tatterson and the Young Men's Christian Association, by which Morrow Bros. agreed to complete said building at the price of $52,384.53, and furthermore agreed to assume the payment of all valid claims for which liens could be taken against the building. Contemporaneously with the execution of the contract, Morrow Bros. executed a bond in the penal sum of $54,000 to the Young Men's Christian Association, conditioned upon the faithful performance of their duties under the contract with the appellee as surety. With the making or entering into this contract Tatterson had nothing to do, and in fact knew nothing of it, so far as the record discloses. There is some evidence that Tatterson, in an interview with one of the firm of Morrow Bros. and Attorney Shultice, recognized that, as he had abandoned his contract, there was a liability upon him for a possible loss that might be sustained by appellee if it undertook to complete the contract, and expressed a willingness to provide indemnity against such loss, but nothing was done in furtherance of this suggested course, and instead Morrow Bros. agreed with the Young Men's Christian Association and appellee to take up the work of completing the building of the former as per the terms of Tatterson's contract and for the contract price remaining unpaid by the Young Men's Christian Association, and for the faithful performance of this contract on the part of Morrow Bros. appellee became their surety. The fact that Morrow Bros. lost instead of making money on their contract, which loss appellee chose to make good, does not alter the case. The Young Men's Christian Association, as appellant contends, had no right against appellee, save such as accrued out of the surety's bond, executed to it by Tatterson. They were entitled to and needed no other contract than the one they already had upon which they are asserting no claim; and, when Morrow Bros. undertook to complete the building for the amount of money that would have gone to Tatterson had he completed it, they did so, not only with the assent of the Young Men's Christian Association and appellee, but after careful inquiry and investigation and in the belief that they could profitably complete the building at that price. Had it cost Morrow Bros. less to complete the building than the price agreed on between them and the Young Men's Christian Association, they would have realized a profit as they had expected, and it would have been theirs, and no one could have sustained a claim on behalf of Tatterson's estate for any part thereof. The profit on their contract, if it had been realized by Morrow Bros., would have been theirs, and the loss sustained by them they must, of course, bear so far as Tatterson's estate is concerned; and the fact that appellee volunteered, as it appears, to make good this loss to Morrow Bros. gives it no right whatever to recover the amount so paid of Tatterson's estate for which it is not in any respect liable.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the decree appealed from, in so far as it establishes the claim asserted by appellee as a liability upon the estate of Elbert Tatterson, deceased, and adjudges that certain real estate of the appellant, held in her own right, is liable for the partial payment of the said claim, is erroneous, and the decree in this respect is reversed and annulled, with costs to appellant; and the cause, which has, upon petitions filed therein by certain creditors of Elbert Tatterson, deceased, become a general creditor's suit for the settlement of his estate, is remanded for further proceedings therein not inconsistent with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed in part, and remanded.

VIRGINIA COAL & IRON CO. v. HYLTON et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 11, 1913.)

1. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 55*)—TENANCY IN COMMON (§ 8*)—SEVERANCE FROM SURFACE—JOINT TENANTS.

The general owner or owners of land may grant all the minerals therein or any particular species of them, while still retaining title to the surface, or they may grant the land and reserve the minerals, thus creating a separate estate in the minerals, distinct from the land in which they are found; but, where the land is owned by joint tenants, a conveyance by less than all does not effect a severance of the mineral interest from the surface, but makes the grantee, if he be a stranger, a tenant in common with the joint tenant who did not unite in the conveyance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 153-165; Dec. Dig. § 55; * Tenancy in Common, Cent. Dig. § 20; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

2. TENANCY IN COMMON (§§ 44, 45*)—CONVEYANCE BY COTENANT.

While a tenant in common has capacity to transfer his individual share in the land, he has no right to convey any part of the land by metes and bounds, or to convey the mineral and reserve the surface to the prejudice of his co-owners.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Tenancy in Common, Cent. Dig. §§ 93, 94; Dec. Dig. §§ 44, 45.*]

3. TENANCY IN COMMON (§ 44*)—CONVEYANCE OF INTEREST BY ONE—EFFECT.

Where one tenant in common cannot make any conveyance to the prejudice of his cotenants, yet such deed is not void, but is effectual to pass the interest conveyed, making the grantee a tenant in common with his grantor's cotenants, as provided by Code 1904, § 2419.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Tenancy in Common, Cent. Dig. §§ 133, 134, 136, 137; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

4. TENANCY IN COMMON (§ 15*)—CONVEYANCE BY A COTENANT STRANGER—OUSTER.

Where a stranger to the title accepts a conveyance of the whole estate in a tract of land from a cotenant, and under such conveyance enters into exclusive possession of the land, claiming title to the whole, such conveyance and possession is an ouster of the other cotenants, and the grantee so entering and claiming title may sustain a claim by adverse possession, if continued for the statutory period.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Tenancy in Common, Cent. Dig. §§ 42-52; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

5. TENANCY IN COMMON (§ 15*)—POSSESSION OF COTENANT—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

While the entry and possession of one cotenant is ordinarily the entry and possession of all, which presumption will prevail until some notorious act of ouster or adverse possession is brought to the knowledge of the others, yet a tenant in common may enter adversely and claim in severalty, and where he does so the statute of limitations will run in his favor as against his cotenants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Tenancy in Common, Cent. Dig. §§ 42-52; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

6. TENANCY IN COMMON (§ 15*)—CONVEYANCE UNDER WARRANTY DEED—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

Where a tenant in common, after partition of a part of the common property, received a deed to a specified part, purporting to convey the fee, and entered, not as a tenant in common, but as an owner of the entire property, and there was nothing to show that either he or those claiming under him ever acknowledged that the title was anything other than as appeared from the face of the deed, it will be presumed that he entered under the title which the deed purported to convey, both as to the boundary of the land and the nature of his title, and he and his successors, having held the land for more than 30 years, and paid taxes thereon as the owners of the fee, acquired title as against the other cotenants by adverse possession, both as to the surface and subjacent mineral.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Tenancy in Common, Cent. Dig. §§ 42-52; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

7. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 49*)—COLOR OF TITLE—MINERAL INTEREST.

Where defendants and their grantors, since 1880, had held possession under a deed purporting to convey the entire fee with covenants of general warranty, which deed constituted color of title, they acquired title to the surveys and to the underlying minerals by adverse possession as against claimants under a prior deed of an undivided mineral interest in the land from the common grantor.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wise County.

Suit by the Virginia Coal & Iron Company against George W. Hylton and others. Judgment for defendants, and complainant appeals. Reversed in part, and affirmed in part.

Bullitt & Chalkley, of Big Stone Gap, for appellant. Vicars & Peery, of Wise, and Henry & Graham, of Tazewell, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. This suit was instituted by the appellant, the Virginia Coal & Iron Company, for the purpose of obtaining partition of the coal and other minerals in and under a 700-acre tract of land lying in Wise county. The appellant claimed an undivided four-fifths interest in the mineral under a conveyance to J. D. Price and A. J. Steinman from the wife and three of the four children of James M. Gibson made in the year 1874. The appellant by regular conveyances acquired the title of Price and Steinman to the said mineral interest. After the conveyance to Price and Steinman, the children of James M. Gibson, including Tabitha, who was not a party to that deed, made a parol partition of the 700-acre tract of land. The land was divided into three parcels—the share of Tabitha, the wife of George W. Hylton, and the share of C. W. Gibson, her brother (who had sold or contracted to sell his share to George W. Hylton), being laid off as one parcel. Afterwards H. F. Gibson and W. B. Gibson exchanged the parcels allotted to each of them. The owners of the mineral interests, other than Hylton's wife, were not parties to that partition, and so far as the record shows had no notice of it.

One of the defenses set up by the present owners of the Hylton parcel of land and the W. B. Gibson parcel, known in the record as the Van Buren Bolling land, is that they are the owners of the mineral by adversary possession. The appellant insists that the conveyance to Price and Steinman of the mineral embraced in their deed operated as a severance of the mineral interest from the surface. This is denied by the appellees. They claim that, in order for a conveyance of the mineral in land to effect a severance of the mineral interest from the surface, the grantor in the deed must be the owner of the legal title, and that, as the grantors in the deed to Price and Steinman were not, as the appellees claim, the owners of the legal title when they conveyed the mineral interest, such conveyance did not effect a severance.

Whether the grantors were or were not the owners of the legal title at that time, or whether or not it be true as contended by the appellees that a severance of the mineral interest from the surface is not effected by the conveyance of the mineral and a reservation of the surface, unless the grantor in such conveyance be the owner of the legal title, need not be determined in this case, for, if it were held that the grantors in that deed were clothed with the legal title, or that the conveyance by the owner or owners of the equitable title would effect a severance as well as a conveyance by the owner of the legal title, there was no severance in this case.

[1] It is well settled that the general owner or owners of land may grant all the minerals in the land, or any particular species of them, as coal, iron, or lead, etc., and remain the owner of the surface, etc., or may grant the land and reserve the minerals or any particular species of them, and thus create a separate estate in the minerals, or mineral, reserved distinct from the land in which they are found. Va. Coal & Iron Co.

v. Kelly, 93 Va. 332, 336, 24 S. E. 1020; Interstate Coal & Iron Co. v. Clintwood, etc., 105 Va. 574, 54 S. E. 593; Morison v. American Association, 110 Va. 91, 65 S. E. 469; Adams v. Briggs, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 361, 366, 367; Caldwell v. Copeland, 37 Pa. 427, 73 Am. Dec. 436; Barringer & Adams on Mining, etc., 35, 36. Yet such a conveyance by less than all the joint tenants where land is so owned does not effect a severance of the mineral interest from the surface, but makes the grantee, if he be a stranger, a tenant in common with the joint tenant who did not unite in the conveyance.

[2] While a joint tenant has capacity to transfer his undivided share in the land, he has no right to convey by metes and bounds any part of the land, or to convey the mineral and reserve the surface to the prejudice of his co-owners. 1 Minor's Real Prop. § 889, and authorities cited; Freeman on Cotenancy, §§ 196-198.

The reason for this doctrine is stated by Chief Justice Shaw in Adam et al. v. Briggs Iron Co., 7 Cush. (Mass.) 361, 366, and by Allen, P., in Robnett v. Preston, 2 Rob. (41 Va.) 273, 276-278.

In this case, if the grantors in the conveyance to Price and Steinman had conveyed their entire undivided interest in the land, the surface as well as the minerals, it would not, no matter how that interest was described, have effected a severance of their interest in the land from that of their sister, Mrs. Hylton, but would have made their grantees tenants in common with her. Robnett v. Preston's Heirs, supra; Cox v. McMullin, 14 Grat. (55 Va.) 82; Buchanan v. King, 22 Grat. (63 Va.) 422; Woods v. Early, 95 Va. 307, 312, 313, 28 S. E. 374; Freeman on Cotenancy, §§ 194-196. A fortiori, a like conveyance of their undivided mineral interest only could not operate as a severance of their mineral interest from the surface.

[3] In some jurisdictions a conveyance by less than all of joint tenants of their interest in the land by metes and bounds, or of their mineral interest only, seems to be regarded as void against their cotenant (Adam, etc., v. Briggs, supra; Freeman on Cotenancy, 198-203), but with us, while one joint tenant cannot make any conveyance to the prejudice of his cotenants, yet the deed is not void, but would, especially under our statute, be effectual to pass the interest conveyed, making his grantee a tenant in common with his grantor's cotenants (Code, § 2419; Robnett v. Preston's Heirs, supra; Cox v. McMullin, supra; Buchanan v. King, supra; Woods v. Early, supra; Freeman on Cotenancy, supra).

The next question to be considered is whether or not Hylton or those claiming under him acquired title to the mineral interests claimed by the appellant in that portion of the 700-acre tract allotted in the parol partition as the shares of Hylton's
